[109] This in substance is the deposition in chief of Mrs. Desormeaux, on the second article of the nephews' plea; from which, it should seem, that this witness, in spite of her long intimacy with him, had no insight whatever into the deceased's notions on the "necessity of oral confessions of secret sin," and so forth, which still are represented, even in plea, by the nephews as forming a peculiar feature of his character; and which will presently appear to have actually formed, not only a peculiar feature of his character, but one that led to very important results in their bearing on the question of his sanity or insanity. Upon interrogatories, this same witness deposes that "she never heard the deceased swear; that she never saw him fly into violent passions; that he never to her knowledge preached and expounded the Scriptures to his servants, and insisted on their praying aloud and extempore; though, when she has been staying with him, he has had up the servants to morning and evening prayers, when he has read the Scriptures, and has, himself, prayed extempore." As to the rest—"she thinks he never could have been so injudicious." So, again, that the deceased ever represented his daughter as "invested with singular depravity—a peculiar victim of vice and evil—the special property of Satan from her birth," and so forth—she is quite unaware. But the whole of this which the witness Desormeaux so negatives in her answers, speaking to her knowledge and belief, is substantively proved upon the deceased by a multitude of witnesses in the cause, beyond all doubt or contradiction. Again, the witness, Paternoster, whose opinion and belief to the deceased's sanity is also much insisted upon, especially in reference to his being of the medical profession—[110] what does he say? He says, in chief speaking to his character, that he, the witness, always considered the deceased a "clever, shrewd fellow"—"irritable, but with a good deal of self-control"—"not of that sensitive turn to fly off at every little thing, though very high and violent when he did fly off"—"positive, overbearing, proud, conceited"—"in his notions of parental authority, approaching to severity"—but he knows nothing of his religious persuasion, or even ever suspected him of being "a Methodist, or Calvinist, or evangelical, as it is called"—so that, of what is pleaded by the nephews as to his character in these respects, the witness has no knowledge. Again, upon interrogatories, this witness knows nothing of his swearing, and putting himself in violent passions, upon trifles; he takes him to have been "not that sort of man, but a man of self-governance and control." He does not know or believe that the deceased ever even threatened to beat or flog his daughter, much less that he ever actually "flogged her with a horsewhip so as to draw blood," &c.; he should think, from what he knew of him, that "however severe the deceased may have been in his general treatment of his daughter, he could never possibly have gone that length." Now here, again, every tittle of what is suggested in the interrogatories, so negatived by this witness (speaking to his knowledge and belief), in those answers of his, to which I have just adverted, is put in plea on the daughter's part; and is substantively proved in the cause, by a host of witnesses, in a manner that must be admitted to leave no question of the facts. Perhaps I should say that the witness, Mr. Paternoster, saw little of the deceased after 1812; he used to laugh at him, he says, for boasting that he [111] could "do more with his electricity than anybody else;" and this, principally, he conceives, led about that time to a breach or discontinuance of their former intimacy.

Now I think that the testimony of these (and the observation extends to that of all), the witnesses to this part of the case—I mean to the deceased's character, as pleaded by the nephews, to rebut the daughter's charge of insanity, by giving a different complexion to certain parts of his conduct that might seem to savour of insanity—furnishes a not unimportant inference. It shews that the deceased could smooth down his asperities on certain occasions and in certain companies; and that, by so doing, he could exhibit his character, if not in false colours, still in not quite its true light. Of Mrs. Desormeaux he appears to have stood in a sort of awe—which explains, probably, the check that it clearly seems the deceased could put upon himself in the presence of this witness. She says, "He used to say he did not know how it was, but he could bear her to reprove him, and to say things to him which he could tolerate from no one else." In the instance of Paternoster this reserve may be probably ascribed to his dread of ridicule; he had the art to suppress what he felt that he should only be laughed at for; and so, mutatis mutandis, in the case of other witnesses. Nor is it at all inconsistent with the notion of his being really insane that he should have been capable of this. I appeal to the experience of persons conversant with madmen whether it is not quite the contrary—whether the kind of tact with which madmen are capable of suppressing all indicatives of their malady (and even, sometimes, how [112] artfully soever these are sought to be elicited), under external influence of some or other sort, is not a common feature of the malady. Instances in point, indeed, in this kind have been stated by the Court in a former part of its judgment (see note (a), p. 88, ante). Meantime, the self-control of which the deceased was capable in these instances (confining it to these only; as it would be too burdensome to state in similar detail the self-control of which it appears by the evidence that he was capable at times in similar instances) serves well to explain how very reconcileable the opinion and belief entertained and expressed by nearly, if not quite, all the witnesses examined on the part of the nephews, to the deceased's perfect sanity, is with the conclusion at which the Court may ultimately feel itself bound to arrive, that, notwithstanding such their opinion and belief, he was really and truly insane. Each of those witnesses so deposing singly for himself or herself is ignorant of many particulars in the character and conduct of the deceased, which appear in the evidence produced by the nephews themselves, looking to that evidence taken as a whole; and looking, also, to what they, the nephews, have admitted or suggested on this head, either in their exhibits or through the medium of their interrogatories. But the Court's opinion is to be framed on a consideration of all the evidence in the cause—of the evidence taken not only on the nephew's part, but on that of the next of kin—their knowledge of the facts disclosed in which might possibly materially alter that "opinion and belief" to the deceased's perfect sanity, which, as it is, the witnesses produced by the [113] nephews, very many of them, have actually expressed. In fact, it plainly results from their depositions that the whole of those witnesses were ignorant to a great extent, and that most of them were even utterly ignorant, of the real character and conduct through life of the party to whose sanity they were vouched. In that ignorance they depose to his sanity; not having seen aught in the deceased to justify a contrary "opinion or belief," they, naturally enough, swear to his having been, in their "opinion and belief," of sound mind. In their having so sworn I see nothing that impeaches either their judgment or their sincerity: but their "opinion and belief" to that effect, under these circumstances, can have little weight with the Court; whose duty it is to frame its judgment from the facts in evidence in the cause, to say nothing, at present, of its being encountered by the adverse "opinion and belief" of the (more numerous) witnesses (of, at least, equal credit and capacity) examined on the part of Mrs. Dew.

(2) The subject of inquiry which next presents itself, and a most important subject of inquiry it is, is the conduct and character of the daughter of the deceased, the complainant in this suit. It is pleaded, on her part, that she, the daughter, "from her earliest youth, had, and constantly shewed, a great filial affection for the deceased; and always behaved to him with great respect and attention—conducted herself with the utmost decorum and propriety on all occasions—was "a person of strictly moral and religious habits—and was so considered and known to be, as well by the friends of the said deceased as other persons of high character and reputation by whom her conduct was [114] uniformly approved." Is, or is not, this part of the daughter's plea sustained by evidence? This I now proceed to shew in the first instance; before I come to consider the adverse pleadings and proofs on this head of the residuary legatees.

Charlotte Mary, the daughter of the deceased, and the plaintiff in this cause, was born at a cottage in the neighbourhood of Lady Clive's, at Englefield, in Berkshire; and resided at Lady Clive's (her mother dying in child-bed) till she was about four years old. She was very much during that time with a domestic in the family, Phœbe Wall, who has been examined as a witness in this cause. This witness describes her as "one of the most engaging, interesting, children ever seen"—as "equally lovely in person and amiable in disposition," and as "beloved by every one in the family, high and low." Such is this witness's description of Miss Stott at that age, but the Court, of course, attaches little weight to what the daughter, either in the opinion of this witness, or actually, might have been so early in life.

At about four years of age, in the years 1792 or 1793, the daughter is sent, under the auspices of Lady Clive, to a school at Worcester, where she remains for about four years, the two first of these under the care of a Mrs. Gwyllim; the rest of the time under that of her successors in the same school. "The child," says Mrs. Gwyllim in her evidence, speaking of Miss Stott, while under her tuition, "was, in all respects, one of the most lovely and endearing children, in person, temper, and manners, that ever was seen. She was then young; but there was every indication of her having a charming temper, and a good understand-[115]-ing; and every body loved her." That lady's evidence upon this head is fully confirmed by her daughter, Mrs. Byng.

At the age of between eight and nine years Miss Stott is taken from Worcester, and received by her father at his house in Bishopsgate Street. The first witness, in point of time, to the daughter's conduct, after this, is Mr. Daniel Goff, an intimate friend of the deceased, during nearly the last forty years of his life. The Court will have occasion to advert to the testimony of this witness so frequently, in the sequel, upon other subjects (in which, however, the notions entertained by the witness, on the subject immediately before the Court, namely, on the daughter's character and conduct, fully disclose themselves incidentally) that it will dispense to itself with reciting much of that evidence in this place. At present it will be sufficient to advert briefly to his evidence on the fourth article of Mrs. Dew's first allegation, in which she says that, "upon all occasions, she conducted herself toward her father to the best of his, the witness's, knowledge and belief" [and it will presently appear that the witness had the amplest opportunities of forming a correct knowledge and belief as to the subject upon which he is deposing], "with great respect and submission—she shewed an eager desire to do every thing in her power to soften, win, and please him—she conducted herself, in all that the deponent ever saw" [and here, again, I may say that had she conducted herself differently, the witness must have seen it], "with strict decorum and propriety. The witness has had several children—all are dead—but if blessed with a daughter, he could only have wished her to resemble Mrs. [116] Dew—her general temper was very good—her principles, habits, and conduct were strictly moral and religious." This evidence of Mr. Goff, I should say, extends to the whole conduct of Mrs. Dew, during very much of the subsequent remainder of her life; as will appear when the evidence of this witness, as to some other parts of the case, comes, in its turn, to be stated and commented upon by the Court.

Mrs. Ottley's opportunities of estimating the character of Miss Stott were more limited, in point of duration, than those of the last witness. She knew her well, however, for between two and three years—probably commencing when Miss Stott was about twelve years old. On one occasion (presently to be adverted to) she lived with this witness for about three months. What Mrs. Ottley says of her is that "she considered her to be, and found her, very clever, obliging, and amiable—her conduct was uniformly correct—the witness never had, nor knew, nor heard of a complaint against her, but from her unfortunate father—of that father she had the greatest possible awe—but her behaviour to him was, at all times, exceedingly obedient, respectful, and proper. She saw," she says, in answer to an interrogatory, "nothing like a disposition to any thing improper in Miss Stott."

The witness Mrs. Duplay's knowledge (her intimate knowledge, that is) of Miss Stott subsisted for about three years, from 1805 to 1808; commencing, consequently, when Miss Stott was about fifteen years old. "She had," she says, "and used the opportunity of forming, as she believes, a correct opinion of Miss Stott's character and conduct" [what excited the witness's vigilance in this respect, will appear in its [117] place]. Far from indicating, says the witness, that depravity and want of principle which she had been led to expect in her, she found it to indicate quite the contrary of all this—"her disposition the witness considered to be amiable, and her conduct was uniformly correct."

Material a point in the case as the daughter's character is, it is still necessary only briefly to advert to what is deposed to, on this head, by the several servants (six in number) who lived in the father's family during the period of Miss Stott's residence under his roof. And this, the rather, as parts of their evidence, on a different head, must presently be stated; from which, however, amply sufficient may be collected as to their view and impression upon the subject immediately before the Court. It may be sufficient to say of these that they all speak of the daughter, whose conduct, as well towards her father, as generally, they had every opportunity of seeing, in the highest possible terms. To the father they describe her as respectful, attentive, obedient; and, either from fear or a sense of duty, submissive to whatever he thought fit to impose upon her. Generally, they represent her as a charming, well-behaved girl, of whom there could justly be but one opinion—very modest and correct in her deportment; conducting herself, at all times, with the greatest propriety; of a mild and affectionate temper, and of strictly moral and religious habits.

The evidence just adverted to carries down this part of the case to the year 1808: when the daughter, under circumstances to be stated in the sequel, by the recommendation and advice of most respectable persons, especially of the late Sir Thomas and Lady Barnard, [118] quits the house of the deceased, and is received into the family of a Miss Brent, an elderly female, who kept a school in Old Palace Yard, Westminster. Miss Brent's evidence, on this head, is in these words: she says that "in September, 1808, she received Miss Stott, as a parlour boarder, from the hands of Sir Thomas and Lady Barnard. She remained with her for twelve months, during which time she was immediately and constantly under the witness's eye; both as a parlour boarder, and as spending her vacations with the witness. During all that time Miss Stott's conduct was unexceptionable. The witness found her a very amiable, and a very good, young woman, and of a most affectionate disposition. She always conducted herself with the most perfect decorum and propriety—she could not be better in any respect—the witness never saw any thing amiss in her—never—she cannot speak too highly of her—she deserves to receive, at the witness's hands, the best possible character. The witness is sure that if Sir Thomas and Lady Barnard were living their testimony would be to the same effect—they both thought most highly, and Lady Barnard was particularly fond, of her."

At Miss Brent's school was a teacher, Miss Atkinson; who afterwards left Miss Brent, and established a school of her own in Manchester Buildings, Westminster. Under her care Miss Stott was subsequently placed, still by Sir Thomas and Lady Barnard, in order to qualify herself as a governess—and with her Miss Stott continued until she actually accepted the situation of a governess in the family of a Mr. and Mrs. Abbott. The evidence of Miss Brent will also be resorted to in a [119] subsequent part of this judgment. Meantime, of Miss Stott's character, whilst she knew her, the following is her estimate:—"She was a mild, modest, young woman, amiable and unassuming; everybody loved her but her father—her whole conduct was most correct; it was uniformly so. She would conform to any thing; but her natural qualities were such as entitled her to a high station, or at least qualified her for one. She was religiously disposed; and strictly moral and virtuous."

In the family of Mr. and Mrs. Abbott Miss Stott resided as a governess for five years and a half. The first of these, Mr. Abbott, is now dead; but his widow deposes that "during the whole of that five years and a half Miss Stott uniformly conducted herself with such propriety, that she and her husband treated her, in all respects, as one of their own children, and felt a strong affection for her." "She quitted their family," says the witness, "under circumstances highly creditable to her. The witness's eldest son had formed an attachment to her—the husband of the witness was disposed to treat this as a boyish attachment, which would pass away of itself; but Miss Stott considered it more adviseable that she should leave the family upon this; and she accordingly did so of her own accord. The witness wished never to lose sight of her; and has continued to know her till the present time. Her opinion of Miss Stott, established during the time that she was resident in her family, has been strengthened, if possible, by all that she has since known of her."

On quitting Mrs. Abbott, Miss Stott went, still as a governess, into the family of Mr. Dew, of Guildford [120] Street. This about Midsummer, 1815—and she continued as a governess in that family until towards the middle of the year 1818; when her marriage with her present husband, a son of Mr. Dew, took place, with the perfect approbation and concurrence of all his connections—a circumstance furnishing itself, I apprehend, the highest possible testimonial, to the perfect propriety of Miss Stott's demeanour, in all respects, during this period; and one which renders it quite unnecessary that the Court should recite what is expressly deposed to, on this head, by Mr. Dew (the father) himself and the several members of that family.

Lastly, in the evidence of Dr. Wilson, of Mr. Bartlett, and of some others, which I forbear to advert to, more particularly at the present time (as it must be stated, at length, upon another occasion) to avoid repetition only—the Court has, viewing it in connection with what has already been stated upon this head, the amplest evidence of which the nature of the thing is capable that the daughter has really been, what she is pleaded to have been, a person of unexceptionable character through her whole life—and that her conduct, in every particular, upon this evidence, and so far as hitherto appears, has been such as to deserve that uniform approval which it never failed to elicit.

Now what is there to oppose to this, in the evidence taken on the part of the nephews. Their allegations are: 1st. As in general, that "Miss Stott from her infancy, though possessed of considerable mental ability, was very perverse, sullen, and idle; averse to restraint; disobedient to those under whose control she was placed; and, in particular, disobedient to her father, the deceased in this cause." And the [121] specific charges are: 1st. That in 1799 she was dismissed from a school at Hackney, where her father had placed her in 1797, for misconduct, such (either in kind or degree, for it is not said which) that the school mistress refused to permit her to remain, though at the earnest request of the deceased; who even tendered 100l. per annum (the school terms being under 40l. per annum), provided she would consent to her remaining; 2ndly. That she was again, in 1802 (when about thirteen years and a half old, and growing up into a young woman), dismissed from another school at Hampstead, where she had been placed by her father on her leaving the first, in consequence of her having been detected by the mistress of the school in "libidinous language and practices." Such are the charges against the daughter preferred by the nephews, both general and specific. Next, to the proof of these.

Upon the general charge contained in the 6th article of their plea the only witnesses produced, competent in any sense to speak to the charge, are Mrs. Desormeaux, Mrs. Rivers, and a daughter of the first witness, Miss Sarah Desormeaux.

Mrs. Desormeaux's account is, that "Miss Stott was a clever girl, but indisposed to exert herself—she was of a perverse and obstinate disposition, and occasionally would be sullen—she cannot say very perverse, &c., as articulate; but there certainly was rather more of this, and of unwillingness to submit to restraint, in her, than in some children—she was disposed to shew a disobedience to the directions of her teachers, and particularly to those of her father—but perhaps that was because he expected so much more from her than she was at all equal to—he [122] wished her to be more than female—a perfect pattern of all excellence and all accomplishments." And she concludes her statement on this head with "the regret which the deceased was in the habit of expressing to her at his wishes and expectations of this nature not being gratified."

Now it is quite obvious, without going into particulars (and without any reference whatever to the contrary representations on this head of a host of witnesses examined on Mrs. Dew's part), that Mrs. Desormeaux's evidence in support of these general averments is infinitely short of those averments themselves. [Her representation is even, I think, in one respect, fortunate for Mrs. Dew; for it puts in evidence, beyond all question on the part of her opponents, those extravagant wishes and expectations (also spoken to indeed by very many of the witnesses) entertained by the deceased on the subject of his daughter—as that "she was to be more than female," and so forth—to brooding over his disappointment in respect of which (though the natural or necessary consequence of his entertaining them) I am rather apt to ascribe his delusion on this whole subject (so to call it by anticipation), than to any "insane or irrational antipathy felt by him towards his daughter from her birth;" to which the daughter herself ascribes it; but which, I think, there is much in the evidence throughout to negative. This, however, rather by the way.] But in stating Mrs. Desormeaux's evidence on the subject in question—namely, that of Miss Stott's misconduct, as charged by the legatees generally, I have stated the whole. For of the other two witnesses, the one, Mrs. Rivers, at most only confirms, to some extent in part, what is said by Mrs. Desormeaux on this parti-[123]-cular: while the other (though in fact she knows nothing at all about it) negatives what is said. For all which that other witness, Miss Desormeaux (the daughter of the first witness), says on this sixth article is, "that she was at school with Miss Stott in early life, whom she remembers to have been reckoned a clever girl;" but "as to her being sullen, perverse, &c., or more idle than girls generally are, she can say nothing—she was, herself, too young to judge of her in those respects." As to the testimony of some other witnesses who have been produced and examined (I do not stop to inquire how properly) on this sixth article of the plea—I mean Mr. Charsley and Miss Rawlings—so far are they from being qualified to speak to her temper or talents, that neither the one nor the other of them ever saw Miss Stott in their lives. All they say on the subject is, that the deceased represented her to them as being what the nephews so generally describe her. But the deceased, it will be seen, was in the habit of going much beyond this in heaping invectives on his child—according to his representations of her she was not merely sullen, perverse, and so on, but she was a fiend, a monster, Satan's special property, and I know not what—nay, Charsley, the nephews' own witness, speaks to the deceased having repeatedly in his presence called her "a very devil." So that the deceased having represented her as sullen, perverse, &c., is no better proof that she actually was sullen, perverse, &c., than his having represented her a monster, the special property of Satan, and a very devil, is a proof that she actually was a monster, the special property of Satan, nay, a very devil. All this, too, is clearly beside the mark—the father's impressions on this head are admitted [124]—they even form a leading part of the daughter's case. The only question as to these respects, not their existence, but their source; it is, in other words, whether they are countenanced (to the extent, if not of justification, of excuse) by the conduct of the daughter; or whether they infer the father to have been really insane. The only witness on this sixth article of the nephews' allegation, to whose evidence I have not already referred, is Mr. Paternoster. He, indeed, says that he has occasionally seen Miss Stott, as a girl at her father's; but of her obstinacy, sullenness, and so forth, he, like the others, pretends to no knowledge but from her father's report. So much for the evidence as to that general misconduct imputed to the daughter by the nephews in their plea. Next as to the specific charges.

In order to prove their first specific charge—that of Miss Stott's dismissal from Mrs. Rivers's school at Hackney, for misconduct in 1799—the nephews have produced the best possible witness, Mrs. Rivers herself. And it is due to both the litigants that her evidence on this head should be fully stated. She says that, "at the recommendation of her friend and fellow-witness, Mrs. Desormeaux, she and her sisters, two Miss Rutts, received Miss Stott, then about nine or ten years old, as a boarder in their establishment for young ladies at Hackney, at Midsummer 1797; where she continued nearly two years." To her talents and temper, as evinced during this period, as already said, her evidence is, in substance, pretty confirmatory of that of her friend Mrs. Desormeaux. As to her final dismissal, she deposes in the following words:—"The deponent cannot exactly recollect what was the cause of Miss Stott's removal from her [125] school—but she thinks it must have been the wish of deponent and her sisters to remove her, because she recollects it was not the act of her father; for he was much disappointed and vexed at her being removed; and very much wished deponent to take her again; and even offered her the sum of 100l. per annum if she would do so; but deponent and her sisters objected; they had had a good deal of trouble with her, and therefore were unwilling to receive her again, and refused so to do."

Such is her evidence in chief. To an interrogatory addressed to her on the part of Mrs. Dew, she answers as follows:—"She thinks she does recollect the deceased requiring his said daughter to write to him very frequently (not so often as once a week, but very frequently) to let him know what progress she was making; he was very strict and very anxious that she should make a rapid progress; he did not, as interrogate, send a rod to the school; but he brought one himself, and wished the respondent to employ it as an instrument of correction on his said daughter—but the respondent told him the regulations of discipline established in her school did not admit of such a mode of correction, and therefore the rod was locked up in a drawer, till the deceased was prevailed on to take it away. Deceased did, as interrogate, threaten that he would come and punish his said daughter himself—he did come, but he never beat her—respondent would not have allowed it; but he never attempted to beat her. On recollection, she says he may in a moment of haste have hit his daughter a slap with his hand, but certainly nothing more." I should say that this witness had, in answer [126] to a former interrogatory, described the deceased's visits to his daughter whilst at her school as "frequent."

Previous to observing upon this evidence, the Court will state that on the other specific charge: and will address its observations at once to the evidence on both charges.

It is pleaded then, to state in full this latter (grosser and more grievous) charge, that Miss Stott, on leaving Mrs. Rivers's at Hackney, was placed by the deceased at a school at Hampstead, kept by a Mrs. English; where she continued, from sometime in 1800 to sometime in 1802; that during that period she still evinced as great a disinclination to study, sullenness, and obstinacy as while under Mrs. Rivers; and that, at the end of it, she was peremptorily again dismissed in consequence of Mrs. English having detected her in libidinous language and practices." Now here again is produced by the nephews the best possible witness, Mrs. English herself. What she says on this article of the nephews' allegation, the tenth article, is as follows:—

"To the tenth article of the allegation the deponent saith that she cannot, in conscience, depose to the said Charlotte Mary Dew evincing, as articulate, a great disinclination to study, or a great sullenness and obstinacy of disposition. On the contrary, deponent saith, as far as she recollects, the said Charlotte Mary Dew was very willing to study, and not at all obstinate or sullen. To say she was absolutely faultless would certainly not be correct; but, what her faults were, the deponent cannot recollect, except in one little instance, of which she will now speak. She saith that some time in the [127] year 1802 deponent received an intimation, and most probably it was from one of the teachers, that the said Charlotte Mary Dew had held some indelicate conversation with one or two girls in the school; and deponent was exceedingly displeased with her for it. She also wrote to her father to inform him of it; and he was equally angry; and by deponent's desire removed his said daughter from the school. But deponent cannot say that such her desire for the removal of the said Charlotte Mary Dew was occasioned so much by the circumstance just adverted to, as by the general trouble that she received from the frequent visits of the father, for the purpose of examining and ascertaining her progress. For although the deponent felt the conduct of the said Charlotte Mary Dew on the said occasion to be of an exceedingly improper kind; yet she would have been induced to have tried the effect of punishment and remonstrance, had not her determination been previously made up to remove the said Charlotte Mary Dew, if possible, for the reason just stated. Deponent further saith that the terms made use of in the said article are far too strong. As far as she recollects, the language used by the said Charlotte Mary Dew was not libidinous, it was only indelicate; and as to deponent's detecting her in any libidinous practices, deponent believes it is quite a mistake; she has no recollection whatever of any such circumstance." Upon interrogatories this witness again says that "Miss Stott never, to her recollection, evinced any perverseness, obstinacy, or sullenness of disposition; on the contrary, that her temper was mild and amiable; that she was generally beloved [128] by her schoolfellows and others; and that she did, whilst under her (the witness's) care, make considerable progress in her studies; not only as much as girls of her age usually do, but considerably more."

Now I ask whether a charge of this nature can be, in effect, more thoroughly negatived, than that in question is by this evidence of Mrs. English, who is produced to sustain it? The utmost to which it amounts is, that Miss Stott was reported (I admit credibly reported) to have used some indelicate language in conversation with some of her schoolfellows—but to the rest, whether it respects either language or practice, it is impossible to reprobate and repudiate the charge in stronger terms than the witness does. And so far from what did occur having any apparent connection with her removal from Mrs. English's, she, Mrs. English herself, positively deposes that this was a step she had previously determined upon, not in consequence of any misconduct on Miss Stott's part (of whom, generally speaking, she has given the highest of characters), but in consequence of the father's officious and impertinent interference in matters of school discipline; and the trouble occasioned to her, the schoolmistress, by his too frequent visits and importunities. And I now ask, referring back to the evidence of Mrs. Rivers in support of the first charge, whether the previous removal of Miss Stott from Hackney is not much more probably to be ascribed to a similar disinclination in Mrs. Rivers to put up with the same sort of interference on the father's part, than to any great specific fault or misconduct on that of the child, of which up to this moment she, Mrs. Rivers, has no recollection whatever. Had it been this last, she could [129] scarcely have forgotten, she must have remembered it; and there is so much in the evidence both to account for and to justify a wish on her part to get rid of the father that, as the witness could hardly not have felt it, so to this, rather than to any serious disapproval and wish on that account to get rid of the child, her removal from Mrs. Rivers's is, in my judgment, much more probably to be ascribed.

(3) Bearing in mind, then, that the uniform tenor of his daughter's conduct through life is proved to be that which I have described as pleaded on her part; and that no effectual shewing to the contrary, in any sense of that phrase, appears in the evidence taken on the part of the nephews, I proceed, next, to state what appears in evidence of the deceased's conduct through life, as particularly in relation to that daughter, at the same time stating the impression made by this on those who witnessed it, in respect of the deceased's sanity or insanity. To state, indeed, the whole of what appears in evidence on this head would be tedious in the extreme, as it would be intolerably disgustful; still it is necessary that the Court should recite so much of it as may justify the conclusion at which it arrives on this principal part of the case. I may say of it in the outset, speaking generally, that it fully justifies a conclusion drawn by one or more of the witnesses that either the deceased was a "monster," or that in this particular at least he was decidedly "deranged." The Court possibly may have no difficulty in the end in choosing between these conclusions under all the circumstances of the case.

Now to shew how early the deceased appears to have betrayed something of delusion on this particular sub-[130]-ject (in the opinion, at least, of a person very competent to form a correct opinion on the subject), it is only necessary to refer to the evidence of Mrs. Gwyllim. It will be recollected that from the age of about four to six, Miss Stott was placed under this lady's care at Worcester. During that time she only once saw the deceased, when the child had been with her about a year, and of that interview and its consequence she deposes nearly as follows:—She says that, "having been told the deceased was in the house, she took his child to him, and would have placed her hand in his, saying, 'My dear, this is your father,' when the deceased withdrew his hand and suddenly broke out in a manner sufficiently violent to terrify both" (that is, not only the child, but the deponent)—"'I have quarrelled with the people at Oakley Park'" [meaning Lady Clive's family, then resident at Oakley Park, in Gloucestershire], "'they presume to say that my child is supported on charity.' He then inquired what the witness would 'maintain, clothe, and educate the child for—would 20l. a year do?' The witness smiled and said, 'If he would write to her on the subject she would answer his letter.' This was all that passed; he staid but a few minutes, saying, 'Ma'am, I'm in a hurry; I am going home by the coach.' During that time he took no notice whatever of the child" [described, it will be remembered, by this same witness, as at that time one of the most endearing children, in person, manner, and mind, that was ever seen], "or evinced the slightest token of affection for her. He walked up and down the room with a furious look and in a disturbed manner; and his conduct altogether was quite ex-[131]-traordinary; inexplicable," says the witness, "on any other principle than that of insanity. Soon after," she says, "she received a letter from the deceased requiring a description of his daughter, in person and manners. She described her, in reply, as the fact was, healthy in body and amiable in mind; but, in mentioning that the child had chilblains at the time, happened to make use of the word 'gross.' This so offended the deceased that he wrote her a long letter full of abuse, the word 'gross' occurring in it over and over, evidently forced in; telling her that 'her conduct should be watched, while the child remained with her,'" &c.—"a letter, in short," she says, "quite confirmatory of her belief that his mind was disordered."

At the age of between eight and nine Miss Stott is removed from Worcester, and received by her father in Bishopsgate-street. And immediately upon or very soon after this that inveterate delusion of mind (for even here I am really incapable of describing it in any other language), under which the deceased laboured through life in respect to the principles and conduct of his child, every where discovers itself in the evidence. It early appears, for instance, in the evidence of the late Bishop of Durham, who attended the deceased for medical electricity; in what he deposes, that the deceased was in the habit of addressing to him on the subject of his daughter—a subject, he says, which the deceased introduced with great abruptness and indelicacy, when he, the witness, had a short time only been his patient. He deposes on the sixth article of Mrs. Dew's allegation that, "in speaking of his daughter, a theme which was always uppermost in his mind, he expressed himself always with warmth, sometimes with [132] violence, but never with temper. At a time when she must have been very young he spoke of her as very wicked; and charged her with vices of which it was impossible that a girl of her age could have been guilty. He, the witness, endeavoured to convince him of this; but could make no impression on him, his ideas on the subject of his child were most inveterate and abominable, and such as in the conduct of the daughter, as a child, there could be no just foundation for." The respectable witness declines formally ascribing all this to insanity; he considers it his business, he says, "to speak to effects, not causes," but he admits that "the deceased's conversation, in respect to his daughter, was such as to savour of mental delusion on that head."

To the witness, Mrs. Ottley, another medical patient, it appears that he was in the habit of expressing himself not dissimilarly on the same subject at or about this time. "His description of her," she says, "before she, the witness, knew Miss Stott, appeared to her very unreasonable, improbable, and extravagant, as applied to any child; he described her as disobedient; having a spirit of depravity; deceitful; inattentive to her studies; violent in her temper; obstinate; given to lying; with very much more to her prejudice;" of all which, on becoming afterwards well acquainted with the daughter (as already said), she could find no trace in her. This, and bewailing his own lot, as an unfortunate father, were the burthen of his conversation. There must, she concludes, have been "a perversion of mind in the deceased respecting his daughter, whether it were a delusion she cannot venture to depose."

The witness, Goff, an old and intimate friend of the [133] deceased, says on this head, that "from the time when Miss Stott, at the age of eight or nine years, came up to London, it appeared to him that the deceased uniformly so spoke of, and acted towards, her as to convince him, the witness, that he was not in his right mind; no man, he thinks, not labouring under mental delusion, could have so spoken and acted towards a child. With him she was uniformly undutiful, stubborn, idle, refractory; of extreme depravity; in fact an abandoned profligate." How much, or rather how little, the daughter merited all this in the witness's opinion has already, in part, appeared in what has been stated as to his impression and belief of the real character and conduct, in all respects, of Miss Stott. He has seen the deceased, he says, "roaring and raving like a man distracted—calling himself the unhappiest creature in the world to have a daughter so vile, undutiful, and irreclaimable—and this before he even pretended to have any thing specific to lay to her charge." He says that "he often reproved the deceased for his conduct towards his child, but wholly without effect; he seemed to be totally unconscious that his feelings and conduct towards her evinced any thing of severity; according to his account of himself, he was the kindest, the tenderest, the most indulgent of parents; and it was his daughter's misery not to know the blessing she had in him." At length, Miss Stott, at the deceased's suggestion, was taken home by Mr. Goff; with whom she resided at Edmonton for nearly two years; how she conducted herself during which period, in particular, in the estimation of this witness, will presently appear. "In all this time," he says, "the deceased never saw her; he had promised not to [134] interfere with her, but she had scarcely left him when he began to harass the witness with letters and interrogatories as to all her conduct, and multiplied directions about her." At the end of this two years the deceased became dissatisfied with Mr. Goff for his too great indulgence to his daughter; and took her away. His avowed object, in placing her with Mr. Goff, I should say, was, that "in his family she might learn obedience, and to effect a change in her temper and habits." The witness was content to take her on these terms—though fully sensible, he says, that "the change required was a change, not in his daughter, but in the deceased himself."

The witness Mrs. Duplay's knowledge of the deceased began in 1803—with his daughter she was not personally acquainted till 1805 or 1806. From the first, she says that "the deceased was in the habit of expressing himself to her, or in her presence, as a parent under the severest affliction, from the peculiar depravity of an only child; this was the constant burthen. On whatever topic the conversation began, whether literary or religious, or any other, in this it constantly ended. In point of general effect, his declarations as to the conduct of his daughter never varied—it was uniform and consistent—she was the property of some Satanic power—a child of the devil—a devil incarnate—destitute of all principle, truth, and goodness." And this delusion in respect to his daughter [for so this witness expressly charges it to have been, as indeed, in effect at least, does every other witness] never abated; on the contrary, she says it went on progressively increasing, and gaining strength. She also, I should say, subsequently became well acquainted with Miss Stott; and, like every [135] other witness similarly circumstanced in this respect, she, too, deposes that, so far from meriting these gross imputations, in her opinion, who had every opportunity of forming true notions on the subject, "her temper was amiable in every particular, and her conduct uniformly correct."

To repeat what occurs on this head, in the testimony of all the witnesses, would be wholly unnecessary. It may be sufficient to say that it fully bears out the representations of the witnesses whose depositions on this head have already been stated —in particular, it bears out the representation of the last witness, that the delusion (for so the Court must, in common with this and all the witnesses, term it) under which the deceased laboured in this particular, never abated. In confirmation of this the Court has only to refer to the evidence of Mr. Wilson and Mr. Bartlett, to both of whom, during and throughout his intercourse with them (of a nature and on a subject to be spoken of in the sequel) the deceased was in the constant habit of representing his child as a moral monster—of unequalled depravity, vice, obstinacy, and profligacy—the special property of Satan—a very devil—possessed of Satanic art, and capable of deceiving the devil himself. How much the reverse of all this again the daughter really was, in the opinion also of these witnesses, will be said in its place.

Such then were the deceased's notions, generally, on the subject of his daughter —notions which the deceased, at least, very early imbibed, and which he persisted in through his whole life; whether to be traced up, originally, to his hatred of or antipathy to her from her very birth, as she supposes; or whether not rather [136] owing (as I have already said, an attentive consideration of all the evidence inclines me to believe) to some early checks, which his absurd wish to render her "more than human," &c. were of course doomed, and could not fail to experience. My present business, however, is rather with the effect of these than the cause—their effect, I mean, on the actual conduct of the deceased to his daughter, which I now proceed to consider as it stands in the evidence. Of that evidence the Court would willingly dispense to itself with reciting any part, but it is absolutely necessary that parts of it should be recited, in order to render the case itself, and the Court's judgment upon it, fully intelligible.

Of the deceased's general treatment, then, of his daughter, such as I have described her from the evidence, almost from her infancy, as deposed by a variety of witnesses, it would be difficult to speak without indignation, if the Court were not disposed to adopt the conclusion of nearly all the witnesses, that it did and could only proceed from, and be founded in, insanity. His general deportment towards her was such as not only to negative all idea of natural affection, but to betray, unless accounted for by actual delusion, a temper the most truly fiend-like. His manner towards her was not, as the witness Goff says, "such as merely to alienate the affection of any child, and make the father an object of dread and hate instead of love and respect; but it was fiery and terrific; the very mention of her name (in her absence), he says, was like setting fire to gunpowder; the instant she appeared, his eye flashed with rage and scorn; his countenance underwent a total change; and he spurned her from him as a reptile." "His beha-[137]-viour to her," says another witness, Mr. Sheen, "when she was living at home with him in Hart-street, was that of a brute. He, the deponent, often dined with him when she was at home, but never with her—if she was in the room for a little while he could not bear the sight of her and ordered her out; though his look was enough—his countenance changed at her very presence; and his aspect became savage and ferocious." It would be quite unnecessary to prolong this detail; only let it be remembered that what the witnesses are deposing to on this head is to a system—they so represent it—and such their representation is confirmed by the testimony of many witnesses to the same effect. Affection for such a father on the child's part, as one of the witnesses expresses it, was altogether impossible; her manner and deportment could neither be expected nor would have been permitted to express any feeling of that nature towards him. In fact she is represented by nearly all the witnesses as so overpowered with terror in his presence as to be nearly inanimate—so subdued by fear, as the witness Mrs. Duplay terms it, as to be actually "paralysed." Yet no witness pretends to have ever seen anything like a want of duty or respect or attention to the deceased in her manner and deportment towards him—on the contrary, her humility and a wish to oblige and obey him in all things is proved to have manifested itself in her whole conduct to the deceased in everything that she either did or said in his presence.

To this head of general treatment belongs the evidence as to the several occupations forced by the deceased upon his daughter, and to the persons with whom he [138] compelled her to associate. It will be remembered that she was to be a perfect phenomenon—the most elegant and accomplished among women—superior to any thing ever seen upon earth—"worthy of himself"—for so the deceased was in the habit of expressing it to the witness Goff by way of climax. In order to accomplish this, tasks were imposed on her, to which apparently even she was quite unequal: and her slow advances in education and not improving her mind with sufficient rapidity to "qualify herself to sit at the head of his table and to be a credit to him" were constantly enumerated by the deceased to the same witness, among other subjects of complaint. Meantime, what were the young lady's occupations, and who were her associates?

The witness Hannah Wright deposes that, "when she was in the service of the deceased, Miss Stott, whom she knew when at home (which was for about half a year) was a tallish fine girl, not less than about fifteen. During that time she never had her meals with her father—never, that she, the deponent, recollects, sat down at table with him. She was compelled to do the most menial offices, as making the beds, sweeping the rooms, scouring down the stairs, &c.; and at a time (in bitter cold weather) when she was suffering so severely from chilblains that her fingers were running down with blood, he insisted on her washing all his linen, which had been usually sent out to be washed when Miss Stott was from home. She (the witness) assisted her in this—but only by stealth." The witness Barnard, who lived with the deceased as footman from October, 1806, to February, 1808, says that "during the whole of that period, when [139] Miss Stott was at home with the deceased, she was in the capacity of a servant, not a daughter—she frequently had to scour grates, and do other parts of household work of the lowest and hardest kind. In the summer of 1807 Miss Stott was at Southampton for a month or six weeks, and at Lymington for about as long with her father, in company with the two Miss Terrys, one of whom the deceased afterwards married. There," he says, "as well as at home, whenever deponent saw her, except at meals, she was in some household work, assisting the servant hired to cook—and both there and at home, any person coming into the house, not knowing who she was, must have taken her for a servant." The witness Martha Wright lived with the deceased from April, 1806, to January, 1808; she says, "Miss Stott never dared to be seated in the presence of her father unless he gave her permission—she was chiefly in the kitchen, and had her meals and passed her time there with the witness; though occasionally the deceased had her in the parlour at meal-times—she took her share of the household work as a servant, only that in some respects she was treated worse; as, while the deponent had warm water to scour the stairs, &c., Miss Stott was compelled to use cold—she got up with the servants to wash at three o'clock on washing days; at all times she was up at six." The witness Nicholson says "that during the eleven months that she lived with the deceased in 1809, Miss Stott took half the household work, the same as the deponent; except that the deponent cooked the victuals—but Miss Stott washed the dishes, scoured the house, &c.; and one time, when the de-[140]-ponent was ill for a week, she did all the work of the house, except what the footboy did. She never was mistress of a sixpence—her dress was common and mean—her bonnet such as the witness would not have worn; and she was just like a servant, except that she had her meals with the deceased; but" (these, it should seem, so scanty that) "she has often begged the deponent to give her something to eat that might not be missed. The deceased's whole treatment of his daughter," concludes this witness, "was unnatural—she knows not how to describe it justly, but by saying it was diabolical—his looks towards her were frightful and furious, and his whole study apparently to degrade her, and torture her feelings." If remonstrated with, for instance, about keeping his daughter in the kitchen, the deceased's answer was, that "the kitchen was too good for such a wretch"—if requested not to make her wash while her fingers were running down with blood, he would reply with an oath that "washing would cure them," or to that effect. All this, and very much more of the same sort, is in the evidence, though it is impossible to recite it all. It is in evidence, too, that the deceased was in the habit of abusing his daughter in the grossest terms—and that his language on those occasions was filthy and indecent in the highest degree—not fit, as the witness Wright says, to be uttered—whose evidence, on this head, is confirmatory of that of the Bishop of Durham; that his ideas on the subject of his daughter's propensities (which there is not one syllable in the evidence to countenance throughout) were most abominable.

Meantime, at the actual barbarities inflicted by the deceased on his unhappy child, it is impossible to [141] glance without shuddering. For instance, it is in evidence that, at between ten and eleven years old, for some prevarication or lying, as he termed it, in giving an account of her secret thoughts (that is, for not confessing herself guilty of some crime with which he charged her), the deceased stript her naked, tied her to a bed-post, and after flogging her severely with a large rod, intertwisted with brass wire, rubbed her back with brine fetched out of a pickle tub—that he repeatedly, and on the most trivial occasions, struck her with his clenched fist, and cut her with a horsewhip—tore out her hair by the roots, and on one occasion even plucked out a lock of her hair with the skin attached to it; &c. &c. The evidence of the two Wrights, of Nicholson, Barnard, and others; and the deceased's own admissions, or rather boasts, to that effect establish even this part of the daughter's case, incredible as it might seem, beyond any possibility of doubt or question. Nor let it be supposed that these severe and ignominious chastisements were inflicted by the deceased on his daughter in her childhood only. Thus it appears in the evidence of Hannah Wright that in 1806 and 1807 the deceased, on the slightest supposed provocation, would fly upon his daughter, and knock her down with his fist, or strike her with a whip across the shoulders, so as to raise large wheals on her neck and breast—this, when the daughter was sixteen or seventeen, a woman grown. The evidence of Nicholson and others is to the same conduct at a still later period, in 1808 and 1809. And Miss Atkinson deposes that on two occasions at least of going to her father's, whom she went occasionally to visit whilst at Miss Brent's school, Miss Stott returned with her face bruised, and her shoulders black, [142] as from violent blows; no doubt of the father's infliction. This in 1809 or 1810, when the daughter was one or two and twenty.

Of the daughter's patience and submissiveness under this course of barbarous usage, generally, quite enough has already been said. It appears, however, from a series of testamentary scripts before the Court, that the father charged her, particularly, in three instances, with having "revolted, and flung herself from under his protection." (a) It may be proper, therefore, to [143] say something as to the nature

(a) The Court here adverted to those two clauses in the will propounded, and several testamentary scripts, which purported to recite the deceased's motives or reasons for bequeathing legacies respectively to Mr. Goff and Miss Iley. That relative to Mr. Goff's legacy, in the will propounded, was in these words—"I give and bequeath unto Daniel Goff, of Newington, in the county of Middlesex, the sum of " (the amount left in blank), "as a token of my esteem for his virtue and integrity, fully evidenced in endeavouring to promote the same good, in conjunction with me, towards my daughter, although he failed." This expression, "the same good," is only intelligible when taken in conjunction with the clause respecting Miss Iley's legacy, a clause which, of course, should have preceded that other, though it follows it (a circumstance after observed upon by the Court) in the executed will. The clause as to Miss Iley's legacy was in these words: "And I make this bequest in her favour, in consideration of her good and faithful endeavours to assist my humble efforts in training up my daughter to habits of honest industry and frugality, and of affording her every advantage to acquire a sound knowledge of herself, and receive a good, moral, and religious education, after she had thrice revolted, and flung herself from my care and protection, and refused to adopt a line of conduct conformable to my domestic arrangements."

The same sentiment, expressed in the same or very similar terms, was found to occur in every one of the several testamentary scripts before the Court. Thus in the script No. 1, following the bequest to Miss Iley, were these words: "And this I do in consideration of her good and faithful endeavours, to assist my humble efforts, in training up my daughter to habits of honest frugality and industry, and in the promotion of her real interest, in affording her every advantage to acquire a sound knowledge of herself, and receive a good education, religious and moral, after she had thrice flung herself from my constant care and protection, and refused to adopt a line of conduct suited to my domestic arrangements." And Mr. Goff's legacy, in script No. 1, was in these words: "I give and bequeath to my friend, Mr. Daniel Goff, &c., the sum of of these "revolts," as these, it seems, were especially present to the mind of the deceased, when addressed to his testamentary acts.

The nature of the first "revolt" will be best understood from the evidence of Frances Ward, on the eighth article of Mrs. Dew's allegation. In her evidence, on the preceding article, this witness had deposed to the severe mode in which the deceased had been flogging his daughter, to which the Court has just alluded—I mean with the rod intermixed with brass wire, &c. The witness says, indeed, that she did not actually see this flogging inflicted, but that she is equally sure of it as if she had seen it. She, herself, afterwards "gathered up, under and round the bed post of the bed in which Miss Stott slept in the garret, as much as she could hold, in both her hands, of broken birch, as from a rod, with several pieces of broken wire, small brass wire, mixed." And it was to her that the de-[144]-ceased applied, through her fellow servant, for brine out of the pickle tub to rub her back with—but to the eighth article. She says that, "having occasion some time after to go up stairs about her work, in the fore part of the day she found Miss Stott crying, and greatly agitated from the apprehension of another severe flogging, for not learning a lesson set her by the deceased, which she complained, and the deponent believes, that it was out of her power to learn." She, the deponent, then saw, she says, "straps and strings fastened to the bed post, for the purpose, as she had no doubt, of tying her up, as she had been tied up on the former occasion." Under the present terror of this, it is that Miss Stott leaves her father's, and takes refuge with Mrs. Ottley. And this, I take it, is the first of those revolts, as he calls them, alluded to by the deceased, in each of the several scripts (as well as in the will propounded), before the Court.

As to the other "revolts," as I make them out, these are still less of a nature (if less can be) to reflect any discredit upon the daughter, or to provoke any feelings of just resentment on the father's part. They are, if I understand them—first—that the daughter, at the recommendation, and under the advice, of most respectable persons, in particular, of the late Sir Thomas and Lady Barnard, again quitted the deceased's house in 1808, wearied out, it should seem, with the treatment that she uniformly experienced from him; and was placed, as a parlour boarder, with a Miss Brent, at Westminster (whose evidence has already been adverted to), in order to qualify herself as a governess—where, however, it should be stated that the deceased, at least after a time, was prevailed upon to pay for her [145] board and education—and, secondly, that, after being for some time, at first with Miss Brent and then with Miss Atkinson, she did, still by the advice of Sir Thomas and Lady Barnard, take the situation of a governess in the family of Mr. and Mrs. Abbott. These attempts to render herself independent of him it seems, as especially by the evidence of Miss Atkinson, that the deceased deeply resented. And these with the other are the revolts—the flinging herself three times from under his protection—which appear to have rankled, at all times subsequently, so deeply in the mind of the deceased; and in particular to have been present to him when contemplating his testamentary arrangements. But under the circumstances already stated out of the evidence, I am of opinion that this removing herself from under his roof and dominion was an act of mercy in the daughter, as well to the deceased as to herself—had she continued with him the consequences might, not improbably, have been fatal to both. Who can entertain any doubt of this who reads such passages in the evidence as the following? On one occasion of Miss Atkinson's visiting the deceased, and urging him to be reconciled to his daughter, she says that "he shewed her a long mark on a mahogany table standing in the passage, and said to her in his eager determined manner—Do you see that, ma'am, do you see that? She said, Yes, she did. That, he said, was done with a horsewhip; and the blow ought to have been on his daughter's back, but she escaped from him. It was a long deep mark," says the witness, "and could not have been made by a horsewhip; it could only have been made with some hard instrument, even by the deceased, who was a very powerful [146] man." The 100l., sterling, as a token of my esteem for his virtue and faithfulness, which he exercised, in conjunction with me, to reclaim my daughter." And, in each of the other scripts, Nos. 2, 3, 4, and 5, of the years 1816, 1817, and 1818, the legacies to Goff and Iley were followed by the same assigned reasons. And in that to Iley the daughter was alluded to by the deceased, in each of them, as having "thrice revolted, and flung herself from his, the deceased's, constant care and protection."

deceased shewed the same dent (he calls it) in this mahogany table to Mr. Wilson, stating to this witness also that it was the effect of a blow intended for his daughter. "From the appearance of that dent," says the witness, "the blow by which it was made must have been such as he should suppose might have killed Miss Stott. Something of iron, or harder than wood, must have made it—and the deponent thinks the deceased said he had done it with the poker." I should say that the being who is thus proved to have been in the habit, on the slightest supposed provocation, of springing on this delicate female and knocking her down, &c., with the first instrument that came to hand, is described in the evidence generally as a large powerful man, "with a fist," says one of the witnesses, "like a ploughman's."

It has been attempted in the argument to refer much of the deceased's final implacableness towards his daughter to her engagement in Mr. Dew's family, and to her subsequent connection with that family by marriage. And the nephews in their plea have expressly referred to this last as the proximate cause of that disposition of his property, which the daughter is now seeking to avoid. But in this they are not outborne by the evidence. That implacableness is proved to have existed in as full force long before as it did subsequent to that connection; so as to negative altogether its being solely, or even principally, referable to this. Witness those abortive attempts to reconcile the father and daughter, prior to that connection, spoken to by Mr. Wilson and Mr. Bartlett—whose evidence on this head (or that of one of them, for both witnesses speak on this head to the same general effect), [147] both for itself and as highly illustrative of this part of the whole case, it is now necessary to refer to, even at some length. Of the evidence, then, of the first of these, that of Mr. Wilson, the following is the substance:—

He says—His knowledge of the deceased, to some extent, commenced in 1809 or 1810, by his attendance at St. John's chapel, in Bedford Row, of which chapel he, the deponent, was then minister—the deceased's first visit to him was probably in 1813 or 1814—its professed object being to complain to him of the conduct of his man-servant for some trivial offence, he thinks, that of not having blacked his shoes properly—but he says that the deceased had hardly sat down before he began on the subject of his daughter, bursting into tears, and bewailing himself as the most unhappy of parents; and describing his child as the most abandoned of profligates. His description of her in short was such, the deponent says, as to produce an impression on his mind that she was a "common prostitute." He says that he passed over the subject as quietly as possible, with civil expressions of a hope that she might see her errors and reform, &c.; being at length induced to suspect, from the deceased's whole appearance and manner, and evidently exaggerated statements, that the daughter might possibly not be that very abandoned character which he described her. "His general account of his treatment of his daughter at this time was alarming—his manner vehement and ferocious." After this interview the witness says that he saw the deceased only occasionally, till sometime in the year 1816, when his second wife died; he was then, in consequence of a very proper and becoming note from Miss Stott, expressing a wish to that effect, [148] induced to attempt to avail himself of the opportunity afforded by his visits to the father about that time (of which she, the daughter, must have heard from some other quarter) to attempt a reconciliation between them. On seeing Miss Stott, then a governess at Mr. Dew's, in consequence of that note, he describes himself as agreeably surprised at finding her a person so totally different from the one he had been led to expect her. He found her "a superior young woman, virtuous, modest, and amiable, and with rather more of the reserve and retiring character of her sex in her than usual"—in short, even in his then judgment (which a more intimate knowledge of her seems less to have shaken than confirmed), "such a daughter as would have been a delight, comfort, and honour to any parent." In bespeaking his interference, he says, she did not appear to indulge any great hope of success; but to think it her duty to omit no opportunity of attempting to conciliate her father, whatever might be the probable result. Now to the actual result of this.

In consequence of this interview with Miss Stott the witness, on the evening of his wife's funeral, requests a private audience with the deceased; and as a minister of the gospel, proposes to him again to receive and be reconciled to his child. He adopts the proposal with the greatest eagerness, saying that it will be his salvation, and so on, and the witness retires, promising to renew the subject at an early opportunity. Soon after, he again sees the deceased on the same subject, at his own house, by appointment. The deceased again expresses the liveliest satisfaction at the prospect of a renewed intercourse with his daughter, telling the witness that there never was [149] such a kind, indulgent father as he had been; and referring, in proof of this [and, apparently, says the witness, without the slightest notion of any inconsistency in his so doing], to his having scourged her till she bled, and then rubbed her back with cantharides, having plucked out her hair by the roots, and other similar tokens of affection; of which so many have already appeared, that the Court spares itself the pain of reciting any from the testimony of this witness. The witness endeavoured, he says, to convince him of this inconsistency; and that his own admissions proved undue severity, and cruelty, towards his daughter; but his efforts were useless; he immediately exclaimed with vehemence, "No, sir, I never had; I have not now a single unkind thought towards her"—producing at the same time a bundle of papers, as to justify himself by her own written confessions of all sorts of crimes; which the witness, however, refused to look at, saying that confessions of crimes under such circumstances could not be relied on. The deceased, however, says the witness, was in no state to be influenced by such or, indeed, by any suggestions; and the witness told him that he was plainly under a delusion on the subject. He was at this time, he says, under some apprehension of personal violence to himself, so furious was the deceased's manner, and his look so ferocious. "His feeling towards his daughter, when speaking of her having left him, and refused to return, was apparently that of a wild beast, disappointed of its prey." The witness at length, finding reasoning unavailing, proposed, in a tone of authority, an entire amnesty on both sides, as all that should or could be done in the case—that the daughter on her [150] part should acknowledge sorrow for whatever she might have done amiss; and the father tender a free and full forgiveness of her on his part.

On these terms they separate; the deceased assenting, apparently; and the daughter, at an early day after, accompanies the witness to her father's house. The deceased, says the witness, "met him, the witness, as usual; but at the sight of his daughter his countenance underwent a sudden change—his eye lit up with an expression of fury and malignity that was terrific." The witness, "thinking the moment pressing, told him at once that he had brought his daughter to him to confess her faults, and implore his forgiveness and blessing—which she herself, at the same moment, seconded, by throwing herself at his feet, and addressing the same language to him in a beautiful manner," says the witness; "for nothing could exceed the propriety of her whole conduct and demeanour." The witness watched the deceased at this moment: "There was not," he says, "the slightest token in his word or look of what had so passed having any effect on him—his countenance retained the same sternness, severity and fierceness—he was apparently quite insensible that he had any duty to perform." The witness seeing all this, and fearing that the deceased would have struck his daughter—as a last resort requires him, authoritatively, to repeat a form of forgiveness to his child; which he does, after the witness, "but reluctantly and with pauses between each word, like a man acting under restraint; and only considering whether he dared refuse." This is the whole: the deceased, after it is finished, remains just as before; apparently only restrained by the pre-[151]-sence of the witness from falling on his child—and the witness thinks it necessary to remove, and actually removes, her from his presence, under that impression, as quick as possible.

A few days afterwards the witness makes one more (a final) effort on behalf of Miss Stott, by accompanying her to her father's to drink tea with him; pursuant to a previous arrangement to that effect, "suffered only," he says, "by the deceased." His assistant at the chapel, Mr. Bartlett, was also present at this interview. What occurs is a mere repetition of what had occurred at the former interview: the same dutiful observance and meek attempts at conciliation on the child's part—the same sullen ferocity on that of the father — only restrained, says the witness, by his presence and that of Mr. Bartlett, from breaking out in words if not acts of violence. And this interview concludes like the other, without any beneficial effect, in spite of their united efforts being produced on the deceased—the witness again taking Miss Stott away; as he says "he would on no account have risked leaving her in the power of the deceased."

What the witness does after this (apparently all that he could do) is to remonstrate with the deceased on the inconsistency of his conduct to his daughter with his professions and promises. The deceased answers that he has forgiven her—what can he do more? disclaiming at the same time all unkind feelings towards her; insisting that he is a most affectionate father, &c., as at all prior times. To all that the witness further urges on this head his sole reply is, "Let her come home to me"—[and this, says the witness, was evidently the point to which his mind was turned]—"I [152] insist on her coming home to me." The witness tells him that she was prepared to do so under his, the witness's, advice; but that this he could not advise in the deceased's then frame of mind, as not thinking that his daughter's life would be safe in his hands. The witness can get no more out of him; and, finding it a fruitless endeavour to bring him to anything like reason on the subject, finally quits him as, he says, in despair. He subsequently writes him a letter announcing to the deceased his regret at being under the necessity of closing the negociation; a draft of which letter he annexes to his deposition.

Before I conclude with this witness I may say that he had one other interview with the deceased during his last illness; the witness calling upon him in the hope that the deceased might then be in a state to receive more favourable impressions than formerly. This before the deceased was declared a lunatic. But the deceased, on seeing the witness, breaks out into an exclamation that "the devil has sent him—that the witness is the greatest enemy he, the deceased, ever had; that he it is who has fomented and encouraged his daughter's unnaturalness and rebellion, &c.," and so end all transactions between them, pretty much as they began. It is, perhaps, quite unnecessary to add that this witness speaks of the deceased as a madman (in a word) on the subject of his daughter throughout his whole evidence. He concludes it by expressing his firm belief that "the deceased's state of mind, in this particular, was clearly and essentially different from that of a merely wicked man, or of one under the influence of a prejudice, however strong, on the subject of his child. He regards it," he says, "as [153] a complete delusion which he had no power of resisting, and which was liable to, and did, go frightful lengths in the absence of temporary external restraints."

I abstain from reciting the nearly similar evidence of Mr. Bartlett as to many of the above particulars, having gone so much at length into that of Mr. Wilson. But I am bound to say that I see nothing in Mr. Bartlett's evidence to discredit him as a witness. I am even bound to say that I see nothing in his conduct, as with relation to this whole cause, looking at all the evidence, but what I consider to be eminently pious, and worthy, and humane. It is true that he may be a biassed witness in favour of the daughter, as strongly intimated by the nephew's counsel in their argument—it was natural, I was going to say creditable, to him that, to a certain extent, he should be a biassed witness. The Court itself has been compelled to exercise great vigilance to guard its own feelings from that bias in her favour, which the case set up by the daughter by its very nature was eminently calculated to produce. And the necessity of protecting itself from the suspicion of having been so biassed in framing its judgment has been one motive with the Court for going, at the length which it has gone, into the evidence in this cause. Admitting him, however, a biassed witness to some extent in favour of the daughter, what obligation, in respect of his testimony, does this impose on the Court? Why, the obligation of looking narrowly into and placing little dependence upon his expressed opinions as a witness—but surely not that (which the counsel for the nephews would represent it) of discrediting his testimony to facts—of deeming his evidence as to facts [154] not to be relied on. In justice to Mr. Bartlett, I have said thus much of his evidence; though for the sake of brevity and to avoid repetition I forbear more than a general allusion to his evidence on this head.

In reference to what was said by Mr. Wilson of the deceased insisting that his daughter should "come home," &c., and to its being "the point to which he evidently laboured," I have to observe that this sort of stipulation, on the part of the deceased, plainly impossible to be complied with on the part of Miss Stott, or permitted on that of her friends and advisers, appears by the evidence of several of the witnesses to have formed an insuperable obstacle to her return after she had once quitted her father's under the mediation of Sir Thomas and Lady Barnard; and subsequently when, after completing her education with Miss Brent and Miss Atkinson, she had herself become a governess in the families, successively, of Mrs. Abbott and Mr. Dew. She was to return, if at all, for so the deceased required it, "as a prodigal, and confess her sins

—she was to throw herself entirely upon him, and submit her every thought, word, and action to his direction; she was to see no one, write to no one, but by his express permission." This according to Mr. Bartlett. So in the evidence of Miss Brent. "She was to come to him herself, and alone, crawling upon her knees, like a wretch as she was." So again as expressed by the deceased to the elder Mr. Dew when urging him to receive her; "Why was not she at his threshold on her bended knees confessing her crimes, her matchless crimes?" And so, lastly, in 1817, after the daughter's return from Switzerland, her renewed efforts to obtain his pity and forgiveness are [155] met with assurances on his part that "the only plan which can gain her access to his heart and feelings is to throw herself into his arms, determined, like the prodigal, and using his language, to be governed by him entirely," &c.(a) Now how impossible it was in the deceased's then frame of mind that Miss Stott should comply with stipulations of this sort; and how impossible it was that her friends should have suffered this if she herself could have complied, it would be quite useless to insist. All this, however, was long anterior to her connection by marriage with Mr. Dew's family; so that to ascribe to this, or to her connection with Mr. Dew's family at all, the deceased's final implacableness towards his daughter is an argument that has no foundation in the evidence. As little foundation, in my judgment, is there for the suggestion that the deceased was solely, or even principally, instigated by the marriage of his daughter with the younger Mr. Dew, virtually to disinherit her and her future offspring, who could by no possibility have been guilty of any offence to him, as he has done by this will. A series of scripts are before the Court not dissimilar in point of general effect; of which some, I think, bear date anterior to Miss Stott's introduction to the family of Mr. Dew in any capacity. True it is that after Miss Stott became governess in the family of Mr. Dew, and more especially after she became a member of that family by her marriage with Mr. George Dew, the deceased himself was in the habit of representing her leaving his house and marrying against his consent, &c., to Mrs. Desormeaux and others, as his motive for [156] abandoning her and bequeathing her only a small part of his fortune. But is this representation at all consistent with the whole case as it stands in the evidence—or is that such as to lay the slightest foundation for an inference that, either by staying at home with him, or by marrying into any other family, or by remaining single, the daughter would at all have bettered her prospect either of recovering (if ever she had them) the affections of the father or of inheriting his property. In my judgment the probable result in either case would have been just what the actual result is: and the suggestion to the contrary raised in the plea and laboured in the argument has, I think, no foundation whatever in the evidence. Founding it in the deceased's representations on the subject is begging the question again—the daughter's very case being that in every thing relating to her the deceased was insane, and acting throughout under a gross delusion. So again when the deceased's suggestions to that effect are made the foundation of a charge, also much laboured in the argument, against the elder Mr. Dew—as that he well knew the deceased to be a man of large property; and that marrying his son to Miss Stott was only, forsooth, a politic scheme on his part to secure the reversion of this, somehow or other (for how does not very distinctly appear), to his own family—all this too is equally beside the mark. The deceased did suspect this and a great deal more; he was full of jealousies and suspicions of his daughter, as persons tainted with insanity not unfrequently are of those about and connected with them: his daughter, according to him, was constantly, from her infancy, "plotting with his enemies;" "compromising his character;" [157] "depriving him of his friends;" "robbing him of his patients;" "conspiring even to swear away his life;" and I know not what. But founding any argument in proof of his sanity on what the deceased's notions might have been on such subjects—the daughter's case being that the deceased was insane on such subjects, and she herself exhibiting those very notions as proofs, among others, of such his insanity—is really arguing in a circle: the only conclusion it suggests being that at which persons usually arrive who so argue; that is, in effect, no conclusion at all. Upon what other foundation, however, than the deceased's mere suspicions, the charge in question against Mr. Dew (a charge, after all, pretty immaterial to the real question at issue in this cause), rests, I am at a loss to discover. His real inducement to sanction that marriage, according to the evidence, I must take to have been a wish to promote his son's happiness, by uniting him with the object of his affections, a female of unquestionable character, as he expresses it; known and approved to him as such by her whole conduct during a previous residence of several years in his family. He must have known, knowing what he did of the deceased, that his daughter's prospect of inheriting, by his will, any considerable portion of his property was extremely problematical; and of any notion on his part at that time of a suit, in the nature of the present, to avoid any will of the deceased made not in favour of his daughter, it would be quite idle to suspect him. It is wholly negatived, too, by what appears in the evidence of his conduct upon, and immediately subsequent to, the death of the deceased. I have only to add that this marriage of Miss Stott with Mr. George Dew seems to [158] have been sanctioned and approved of by all the husband's family. I do this, as something to the contrary is suggested by the nephews in their interrogatories—as if the mother, Mrs. Dew, had grounds of dislike to her future daughter-in-law; and was averse to the connection. But what turns out to have been the fact in this respect? It seems that Mr. Dew had two sons, each of whom was a wooer of Miss Stott, and that as one only of the two could, in the nature of things, be the successful wooer, the other (to his own future regret) was betrayed (by envy and malice, I am sorry to say) into misrepresentations of Miss Stott, by which to a certain extent, for a time at least, the mother, Mrs. Dew, no doubt, was prejudiced. But the whole effect of that prejudice soon subsided; it was at Mrs. Dew's special request and invitation that Miss Stott, after a short absence occasioned by those misrepresentations, returned to Mr. Dew's; and she was married from that house, in the presence of Mrs. Dew herself and of the principal members of Mr. Dew's family, both male and female.

The Court has now gone through the whole of this part of the case—with the exception, however, of what still remains to be said as to certain exhibits in the case connected immediately with this part of it.

It is expressly pleaded by the nephews in support of their charge of such misconduct on the daughter's part, as is to account rationally for whatever severity she might have been treated with by the father, that she, the daughter, "frequently made to her father voluntary promises, as well written and verbal, that she would attend to the rules which her father laid down—would exert herself to correct her vile [159] disposition and bend her stubborn will—would strive, night and day, to regain his lost affections, and to feel in return that affection for him which she never had felt." And in proof were exhibited five several letters from his daughter to the deceased, containing such admissions of misconduct, and accompanied with promises (pleaded never to have been kept) of such reformation and amendment.

In reply to this, it was admitted and pleaded by the daughter that she did make the confessions and promises alluded to, but that such confessions were not voluntary —that they were extorted from her by previous harsh treatment and its threatened repetition; and were written by her when in a state of great mental anguish and anxiety, under either the deceased's own immediate dictation or that of persons to whom he had previously misrepresented her conduct and character. For the promises, she pleads that it was her constant endeavour to fulfil these—but that all her efforts to please him were rendered unavailing by that fatal delusion under which, quoad hanc, she charges the deceased at all times to have laboured. Which, then, of these is the true state of the case; and which representation is the Court bound to adopt upon the evidence?

Now I must say that the mode in which it appears by the evidence that the deceased was in the habit of procuring, or rather extorting, confessions and admissions of this sort from his daughter leaves no doubt whatever in my mind on this part of the case. Almost from her infancy was this unhappy child to account to her scarcely less unfortunate father not only for all her actions, but for all her thoughts —she was to com-[160]-municate to him from time to time the most secret, transitory thought that arose in her mind, &c.—and some supposed prevarications on her part in this latter particular were the pretexts, it seems, on several occasions for the horrid barbarities proved to have been actually inflicted upon her by the father in certain specific instances. And indeed I may almost say that, according to the testimony of nearly all the witnesses (twenty in number) examined on the part of Mrs. Dew, this "withholding of her thoughts from him or prevaricating in her account of them," as he insisted, were the only specific proofs of rebellion, unnaturalness, depravity, &c. &c., which the deceased, when put to it, was ever able to object to her. But to the mode in which confessions and admissions of the sort in question were actually procured by the deceased. It will be sufficient to refer to the evidence of one or two witnesses on this head; as their testimony is in substance and effect precisely that of all the witnesses to this part of the case.

"The deceased," says the witness, Martha Wright, "did require from his daughter a regular account of her thoughts—she was to write out for him a confession of every thing that she did amiss, and also an account of all that passed in her mind. He told the witness that he did all this in order to shew his daughter the depravity of her heart—and she has frequently heard him saying, 'You know what a depraved, bad girl you are'—to which Miss Stott would answer, 'Yes, papa'—a good deal of that kind passed—he called her a depraved wretch, &c.; but Miss Stott never made any other reply than 'Yes, papa.'" The witness says indeed that she cannot [161] depose to his having "compelled her to write a confession of any crimes or sins of which in his delusion he imagined her to be guilty"—of "every thing she did amiss," as also of "all that passed in her mind," we have seen that he did require his daughter to write confessions, according to the testimony of this witness.

The witness, Nicholson, says that "when the deceased went out, which he always did in the after part of the day, Miss Stott was shut up in his study to write an account of her thoughts; the witness saw many papers which she wrote on such occasions. No sooner did the deceased return than his daughter was to appear before him with this written account; and the witness dreaded his return for his daughter's sake. As sure as he returned the storm began—he stamped on the floor fit to break it through—thumped on the table with his fist, &c., so as to make her, the witness, shake. No one can, from mere description, have an idea of his violence on such occasions. The witness never was present when the deceased actually chastised or struck his daughter; but she many times saw severe marks of violence on her person, which came, she has no doubt, and could only come, from blows inflicted on her by the deceased." I should say that, although this witness lived eleven months in the deceased's service, Miss Stott was at home only about three months of that time. She then quitted him, as already more than once said, under the sanction of Sir Thomas Barnard. She describes him as, on that occasion, like a man raving wild, but whether this were owing to displeasure with his daughter for leaving him; or whether to regret on his own score, [162] "for the loss of his victim," she, the witness, declines saying. The evidence of Mrs. Duplay, and of some others, is precisely corroborative of this of Wright and Nicholson. But there are other witnesses again whose evidence is still more material on this head, as coming, more directly, to written confessions made in the (personal) absence altogether of the father—of the nature of which are the exhibits in question annexed to the allegation of the residuary legatees.

It will be recollected that, on Miss Stott's first escape from her father's, under the present terror of a severe threatened punishment for not doing what, it should seem, she was unequal to perform, she took refuge with a then patient of her father's, who had a daughter about the same age with herself, Mrs. Ottley. She remained at Mrs. Ottley's on that occasion about three months. "During that period," says Mrs. Ottley, "the deceased required her to write letters to him—she was particularly to give him an account of all her thoughts, &c.; he wrote also a great variety of questions for her to answer; the purport of these was, 'Don't you do so and so; or, don't you think so and so?' so as to lead to just such answers as he pleased; proposing the question and at the same time suggesting the reply; and his daughter dared do no other than obey."

Miss Stott was at this time probably twelve or thirteen. Now to the evidence of a witness who carries down this system (for so I am warranted in calling it) to a time when Miss Stott had finally left her father. The witness I refer to is Miss Atkinson, who was a teacher at Miss Brent's school at Westminster; where [163] Miss Stott, after quitting her father, had been placed by Sir Thomas Barnard.

She says, "That while Miss Stott was at Miss Brent's she kept a journal, and wrote letters to her father, the contents of which were the subject of a good deal of conversation between her and the witness. The witness saw several of them. She cannot depose that what Miss Stott then wrote was written by command of her father, but she verily believes it; as no young woman could otherwise have so written. Her answers were shaped so as to please her father—always in a humiliating strain; confessing her sinfulness, and so on. The witness has also seen letters from him to her in which she was required to confess to him her thoughts, words, and actions—particularly, he required confessions from her that she was vile, wicked, wretched, abandoned, and the like." Miss Stott at that time was one or two-and-twenty.

But to obviate any possible doubt, if any possible doubt can exist, on this part of the case, it is only necessary that the Court should refer, finally, to the evidence of Mr. Goff. This witness's long intimacy with the deceased, and that his daughter was resident in the witness's family, at the age of about fourteen or fifteen, for nearly two years, between 1803 and 1805, has already been stated.

This witness deposes, on the tenth article of Mrs. Dew's responsive allegation, that "he knows less himself, than he has heard from others, of Miss Stott having written to her father in the language articulate"—[i.e. that she was a vile wretch, &c. &c.]. "When about to write to her father" [this witness, I [164] should say, had formerly deposed that although the deceased, on placing his daughter with him, had promised not to interfere with her in any way, yet that she was scarcely with him when he began to harass him, the witness, and, I presume, also his daughter, with letters and interrogatories, &c.—but to return—when about to write to her father] "she, Miss Stott, repeatedly asked the witness what she should say, and was willing to write any thing to conciliate him; but the witness never actually interfered or advised her in that respect. Exerting herself to 'correct her vile disposition'—'doing her duty to her father'—'bending her stubborn will'—'striving most assiduously night and day to regain his lost affections'—[though," says the witness, "this she truly did] are expressions which were constantly in the deceased's mouth; and could only have been adopted by his daughter to please him; as every one who had any intercourse with him about his daughter must know. From the closest observation of her conduct, and all the witness ever knew of her—from his knowledge of the deceased's treatment of her, and of her suffering and terror under it; such that the witness is astonished that she did not fall a victim to it, in one way or other—the witness is sure that nothing she wrote in the way of confession, or in terms of acknowledgment of vileness, stubbornness, or the like, ought to be taken to her prejudice; or as being any thing more than expressions, dictated by the deceased, or used by her, as borrowed from him, in the hope of softening and appeasing him; though all her efforts to this (and she did all," says the witness, "that human nature could do), were rendered unavailing by that in the [165] deceased's mind which poisoned every thing, and found, even in compliances with what he expressly required to be done, only fresh grounds of hate and animosity." The witness cannot swear, he says, that the deceased required her to write in that "particular strain, or to use those particular expressions; but he certainly did, in his letters, so express himself, though artfully and ambiguously, as to lead to answers in that strain—he used to write that if she had a just sense of her vileness, she would do so and so, or promise so and so," &c.—speaking precisely, in short, as the witnesses Ottley and Miss Atkinson had spoken on this head.

One more instance, connected with the present immediate subject of inquiry, out of the evidence of this witness, and I have done.

The nephews expressly pleaded in the twelfth article of their allegation that, during the residence of Miss Stott in the family of Mr. Goff, she, Miss Stott, succeeded (as she had also succeeded in the instance of other of his friends) in creating, by her artful misrepresentations, a great and unfounded prejudice, in the mind of Mr. Goff, against the deceased; which at length occasioned a total destruction of their long-established friendship—and this, by inducing Mr. Goff (as she had also induced others) to believe that the deceased really treated her with unmerited harshness and severity—in order to which she both wilfully misrepresented the conduct of the deceased to her; and artfully palliated, or altogether concealed, her own delinquencies. They also expressly pleaded that she, Miss Stott, some time after leaving Mr. Goff's, confessed her falsehood and duplicity in these particulars; [166] and voluntarily wrote and sent him a letter in which she entreated his forgiveness for such her misconduct while resident in his family. And the letter itself, so pleaded to have been written, is exhibited, in supply of proof, in the usual form. The counter plea to all this, on the part of Mrs. Dew, is, first, a denial of the facts so pleaded: and secondly, an averment that the letter in question, which she admits to be her's, was written by her under intimidation, and not voluntarily; and by the express order and directions, which she did not dare disobey, of the deceased himself.

Now, upon this twelfth article of their allegation, the single witness produced by the nephews is Mrs. Desormeaux—and it is but due to the nephews that her evidence upon it should be stated; before I proceed to what is deposed by Mr. Goff himself on the daughter's counter plea.

She says, then, on this twelfth article of the allegation, that all she knows of the circumstances therein pleaded is that the deceased in a letter to her written (as it should seem) about that time, mentioned his having placed his daughter at Mr. Goff's, at Edmonton—and she then proceeds in the following words:—She says, "she heard, both from the deceased himself, some years afterwards, and also from Mr. Goff, that such misrepresentations had been made by Miss Stott of her father's conduct towards her; and her own misconduct had been so artfully palliated that the said Mr. Goff believed that her father was treating her with unmerited harshness and severity; and it ended, finally, in a termination of the friendship between Mr. Goff and the deceased." It need scarcely, perhaps, be said that the whole [167] stringency of this piece of evidence consists in the words on which the Court has dwelt [and also from Mr. Goff]: for what the deceased himself told this, or any, witness on this or any such subject has, for a reason that has been given over and over, nothing whatever to do with the question.

Now, then, to the evidence of Mr. Goff himself on the counter plea—which, viewing it in connection with his whole deposition, so completely, of itself, in my judgment, disposes of the question [and this, in spite of what Mrs. Desormeaux, whether from forgetfulness, or misconception, or what else, I do not stop to inquire, represents herself as having, sometime or other, heard from Mr. Goff] that the Court may safely venture to leave it without any comment, which could only weaken its effect—and may conclude, or nearly so, with a bare statement of this, its inquiry into this part of the case. That evidence is as follows:—

"He can," the witness says, "and does, positively depose that Miss Stott never did, either by representations of the deceased's conduct towards her, or by palliation, or concealment of her own misconduct, or by any other means, induce the witness, or, to his knowledge or belief, any other friend of the deceased, to believe that she was treated by the deceased with unmerited harshness or severity. She did not, during her residence in his family, attempt to create in his mind, or that of his late wife, any unfounded prejudice against the deceased; on the contrary, she concealed much of what the witness knew, from the deceased himself, of his treatment of her; and made, on all occasions, favourable suggestions for him: she was, to the witness's knowledge, [168] treated with unmerited harshness and severity. She merited the reverse of what she experienced—and his behaviour towards and punishments of her, as seen by, and described to the witness by the deceased himself, were such as no misconduct even, on her part, could have justified. The witness has no reason to believe or suspect that Miss Stott ever attempted to impose on him, or any one, on the subject in question; or that she ever said any thing upon the subject that was not strictly true, except when palliating some of her father's enormities. The deceased, indeed, often attempted to persuade the witness that she, the daughter, imposed upon the witness—that in her promises to comply with his, the deceased's, wishes, and to follow the witness's advice, she only deceived the witness—that it was finesse, insincerity, and hypocrisy, and artfulness—an artfulness exceeding all belief on her part; but he, the witness, knew the contrary of all this. He did receive," he says, "a letter from her to the effect of that articulate—he never had a doubt that such letter was not her own—the witness full well knew that it could not be her's; the confessions and declarations contained in that letter are wholly unfounded and untrue. The witness had previously determined not to be again on any terms of intimacy with the deceased, and was resolved to shew him this; not, however, by reason of anything his daughter had ever said, but by reason exclusively of his, the deceased's, own conduct." This, in chief, in answer to an interrogatory addressed to him, on the part of the nephews, on the same subject, he says, "The producent," Miss Stott, that is, "was the innocent occasion of his, the witness's, friendship for the [169] deceased being finally broken off: this, however, was not in consequence of any representations made by her, but because the witness was tired out. She did, after she ceased to reside in his family, confess, first by letter, and afterwards by word of mouth, that not only many, but all, the representations that she had previously made to the witness of her father's conduct towards her were totally false; she did express contrition for having made such representations; she did earnestly solicit the witness to renew that intimacy with the deceased which she, herself, she said, had been the occasion of destroying; she did write and say all this as interrogate; but the witness knew that not one word of this was her own; that the whole of it was put in her mouth and extorted from her by her father."

The Court abstains from making any comment upon this evidence of Mr. Goff, for a reason already suggested. But, previous to finally dismissing this part of the case, some observations may still be proper on such of the exhibits, annexed to the allegation of the residuary legatees, as purport to be letters from the father; those hitherto observed upon purporting only to be letters from the child.

It may be remembered that the Court has already said of these, generally, upon what their ultimate effect upon the question at issue really depends (vide page 99, ante). It depends not, I repeat, upon their furnishing proofs, how ample soever, that the writer was a person capable of reasoning correctly, and deducing right conclusions —it depends on the premises assumed by the writer, on which to found his reasonings, and from which to de-[170]-duce his conclusions. Of what nature are these premises? Do they argue him "sui compos" in possession of the "mens sana," on the one hand; or, on the other, are they such as infer him a person of deranged intellect? That is the true question—for the rest we have heard from Mr. Lock (vide page 92, ante), and we all know that madmen may, and not unfrequently do, argue rightly enough; so that the effect of exhibits of this nature, the productions of an alleged madman, on the question of his sanity, I again say, depends, not upon the shrewdness of his inferences, as to be collected from these, but upon the soundness of his principles. If this be, however, the true test, as I take it to be, the exhibits in question, instead of inferring the deceased's sanity, tend themselves to impeach it. For I may now say, after that ample discussion which the evidence on this head has just undergone, that there is scarcely a passage in any one of these exhibits, where mention of the daughter occurs, not bottomed on a visibly disturbed and disordered imagination.

In the first place, I can hardly think that very much of this is not discoverable in the general tone and character of these exhibits; without going into particular passages. Take, for instance, the very first exhibit: what, throughout, is the general tone and character of this? It begins, "Charlotte—I write not to please you, or to satisfy the curious, busy world, but to acquit my conscience of a duty I owe to God, to you, and to myself . . . you have revolted once more from duty, obedience, and true affection —you fly in the face of heaven from the protection of a tender, kind, and too indulgent parent—a parent who has manifested [171] his love from the first dawn of your infancy." [I should say that the nature of this particular "revolt" does not appear; nor does it, indeed, appear where Miss Stott was when this letter was written. It was written, however, previous to her leaving Mrs. English's, at Hampstead; being dated the 23d of January, 1822, in the middle of which year, only, she left Mrs. English's; accordingly, it was previous to that misconduct, in consequence of which, as alleged, she actually left Mrs. English's—a circumstance which is to be kept in mind, for a reason that will presently appear. Meantime, of the modes in which this "tender, kind, and but too indulgent parent" was in the habit of "manifesting his love" to his daughter, "from her infancy," sufficient may be judged from what has been recited out of the evidence—but to proceed with the letter.] " . . . You say, in my illness, I told you that you was indifferent to me; this is an untruth which my conduct even at this moment contradicts; for if you could be indifferent to me, the kind hand of mercy would not be held out, in preference to the hand of justice, which ought rather to overtake and punish you for your crimes, your matchless crimes— . . . Can you say I have not just cause to be offended? and who is to redress me? Am I to hold out the olive branch of peace and forgiveness, to a yet hardened, and relentless sinner? Do not deceive yourself—that will not be—the feelings of a tender parent shall bend even his gray hairs to the grave, in support of his duty—his conduct is to be scrutinised before an awful judge—to that judge, he refers his cause, and he fears not of yet meeting a reward. . . . You know the base part you have acted— the numberless [172] crimes you have committed, &c. While I live, I will persevere in my plan and observe consistency," &c. Now, I really think that a letter so written, from such a father to such a child, scarcely fourteen years old, even in the general style of it, which may readily be conceived from the above extracts, savours of delusion: and the same or a similar observation applies, more or less, to nearly every exhibit, the production of the deceased, on the subject of his daughter; or where mention, I might almost say, of the very name of Miss Stott occurs.

Of the true inference furnished, by specific passages of these exhibits, on the question of the deceased's sanity or insanity, one instance must suffice.

The exhibit, No. 24, annexed to the allegation of the residuary legatees, is in the shape of a letter, addressed by the deceased to Mrs. Desormeaux, dated on the 10th of March, 1803. It appears by the letter itself that Miss Stott was then resident at Mr. Goff's—and it also should seem, from this, that the writer was at that time upon distant, and by no means upon familiar, terms with the party written to. It is addressed, in fact, as to an almost total stranger, being in these words:

"Mr. Stott has never failed to make constant inquiries after Mrs. Desormeaux; is extremely happy to hear, through the medium of Mr. Titford, that her health is so well established—it is to be hoped that her temporal (as there can be no doubt that her eternal) peace of mind bears an equal proportion; may each be continued as long as she desires to be useful on earth—the like good will and good wishes are [173] extended to her family and connexions throughout. Mr. S. would not have broke silence, which has been deemed necessary, had he not learned that Mrs. D. expressed a satisfaction on her hearing where Miss Stott is placed, and wishing that her education may be carried on under proper masters, appointed to attend her, in her present retirement, for that purpose. Mr. S. is thoroughly convinced of the genuine principle, and goodness of disposition, in Mrs. D., for which he ever has, and always will retain, a proper sense of acknowledgment.

"Miss Stott being dismissed from the school at Hampstead, at which place it is to be lamented that her vicious habit had gained strength equal to her years, Mr. S. placed her for the time being at Mrs. Dutton's farm-house in the country, and advertised for a situation. He was answered by nearly two hundred applications.

"This caused him to travel above one thousand miles round the metropolis, without gaining the wished-for asylum. The circumstance of expense was and is the least consideration; for her board only he now pays fifty guineas.

"To promote the establishment of her mind in a good, solid, and virtuous education, many things must be considered. First, there must be a disposition to learn; a want of this disposition is so manifest she will not take a book of any kind in her hand to study; and she declares to Mr. Goff that no force shall prevail to oblige her. Secondly, where can masters be found, supposing she had a proper disposition, whose integrity may be such as to resist temptation? Mr. Goff asserts he is obliged fre-[174]-quently to exert himself to preserve a proper distance; and that she is not fit to be placed in any house where a man resides. She asks for masters, saying she cannot learn without; no doubt they might be useful; but might not the trial be attended with evil instead of good? She works at her needle, will do any thing in the house, even to drudgery; but because the refinement of her excellent mind is held out as a qualification to render her life valuable to herself, her father, and to society; Mr. S. says, because it is so suggested and pressed home, she is determined it shall not be so: such is the perverseness of human nature.

"Mr. S. would be happy to receive Mrs. D.'s sentiments on this most unfortunate subject, in writing, whenever she has a disposition and leisure to oblige him therewith: in the multitude of counsellors there is much wisdom. Mr. S. prays fervently for divine direction, and uses his best endeavours to submit himself patiently; waiting for the great purpose which he is convinced his Heavenly Father has herein in view.

"Mr. S. sends Mrs. D. the result of the proceedings of the Society for bettering the Condition of the Poor; should there be any wanting in her set, he begs to be acquainted therewith that the same may be rendered complete.

"10th March, 1803. Hart-street."

The above is the letter, or exhibit, itself. Now to the evidence of Mr. Goff, who, it will be seen, is [175] vouched as the deceased's informant to no insignificant part of the grave charges which he, the deceased, is preferring in this letter against his only child—preferring them, too, for no earthly reason, that I can conceive, to a mere stranger, were the charges themselves ever so true. But to the evidence of Mr. Goff as to the truth of these; on the daughter's plea, formally denying them to be true.

Of the conduct, generally, of Miss Stott, during her residence in his family, according to the opinion of this witness, enough has already appeared. He deposes, in a word, speaking of her conduct chiefly during that period, that she uniformly behaved with the greatest decorum and propriety—that "her general temper was very good—her principles, habits, and conduct strictly moral and virtuous;" in short, that, "if heaven had blessed him with a daughter, he could only have wished her to resemble Miss Stott." But the part of his evidence to which I now more particularly refer, is that which relates to the representations which he is vouched, in this letter to Mrs. Desormeaux, to have actually made to the deceased, on the subject of Miss Stott's aversion to study, and precocious sexual propensities, whilst so resident in his family. What he deposes on this head is as follows:—

"The witness never," he says "stated to the deceased, or to any person, that Miss Stott had declared, either to him or to others, that no force should prevail with her to take a book in her hand to study; or any thing to that or the like effect. The witness never did, on any occasion whatever, assert to the deceased, or to any other person, that he was obliged frequently, or ever, to exert himself to keep Miss [176] Stott at a distance; or, that she was unfit to be placed in a house where a man resided; or any thing to that effect—the witness never said any thing of the kind—what the deceased wrote on that head, if he did so write, in the letter referred to, is false; the deceased frequently attempted to make the witness say that such was the fact, but the witness never did—if he had so said, it would have been a gross calumny against her. The witness never saw any thing approaching to indelicacy, or indecorum, in her conduct or conversation; or the slightest departure from what was perfectly correct, and becoming a modest and virtuous young woman."

Such is Mr. Goff's evidence upon the subject of this letter, of which it is impossible to doubt the truth; not only from there being nothing whatever in the cause to impeach his credibility; but, still more, from the circumstance of his evidence, on this particular head, precisely according with his whole evidence to the conduct and character of Miss Stott; and from this, again, as precisely according with that of a host of witnesses, deposing in this cause, on the same subject, to the very same effect. Accordingly, I am bound to conclude that the charges in question made by the deceased in this letter to Mrs. Desormeaux, as, very principally, on Mr. Goff's authority, are charges that, at least, have no such foundation. And I add, upon all the evidence, that they are charges which have no foundation whatever in fact of any description.

Having, however, no foundation in fact, to what can the Court possibly ascribe them but to that gross delusion, on the subject of his child, which prompted this unhappy man, among other fancied enormities laid to [177] her charge, to heap upon her, almost in her infancy, aspersions of this odious nature in particular; as plainly results from the testimony of several of the witnesses; of the late Bishop of Durham, and of Wright especially. What the Bishop of Durham says, or rather hints, upon this head, has appeared already (vide p. 132, ante); Wright's evidence is both couched in plainer language, and is, itself, more remarkable. This Wright, I should say (Hannah Wright, for there are two witnesses of this surname, the other being named Martha), was staying with the deceased for several months, in the beginning of 1806, nominally as his housekeeper. But it is in evidence that she received nothing for her services; and, as she expresses it, "was glad to get away" from the deceased; so that I can scarcely regard her as a common domestic. At the time of her examination she describes herself as living in her own house, on her own property, which, she says, is more than adequate to her support. Much of this witness's evidence as to the deceased's general notions respecting, and treatment of, his daughter, the Court has already recited; it forbears to recite that part of it more especially applicable to his notions respecting his daughter, in these particulars; being anxious, of course, to give as little publicity as may be to matter of this description. In the language of the witness they were "filthy, indecent, and not fit to be uttered," though, she concludes (an observation not the less forcible, from the witness's homely expression of it), "Miss Stott was as different a girl as possible, in these respects, from what her father accused her of being."

[178] It being clear, then, I repeat, that the gross imputations sought to be fixed on Miss Stott by the deceased, in this letter to Mrs. Desormeaux, have no foundation in fact; the Court, in my judgment, has no choice but to ascribe them purely to delusion; to treat them as the mere fictions of a disordered imagination; and to regard them (and, by consequence, the letter itself which records them) as evidence of such—unless, indeed, the Court were to resort to [the only other alternative that I see, that of] supposing that the deceased wrote all this to Mrs. Desormeaux, perfectly conscious, at the same time, that Goff not only affirmed nothing of the sort, but the very contrary; that the passages in question are deliberate assertions of so many wilful falsehoods on his part; invented by the deceased for the sole purpose of blasting and calumniating (and this to an almost stranger, and for no conceivable reason) the conduct and character, in so sensible a particular, of a youthful female, of extraordinary hope and promise; and that youthful female his (the asperser's) only child. But, not to insist on the utter extravagance of such a supposition on the face of it, I must say that the case itself supposed would argue, in the deceased, a peculiar venom and malignity, almost, I think, good in proof of insanity, of themselves.

The Court has now, certainly not without pain to itself, travelled through the whole of the evidence to this principal part of the case before it. In stating, and commenting, as it went along, upon that evidence, the Court's impression as to its bearing upon the true question at issue in the cause has, by a sort of necessity, been so fully disclosed, incidentally, that little upon this head remains to be said. To state, however, that im-[179]-pression in form, it is, that the deceased in this cause is fully proved, generally speaking, to have been in a state of delusion, throughout, as to his child's conduct and character, almost from her earliest infancy: and that the attempt on the part of the residuary legatees to account for the extraordinary treatment, which the child is proved to have uniformly experienced, at the hands of the father—namely, by imputing this to gross misconduct in the child, operating upon a peculiar state of feelings and opinions (short of insanity) in the father—has wholly failed. Admit, for argument's sake, that the evidence is really such as to convict the daughter of some sullenness and perverseness of temper; of some unwillingness or inaptitude to profit by the pains bestowed upon her education—of some substantive facts even of youthful indiscretion. It would be impossible to contend that the evidence does any more than this; taking every thing deposed to, on this head, by the witnesses for the nephews, to be true, in its full extent; and putting every thing said by the witnesses for the daughter, in opposition, absolutely out of the case. [At the same time, I must here observe, by the way, that in really taking all this evidence as against the daughter to be true, in its full extent, I should be doing a piece of extreme injustice; even viewing that evidence, per se, and not as contrasted with any adverse testimony. On the contrary, I am of opinion that it is to be taken as true at all, only with many grains of allowance, for several reasons. For instance, Mrs. Desormeaux, whose representations of Miss Stott's conduct and character are, upon the whole, possibly rather less favourable than those of any other witness, with how many grains of allowance her representations, on this [180] head, are to be taken as true, will appear from this consideration. She, Mrs. Desormeaux, fully believed the deceased all along to have been, not only a very clever and a very religious man; but to have been a perfectly sane man, at all times, and in all respects. She still believes him to have been all this; and she has so sworn in her deposition. This witness's opinions, then, in respect to the daughter, I am bound, in common candour, to take as formed, or coloured to a great extent, from the father's representations. I am bound, I think, to approach her evidence on this head, under this impression, in order to arrive at the true effect of it. And the observation applies, in substance, to the testimony of every witness who has deposed, unfavourably, of the daughter's principles and habits; but to quit this digression.] Admitting then, I repeat, for argument sake, the evidence really to convict the daughter of some sullenness and perverseness; some indocility; some youthful levities or indiscretions; still, even this, possibly, might little advance or relieve the case sought to be made out by the residuary legatees. In most cases of delusion the delusion founds itself, originally, on some slight circumstance, the magnifying of which, beyond all reasonable bounds, is nearly or quite as good in proof of its being a delusion as the taking up some absurd prejudice, which is utterly unfounded, or that rests upon no basis. If one whose eyesight is slightly affected conceives, and in spite of all argument persists in, and acts under, a conception that he is totally blind; this, to my mind, is as perfectly a delusion on the part of that one as if nothing at all were the matter with his eyes. If another, the proprietor of a large domain, on the loss [181] of a comparatively small portion, is convinced to himself that he has been deprived of the whole of it—if he persists in that conviction, in spite both of argument and of evidence to the contrary—not only so—if he suffers that conviction to poison and preclude his enjoyment of the ample portion that still remains to him, during and throughout all the rest of his life, this, in my judgment, is as essentially a delusion on the part of that other as if he were still in possession of every acre of his original estate. So, if the parent of a child really blameable to a certain extent, in some particulars, takes occasion from this to fancy her a "fiend, a monster, an incarnate devil;" if, moreover, he be found through his whole life acting under and upon that conception—[to the destruction both of his own and of his child's peace and happiness; and to the actual horror of every one really acquainted with the excesses into which that fancy has betrayed him; which is this case]—such a parent is, I should say, as much in a state of morbid delusion, and so of insanity, in regard to that child, as if the child's conduct were wholly irreproachable. Hence, a finding of the daughter guilty, to the utmost arguable extent, upon this evidence would still leave the effect of the whole evidence upon the question of the deceased's sanity pretty much what, in my judgment, it actually is. But it is only for mere argument's sake that any thing of the sort supposed can be admitted: there is nothing whatever in the evidence to found it. On the contrary, it is my judgment, and Mrs. Dew, attacked as she has been, has a right to the benefit of my judgment in this behalf, that she has come out of that fiery ordeal to which she has been subjected in the course of this inquiry untouched [182] and untainted. And viewing the whole evidence, as to this part of the case, I am bound to say that even if the case rested here, I should have no difficulty in pronouncing that the deceased's whole conduct towards and in respect to his daughter, as it stands in the evidence, is irreconcileable with the notion of his having been of sound mind in this particular; making every allowance for any peculiar state of feelings and opinions whatever (short of insanity) by which the deceased may have been actuated—and even for any whatever degree of irritation which the daughter's misconduct (admitting it proved to the full arguable extent) can be reasonably held capable of producing upon a mind so constituted.

II. The Court has now arrived at that other, or second, general head, under which it proposed (see page 104, ante) to consider this whole evidence: and, since the evidence on the first of these has been so fully discussed, this, on the other, will not necessarily detain the Court at any considerable length.

Persons partially insane are usually, not to say always, in a high degree eccentric in their general conduct. Hence it is that great general eccentricity, as the common coincident, being proved, this assists materially in the proof of partial insanity, where partial insanity is suspected to exist. For as persons actually insane in some particulars are commonly highly eccentric in many or most; so persons highly eccentric in many or most particulars are, at least not unfrequently, actually insane in some. People who dwell on the confines of two empires are likely enough to be found in, sometimes the one, and sometimes the other—and they are [183] the more likely to be so found when the line of demarcation between the two is under an indefinite and uncertain something, a sort of mist, which renders a transition from the one to the other side of it easy and almost imperceptible—which I apprehend to be always the case in respect of that actual (though invisible) line of demarcation (for some such there must needs be) between mere eccentricity, situate on the one side, and downright insanity, being and lying upon the other: in short, it is next to impossible in such a case to be constantly touching upon the line without ever going beyond it. Taking, then, the other evidence in the cause, as to the deceased's conduct and character—that, I mean, as to his conduct and character in points with which the daughter is unconnected, to the evidence upon which last alone the Court's view has hitherto been confined, is that such, let me ask (for the question may not inconveniently be put in this shape), as to assist in, or present any obstacle to, the proof of that partial insanity (that insanity quoad hanc, as to her, the daughter in particular), the setting up of which constitutes her principal case? A brief consideration of this will, I think, justify the conclusion at which the Court is disposed to arrive, that this other evidence is, not only such as materially to assist in the proof of the daughter's principal case, but that it is even sufficient to sustain her secondary or subordinate case, so to call it (if that were necessary), namely, that the deceased was a person non compos mentis, as to parts of his conduct, in matters with which she, the daughter, had no sort of connection. Whether, indeed, such other instances of mental unsoundness, supposing this evidence, in the judgment of the Court, to furnish any, would be of avail to [184] defeat the operation of this identical will, is another question, and one with which the Court has no immediate concern; though it will endeavour to state its sense of this, generally speaking, by implication at least in the sequel; when it considers the effect of the whole evidence on the point at final issue in the cause; the validity, namely, or the invalidity in law of this particular will. But first to the evidence, briefly, as to certain parts of his conduct, quite irrespective of the daughter, in which the deceased is pleaded by the daughter to have been, and to have conducted himself as, a person of unsound mind; and so as to subject himself to an actual charge of insanity, from those who were eye witnesses to his conduct in such particulars.

It is pleaded, on the daughter's part, going back, this, to a period immediately subsequent to her own birth, that her mother was delivered of her in the month of November, 1788; a few days only after which the deceased ordered that she should be taken from her bed and washed from head to foot with cold water—that the nurse and others about her remonstrated; but, at length, reluctantly obeyed on the deceased peremptorily insisting that such his orders should be carried into effect—and that the consequence (as might have been expected) was, that under and by reason of such extraordinary treatment, the mother became very ill, and died in a week or ten days. The counter-plea, on the part of the nephews, is a denial of the fact pleaded, and an averment that the mother's death was occasioned by a severe cold and inflammatory fever, produced by her having sat up for a considerable time to have her hair dressed; of which it is pleaded that she had a great quantity. Now to the proofs on both sides:

[185] In proof of her averments on this head the daughter has produced the witness, Phœbe Wall, to whose evidence upon another head the Court has already adverted. Her statement as to this, and to the general conduct of the deceased to this his (first) wife (previously also pleaded, on the daughter's part, in the same, the second, article of her first allegation, to have been extremely harsh and cruel, in its general complexion) is as follows:—

Wall (who has been represented in the argument as a mere girl, but who proves, by a reference to dates, to have been a young woman of eighteen at the period of Miss Stott's birth) deposes on this article, "That she first knew the deceased in this cause about forty years ago, when she was very young" (probably, at this commencement of her acquaintance with him, about fourteen years old)—"she at that time was an attendant upon Mrs. Wellings, who was companion to the dowager Lady Clive, then resident at Englefield in Berkshire. He had married his first wife, Mary Simpson, some time before, but privately; for their marriage was not known." [The circumstances, by the way, attending the consummation of this marriage, as detailed by the witness, Mr. Sheen, from the deceased's own communication, are pretty extraordinary; though I forbear to detail them for a reason that may easily be comprehended—but to return to Wall's evidence.] She says, in substance, though in reciting her evidence I do it principally in her own words, that "her personal knowledge of the deceased was confined to those visits which he was in the habit of paying to his wife at Lady Clive's, about three times a year, of three or four days' continuance each, more [186] or less." She says, "While Mr. Stott was on those visits to his wife, as aforesaid, she saw them frequently together, and saw a good deal of his behaviour to his wife: they were together in the upper servants', the housekeeper's, and the steward's rooms; both at Englefield and at Kelvedon in Essex; where Lady Clive removed a few months before Mrs. Stott's confinement. The witness remembers well Mrs. Stott was in tears almost the whole time that her husband was with her—from the time his letter was received, to say he was coming, her life was wretched: his conduct to her was most unfeeling and cruel—so perverse and extraordinary that the witness always believed him to be deranged—and the witness was confirmed in her belief, by what others, her elders, also believed in this respect. Mr. Martin, the very respectable house-steward of Lady Clive and others, always said of him" (a prediction, we have seen, in effect verified in the result) "that 'he would die in a mad-house.' Mrs. Stott was a fine-grown, elegant woman; and of such a very sweet disposition that everybody loved her. Mr. Stott's conduct to her was exceedingly harsh; continually tormenting her, and delighting, as it seemed, to make her miserable—quarrelling with her about the most trifling matters, and without any cause. He would find occasion to quarrel with her if any little part of her dress was not put on to please him—she would alter it any way he liked—she would do anything to please him, but could never succeed. He would quarrel with her—she answered him meekly and prettily; but the more submissive she was the more he was aggravated; and he put him-[187]-self in such passions as to be quite ungovernable. His conduct was very strange about the letters which his wife wrote to him. She saw Mrs. Stott, on more than one such occasion, when she had received a cruel letter from the deceased, returning all the letters which she had written to him (on one occasion more than twenty, and another parcel on a subsequent occasion), ordering her to write them all over again, because of some little faults which he pointed out; and because the writing was not good enough for him." [Up to this point the evidence of Wall is confirmed by that of a most respectable witness, Mrs. Wellings, her (Wall's) more immediate mistress at Lady Clive's—whose evidence to the temper and conduct of Mrs. Stott, and to her sufferings under, and in consequence of, her husband's unmerited harsh treatment of her is precisely in substance accordant with that of Wall. But to proceed with Wall's evidence.] "The deceased frequently," she says, "made his wife stand in his presence; even when she was pregnant, and her legs swelled so, that it was painful to her to stand: he would make her stand before him, though she scarcely could, and trembled all the while; indeed she trembled at the very sight of him; she was afraid at times of her life; and the witness remembers her even requesting that some of the servants would sleep in the next room to them to be ready to save her; and they did so. His conduct, in all these particulars," she, the witness, says, "could only be ascribed to derangement; and that was the opinion of every one in Lady Clive's family, where he was frequently called or spoken of as 'Mad Stott.'" The above is Wall's statement to this part of the case [188] generally; her account of Mrs. Dew's birth, and what ensued upon it, is, with some curtailment, in the following words:—

"Mrs. Stott was delivered of her daughter, the present Mrs. Dew, at a cottage situate a short distance from Lady Clive's. Mr. Martin, the house-steward, and his wife went immediately to the cottage, and took the witness with them. As soon almost as they arrived, and while below stairs, Mr. Stott brought down the infant, quite naked" (I omit a circumstance as to his own personal appearance on the occasion), "exclaiming, that 'he had done his part.'" [Mr. Stott, it will be recollected, was no medical practitioner at this time, or ought to have been present at, much less to have interfered in, his wife's actual delivery.] "It shocked the witness and others," she says, "to see his conduct; and he boasted of what he had done, and talked and behaved in such a way as to make the witness, and Mr. and Mrs. Martin (who are both dead) consider him deranged at the time. A few days after," she says, "she, the witness, having gone alone to the cottage to see Mrs. Stott, found her just put to bed again, after having been washed in cold water—the witness did not see it done—but she saw the water, and the cloths being then put away. Mrs. Stott told the witness what had been done to her—that Mr. Stott had had her out of bed, and washed her; and that she was afraid she was injured—that she had entreated his forbearance, but to no purpose. On the witness asking the nurse 'why she permitted it,' her answer, she well remembers, was, 'Lord, madam, I was so frightened at the man.'" Mr. Boodle, the surgeon who had [189] delivered her [who had partly delivered her, that must mean; for the circumstance in his appearance, which I have omitted, proves that the deceased himself must have also taken an active part in this], "came in about an hour, and was very angry with the nurse. The nurse, who was a poor trembling woman, excused herself by saying that she was 'so frightened at Mr. Stott.' Mr. Boodle expressed his fears that her husband had killed her. She swelled soon after; and, in a few days died—from cold," says the witness, "which she had taken from that washing, as she, the witness, feels very confident."

Such is Wall's evidence to the conduct of the deceased in this particular—and also to the impression made, at that time, on those who witnessed the deceased's treatment of this, his first, wife, the mother of the present plaintiff, generally; in which she is confirmed to a great extent, as already said, by Mrs. Wellings.

On the nephews' counter plea, contained in the fourth article of their allegation, responsive to that first given in on the part of Mrs. Dew, two witnesses have been produced and examined; Mrs. Desormeaux and Mr. Paternoster.

Mrs. Desormeaux says that she knows nothing of the deceased's treatment of his first wife, whom she never saw; having only become acquainted with the deceased many years after her death: but the deceased was in the habit of speaking of her in terms of the warmest affection and attachment; and appeared to have felt the loss of her severely; and he always kept a miniature of her hanging over his parlour mantle-piece. "He has," she says, "when speaking of her [190] death to the witness, told her that it was occasioned by a violent cold and inflammation, caught during her confinement, by sitting up a long time to have her hair dressed, as she wore her hair very long."

The evidence of Mr. Paternoster on this fourth article of the nephews' allegation is much to the same effect as that of Mrs. Desormeaux. He, too, never saw the first Mrs. Stott—but judges that the deceased was an affectionate husband to her, from the tenor of his own declarations in that respect. "He remembers her death," he says—"that it took place about a twelvemonth after he became acquainted with the deceased; and that she died in child-bed." He goes on to say that "he perfectly recollects the circumstance of the deceased being accused, at the time of his said wife's death, of great want of judgment in some plan which he was said to have recommended for her—he believes it was her washing in cold water soon after her confinement—and that it occasioned a chill which produced inflammation, and terminated fatally; but the deceased, who was aware of the report as well as the witness, positively contradicted it; and said that the fault, if there was any, was her own—for that she would have her hair combed and dressed; and that the length of time occupied by this gave her the cold of which, in the end, she died."

Now so far is the testimony of these witnesses from inducing the Court to suspect (in substance) the truth of Wall's narrative that it even furnishes, I think, a material confirmation of it. It results, from the testimony of the last of the two, Mr. Paternoster, that a charge of this nature (an utterly unfounded charge, I can scarcely suppose) was, at the time, preferred [191] against the deceased. And that the deceased should have had art and cunning enough, in his own vindication, to Paternoster, and others probably, to invent this story of the "hair dressing," by way of meeting the charge so preferred, is quite consistent, both with the fact itself, as deposed to by Wall, and with Wall's suggestion (in which the Court is quite disposed to go with her), that the conduct of the deceased in relation to that fact could only be founded in (and consequently is evidence, even at that time, of) a disordered imagination in the deceased. And the story being once invented, the deceased, of course, would persist in it to his friend Mrs. Desormeaux. In short, when I balance the two stories in point of probability, that of Wall, looking to all the evidence in the cause, is so infinitely more probable, than that the mild, persecuted creature that the first Mrs. Stott is described to have been should pertinaciously have insisted (in spite, I must presume, of argument and entreaty to the contrary) on sitting up in bed at the peril of her life, a few days only after her delivery, to "have her hair dressed," which is the deceased's version (and, after all, is only the deceased's version of the story, and so no contradiction in substance of Wall's)—that I have no scruple whatever in subscribing to the substantial correctness of Wall's narrative; and of making the same unfavourable inference to the deceased's sanity at that time made by Wall, herself, and by others, as she deposes, eye-witnesses of the deceased's actual conduct in respect of the matter narrated.

It can never be expected that the Court should travel with this minuteness of detail through the several similar transactions (similar, I mean, in their bearing, in [192] my judgment, on the question of the deceased's sanity) that disclose themselves in the course of this bulky evidence. Such, for instance, as the whole transaction between the deceased and Mr. Willatts—whom, though a perfect stranger, the deceased, in the year 1813, accosts, as he is coming out of St. John's chapel, in Bedford Row, and invites to accompany him home—to whom, learning that he is under difficulties, he immediately advances 4500l.: and in the end 12,000l., at first without any security—and whom he insists at times on living with him, declaring that he will make him his heir, and leave him all his property, &c., for the best part of two years; when this strange connection between the deceased and Willatts seems to have ended, almost as unaccountably on the deceased's part as it began. But in satisfying itself with this general reference only to the whole transaction between the deceased and Mr. Willatts; and in omitting, altogether, the evidence to some other similar transactions (as explained above) detailed in the evidence; the Court must be understood as doing this for brevity's sake only—the true inference to be deduced on the question of the deceased's sanity, from each and every of them, being in its judgment that which the Court has already deduced from the whole conduct of the deceased, as spoken to by the witnesses towards his wife, the first Mrs. Stott. There are still, however, some few particulars so important in this respect as to require being, at least briefly, adverted to—and, however it may be said of them that they are unsatisfactory, on a question of this nature, taken separately; still it can never be denied that, taken collectively, they are forcible to, or even conclusive of, the question. [193] The particulars to which I principally allude are those which appear in the evidence, on this part of the case, to the deceased's religious notions, viewed in connexion with his (surely in parts of it) most irreligious and profane conduct—and to his extravagant and I must say insane fancies (for I know not what else to term them) about electricity.

(I.) The deceased is pleaded in particular by the nephews, as already said, to have been imbued with peculiar, but at the same time highly rigid, notions on religious subjects: and certainly, so far at least as respects a mere form of godliness and external observances, their allegations on this head are borne out by several of the witnesses; as by the witness Mrs. Desormeaux, by her daughter, and by some others who have been examined on this part of the nephews' plea—who also indeed fully believed, no doubt, both that the deceased's views on the subject of religion were correct, and that his practice corresponded with his principles and professions in this particular, as they have severally deposed. And several of Mrs. Dew's witnesses, as Mrs. Duplay, Goff, and others admit, that the deceased was strict in religious ordinances (not, indeed, in their view of him in his religious duties)—that he was urgent with others to attend to these—and that he was fond of talking of religion, and of expressing himself in figurative, scriptural language. But how wild, how irrational, how palpably insane on this whole subject, as well the notions as the actual conduct of the deceased really were, clearly results, I think, from the evidence taken on the part of Mrs. Dew—evidence of which it is impossible to suspect the truth, from the numerous witnesses who furnish it, though [194] each singly credible; and from those numerous witnesses all deposing, without any semblance of concert, in perfect consistency.

Take, for instance, Hannah Wright's evidence connected with this subject. "The deceased," she says, in her evidence in chief, "used to expound the scriptures in the evening to his servants, and then to pray ex-tempore. This in the front room, up one pair of stairs. And the witness has heard people in the street stopping underneath, and talking and laughing about it, while he raved on, his manner was so violent. He prayed for an hour and a half or more at a time, and made such a noise that the witness could not stand it, and has been obliged to get up and leave the room. The deceased used to say that 'it was his prayers that had such an effect on her, that she was unable to bear them;' which, she says, was true, but not in his sense. He used to speak of his power in prayer as being such as could bring down the very angels among them; with more of the same sort. On one occasion he compelled his housemaid and foot boy, a poor ignorant lad, so to pray, ex-tempore. He used to particularise his servants in his prayers; praying for the witness, by name, as a poor lost creature—and once for the boy, Will, whom he told the Almighty could not clean shoes, and sweep the door, as he ought; praying to God to instruct him in such particulars; and give him courage to go through his work, &c. &c." Upon interrogatories she deposes that "the deceased did express himself with fervour on religious subjects; and was particular in attending, in his way, very strictly, to religious duties and exercises, and he urged others to do the same: [195] but it was in his own peculiar way—swearing shockingly [by turns], and talking [at times] in the most filthy and indecent manner." The witness had previously deposed that the deceased "was in the habit of uttering, at times, all manner of oaths, and of talking all manner of stuff about girls and so on, not fit to be repeated, and of calling the witness a 'sanctified bitch' for objecting to it." I have already spoken to the general respectability of this witness, and of the truth of her evidence, confirmed as it is, in most particulars, by that of many others, there can be no doubt. She concludes by stating her impression that "the deceased, if he was not a madman, which she fully believes him to have been, was the most wicked of men."

The evidence of all the other servants (of whom six have been examined) who lived with the deceased at different times for different periods precisely accords with this of Hannah Wright. Take, for instance, that of Martha Wright, who is described in the evidence as an elderly female, "rather a superior person in her station" (a character which she seems to have merited), what does she say on this head? She says "it was chiefly at family prayer that the deceased was in the habit of abusing his daughter; calling her a depraved wretch, &c., and going on in that way till he worked himself into passions, which it was frightful to behold—he would on such occasions shake his fist at her, stamp with his foot, and strike the table violently, while he was pouring forth his abuse of her. She has heard him damn his daughter, with the Bible before him. He did express himself at times with warmth and fervour on religious subjects; but in a way so strange; [196] wandering from one subject to another; going from comment on scripture to what was quite nonsense; and all mixed up with such enthusiasm and strange matter as quite to bewilder the witness. He prayed always ex-tempore; at times so loud and vehement as no doubt to attract attention in the street, though she recollects no actual instance of this. With all this, he swore repeatedly both at his daughter and at others."

Again, on this subject of his swearing the witness Barnard deposes that "he has heard the deceased, in particular when he had the Bible before him, which he was attempting to expound, utter oath upon oath. He would read a passage and then ask Martha (Wright) what she thought of it. Martha would answer well enough," the witness says, "in his judgment: but if the deceased thought otherwise, he would fly into a passion, knock the book about and swear at her; and he turned her out of the room on one such occasion." On the subject of his prayers he says "he prayed ex-tempore, and with great violence and singularity—it could not be called prayer; the witness and his fellow servants have been on their knees for as much as two hours together, while the deceased has been rambling and raving in a manner which," the witness says, "he used to consider as blasphemous."

The depositions of some others, as of Ward, Madden, and of Nicholson, are only a repetition of the same thing in other words; but the evidence of Mr. Willatts may still be referred to as strictly confirmatory of what those others, being all severally servants of the deceased, have said on this head. He says, "Under [197] any irritation, though not in his common language, the deceased was in the habit of swearing; and his oaths then were, like his other language and manner, vehement and violent. On one occasion the deceased desired to have his boots; they were brought him by his servant boy, a lad about fourteen; the deceased looked at them and said, 'Take them away again;' the boy did so, and was followed by the deceased down stairs, where the witness presently heard him flogging the boy unmercifully. The cries of the boy were distressing, but the witness was afraid to interfere: as the deceased was more than his match, and his passion at the time was ungovernable. In the evening, at family prayer, which was ex-tempore, as usual, a special petition was introduced, that 'God would change the boy's heart (naming him), and teach him to black boots better.' It was the deceased's practice," continues the witness, "to expound a portion of the scriptures to his servants every evening; or rather to attempt it, as nothing could be more unintelligible and absurd than his expositions—then he always prayed ex-tempore; and in prayer, or what he substituted for prayer, he was loud and vehement and extravagant. His prayers were mere rhapsody, but he had a notion that they were excellent; and frequently expressed his astonishment at their having no greater effect on the witness and others. He had a maid servant, Martha (Wright), whom he called upon to pray at times—on such occasions he himself read a chapter in the Bible, and then she began to pray; stopping, however, in the middle of sentences and praying in such a manner as to turn the whole into mockery. [198] On refusing, which she sometimes did, the deceased would fly into a passion, and after upbraiding and swearing at her, pray himself."

On this head may also briefly be referred to the evidence of a woman named Burrows. Burrows was in attendance on the deceased in 1810 with her daughter, whom she took to him to be electrified for the palsy. Observing to the deceased on one such occasion that her husband, who was afflicted with asthma, was very poorly; the deceased told her he would die, but added, "Come up stairs with me and I'll pray for him." The deceased accordingly took her up stairs, and gave her a hassock to kneel on: and then, kneeling himself, made a prayer for her husband. The witness forgets the words, but says that the deceased, she remembers, was "very loud and boisterous, and made a deal of noise; and that she did not consider that there was any devotion in his prayers." On returning down stairs, as the servant opened the door the deceased observed, "Mrs. Burrows, that damn'd fellow of mine is going away;" and asked her if she could recommend him a servant: the witness was shocked, she says, to hear an oath from a man's lips who had just been praying as the deceased had. On another occasion of the witness remarking to the deceased that "Mr. Wilson had given them a fine lecture on the preceding (Sunday) evening," the deceased assented, adding (with reference, I presume, to that lecture), "Yes, I could get no rest all night [I suppose for thinking of the lecture]: the devil and I were wrestling all night; but, damn him, I conquered him at last." "Long ago as it is," says the witness, "she remembers it well."

[199] As connected with this subject may also briefly be adverted to, in this place, what appears in the evidence in respect of those high notions which the deceased constantly entertained of the propriety, in all particulars, of his own conduct; and of the immaculate purity and perfection of his own character. [The Court is not here speaking of his notions of this sort with regard to his treatment of his daughter—as rather belonging to (and partly, indeed, spoken of under) another head. Of these, however, the Court may again observe by the way on the utter absurdity—finding the deceased, as it does, after, and in the midst even of, conduct towards the daughter, such as that already described, uniformly representing himself as the tenderest and most indulgent of fathers, constantly and vehemently protesting to all persons, and upon all occasions, that "he had never harboured an unkind thought towards her"—"never had spoken an unkind word to her"—and that "it was his daughter's misery and misfortune not to be sensible of the blessing and privilege which heaven had afforded her in the possession of so mild and so affectionate a parent."] But the Court is here principally referring to those extravagant ideas conceived by the deceased of his own purity and perfection generally—the more striking as viewed in contrast with those opinions of the "total and absolute depravity of human nature," &c., which he is pleaded by the nephews to have adopted, in common with other rigid Calvinistical principles. For no part of this doctrine does the deceased seem to have considered applicable in his own particular instance—quite the contrary. He, forsooth, is "perfectly good," "perfectly wise," "perfectly [200] happy;" it is impossible for him "either to think or do wrong"—the "bare idea of it is insupportable to him"—"his mind," he tells the witness, Mr. Bartlett, "is as pure as his God's, —he is perfect as the Deity."

(II.) The evidence to the deceased's extravagant and, I again say, insane notions on the subject of electricity may be more briefly disposed of. We have already seen him (page 111, ante) actually quarrelling with his friend Mr. Paternoster for laughing at his boasts of "doing more than anybody else with his electricity:" but the deceased, I take it, was far too deep to betray all his fancies on this head to Mr. Paternoster. Such, for instance, as his notion of the feasibility of delivering pregnant women by electricity—an experiment which we have it from an adverse witness, Mr. Pinhorn, that the deceased proposes to try on a baker's wife in his neighbourhood; promising to take his bread of the husband in return for his consent. But the baker not liking, it seems, as the witness (himself a medical man) expresses it, the "shocking" experiment, the deceased's theory on this head is never, that I see, reduced into actual practice—probably, however, only for want of a subject; as I collect from his coolness towards Mrs. Ottley, deposed to by that witness, for declining to furnish him with a subject in the person of one of her married daughters, then near her confinement. In conclusion on this head, it can only be requisite to refer to Mr. Bartlett's evidence on the eighteenth article of the daughter's first plea. He deposes that "the deceased, in speaking of his professional skill to him, the witness, which he was in the habit of doing, mentioned, [201] from time to time, instances of cures that he had performed; some of which were highly improbable, and others quite incredible. Among others, he said that a patient, a young woman, was once brought to him to be electrified for a muscular contraction of her arm, so serious as to render the arm perfectly useless. After electrifying her for some time, the deceased, perceiving, as he told the witness, that she had faith to be healed, commanded her to 'stretch forth her arm;' whereupon he added, 'she stretched it forth, whole even as the other.'" The deceased, the witness says, was perfectly serious and earnest in all this; and he was frequently offended with the witness for not placing implicit reliance in his account of "the unlimited power which he considered himself to possess, of curing all manner of complaints by means of electricity." This according to Mr. Bartlett; so, again, Willatts deposes that "the deceased frequently declared, and seemed to be and was, he, the witness, is confident, fully assured that in his use of electricity he was endowed with and assisted in his cures by a supernatural power." And several other witnesses depose to the same effect.

There is much more in the evidence to the deceased's conduct, in particulars (still quite irrespective of his daughter), which it is impossible, I think, to account for, but by supposing that the deceased was of unsound mind in and upon such particulars. For instance—his squabbles with draymen for riding on the shafts of their waggons; and with drovers for passing with their cattle down his street: squabbles from which it appears that the deceased was glad at times to make good his retreat as fast as, and how, he could—his [202] sallies out, with his horsewhip, upon children at play, in his neighbourhood: occasions upon which, it seems, the parties assailed would greet their assailant with shouts of "Mad Stott!" "Mad Stott!" his alternate fits of silence and loquaciousness; of elation and despondency: at times, we have seen, representing himself as not only perfectly good and wise, but "perfectly happy," proposing himself, even, as a signal instance of this—at other times "walking and moping about the house for days together, with his hands behind him, sobbing and moaning"—in short, in a state of utter dejection. Of some particular transactions, again, referable to this head, let the following be taken as a specimen. The deceased insists on liberally rewarding the witness, Mr. Bartlett (as by purchasing a benefice for him, and so on), for trouble taken, and expense incurred, by Mr. Bartlett, in relation to his daughter—and then, by way of reward, he thrusts a crown piece into his hand, which the witness thinks it safer to take than reject; the deceased's manner at the time, he says, being "actually frantic." Again—he tells the same witness that he has applied to the Lord Chancellor (with whom he pretends an interest, in consequence of some miraculous cure performed on one of his daughters) for a living for him—he sends his maid-servant, in the presence of the witness, with his (verbal) compliments to Lady Eldon, begging to know if the living is ready—["the living for Mr. Stott's friend—the living for Mr. Stott's friend"—repeating it over and over in a manner indescribable, the witness says]—and he becomes extremely indignant at Lady Eldon's returning for answer, in effect, that she knows nothing at all about "the living for Mr. Stott's friend" [203]—"never troubling his lordship on such subjects." It would be idle, however, to repeat all of this sort that occurs in the evidence; sufficient having been repeated, in my judgment, to justify the conclusion at which I arrive on this part of the evidence—being, as already said, that it not only materially assists, in proof of the daughter's principal case of insanity, quoad hanc; but that it also proves her secondary or subordinate case, so again to call it—namely, that the deceased was of unsound mind in matters, and upon subjects, with which she, the daughter, was wholly unconnected.

(III.) Was the deceased, however, sane or insane in the act, and so at the time, of making his will (vide page 84, ante)? I couple these considerations, as I am justified in doing, for this plain reason: no man can be deemed sane at the time of his doing an insane act—no man can be deemed of sound mind at the very period of doing that which, being done, argues him of unsound mind—either in reason or in law. Now the answer to this question plainly involves the point at final issue in the present cause—the validity or the contrary in law of the will here propounded. Still, in furnishing that answer, and so, in effect, in disposing of this whole case (which is all that remains to the Court (vide page 105, ante)), brevity and perspicuity are happily not so incompatible but that the one is, I think, attainable, without any sacrifice of the other.

Was the deceased then, I repeat, of sound or of unsound mind when he made and executed the will propounded in this cause? in determining which I am to remember that though the deceased is proved, in my [204] judgment, as already said, to have been insane at, and long prior to, that time (throughout nearly his whole life) in many particulars—still that he is also proved (indeed, was never denied) to have been sui juris at all times, and sane upon all ordinary subjects, and in all ordinary respects; at least until a period subsequent, by several years, to the date of this, the contested, will. Keeping all this in mind—upon the accumulated matter in evidence before the Court—have the nephews sustained their plea (vide page 84, ante), that the deceased made and executed this will, being of sound mind at the time, on the one hand—or has the daughter, on the other hand, proved her case that in the act, and so at the time, of his making this will, the deceased was of unsound mind; or, as the law best expresses it, a person "non compos mentis."

The deceased's state of mind at the time of his making his will is intimately, I think, connected with his state of mind on the subject matter of his will—understanding by this the disposal by will of his property. If the deceased were at all times of unsound mind on the subject matter of his will, he must have been of unsound mind at the time of making his will. To suppose the contrary would be to suppose the deceased both sane and insane at the same time on the same subject; a supposition, I apprehend, equally absurd in a legal (vide page 94, ante) and moral point of view. And,

Subject to these considerations, the question in the end to be determined, the point at final issue, is—not whether the deceased's insanity in certain other particulars, as proved by the daughter, should have the [205] effect of defeating a will generally of the deceased, or even this identical will—but it is, whether his insanity on the subject of his daughter, as also proved by the daughter, should have the effect of defeating, not so much any will (a will generally) of the deceased, as this identical will—and to the decision of that question I am to be understood as solely addressing myself in the following observations:—

Now, the daughter being in this case a sole next of kin, the deceased's only child, it is quite impossible, I think, to disconnect the daughter from the subject matter of his will; from the disposal by will, that is, of his property—they are subjects, in effect, identified. Hence, the deceased's insanity on the subject of his daughter, generally speaking, being proved at all times in my judgment; it follows that his insanity, at the times of making his will, is also proved in my judgment—unless the contrary is to be inferred from the will itself. But the inference furnished by the will itself (and it is for this only that I refer to the dispositive part—to the contents—of the will at all) is quite the other way. For the prominent feature of the deceased's insanity, in respect of the daughter, was aversion or antipathy to the daughter—so pleaded and so proved: and the will is a will plainly inofficious, so far as regards the daughter; being a will by which she, in effect, is disinherited—disinherited, too, in favour of parties nearly utter strangers to the deceased (for so it appears); though not remotely connected with him by blood, as being his sister's children. Therefore, it follows that, in my judgment, the deceased is proved upon the whole matter to have been insane at the time of his making this will; which was the daughter's case.

[206] At the same time, the contents of this will, to a great extent, are independent of the daughter's case, though referred to as above by the Court in aid of and by way of explaining that case. By this I mean that the contents of the will in this case are not by any means the substantive ground of the Court's judgment. For the contents of the will in this case are clearly not of a nature, substantively taken, to found a sentence pronouncing that will to be invalid. Accordingly, the Court is referring to them for no such purpose: in other words, it is neither concluding that the deceased in this cause was insane as to his daughter, because he disinherited his daughter; nor anything of the kind. But having concluded the deceased insane as to his daughter, generally speaking (a conclusion at which it has arrived by other means), what the Court has been doing is this. It has been referring, as I apprehend that it was at perfect liberty, and even bound, to refer to the contents of the will, in order, if possible, to ascertain by these whether such insanity was present to the mind of the deceased, and in actual operation, as charged by the daughter, at the time of making his will. And finding it to have been so present—finding it to have been so in operation (a)—the contents of the will plainly be-[207]-speaking all this—the conclusion is, I think, inevitable that the deceased was of unsound mind at the time when he made this will. Had the contents of the will furnished a contrary inference —had the will, so far as respects the daughter, been, in all parts of it, an officious will, the conclusion upon this head, and so upon the whole case, might have been different; the very contents of the will would in that case have inferred [208] that however partially insane (insane on the subject of his daughter) the deceased might have been, generally speaking, still that such partial insanity was not present to his mind; was not in actual operation at the time of his making the will, in which event the will might have been valid. It is clear, however, that in respect of a will not inofficious as to the daughter, no such question as the present in its whole complexion could by possibility have arisen.

(a) The actual presence and operation of this, at the making of the will, being imperceptible to the parties immediately connected with the factum of the will (the witnesses on the condidit) might be partly owing, as observed by the Court, to the following circumstance:—Mr. Bramley, the solicitor who prepared, and one of the subscribed witnesses to, the will deposed that in his several interviews with the deceased, on the subject of his will, "having understood, from various sources, that there was a disagreement between the deceased and his daughter, and knowing the deceased to be a man of peculiar temper, he avoided all needless communication on the subject of his daughter as much as he could; being determined simply to receive,

In a word, the will propounded in this cause, a will virtually disinheriting the daughter, being (plainly so to be inferred) the direct unqualified offspring of that morbid delusion, proved, I may now say without any qualification or restriction, to have been ever present to the mind of the deceased, as to the character and conduct of his daughter—being, if I may so term it, the very creature of that morbid delusion put into act and energy—I, at least, can arrive at no other conclusion than that the deceased was insane at the time of his making the will propounded in this cause; and consequently that that will itself is null and void in law.

In so concluding, the Court has only again to protest that its feelings in this case have not been suffered to bias its judgment. Had the daughter appeared even more amiable than she does—had the deceased's whole treatment of that daughter been proved even more unnatural than it is—finally, were the daughter's disinherison by the will here propounded even more total and complete than that which the will here propounded purports to effect—still in the absence of full proof that the whole of this on the part of the deceased was founded in and solely imputable to morbid delusion or insanity (present to the mind of the deceased, as [209] well generally, as at the time of his making and executing this identical will) on the subject of his daughter, and so on the subject matter of the will, the Court, however painful to its own feelings, should and would have adopted a different conclusion to that at which it actually arrives. But the whole of this conduct on the part of the deceased (the actual making and executing of this will inclusive) being, I think, fully proved to have been founded in, and solely imputable to, that morbid delusion just described—without an effectual shewing to the contrary in any intelligible sense of that phrase: under these circumstances I discharge my official duty, not consult my private wishes and feelings (though they happen to concur with this), in pronouncing, as I now do, that the will here propounded, in my judgment, is null and void; and that the party deceased in this cause, to my conviction, is dead intestate in law.

and obey, the directions of the deceased relative to her; so that in fact very little was said on that subject." And both this witness and the other subscribed witness examined in this cause, Mr. Hammond, deposed that "at the actual execution of the will the daughter was not in any way mentioned or alluded to, either by the deceased, or by any other person." Now, the deceased's infirmity chiefly consisting in delusion on the subject of his daughter, he was clearly the less likely to betray it, on the occasions in question, from that topic being studiously avoided—the vibration, if any, would, of course, be less sensible from the chord not being struck. Both the above witnesses deposed that they were utter strangers to the deceased having felt or practised any such antipathy for or conduct towards the daughter as that of which the evidence convicted him—or that they even suspected the deceased and his daughter of being on terms of any other than ordinary disagreement.

It was also observed by the Court, as a circumstance, that there was a something "sounding to folly" upon the face of the will itself—alluding, this, to the expressed reasons for the (intended) legacy to Goff, and for that to Miss Iley; the former only intelligible by reference to the latter [see note (a), page 142]. The deceased's attention was called to this by the solicitor, previous to the completion of the instrument: and a blank had been left for the very purpose of enabling him to avoid this absurdity or incongruity by slightly varying the phrase in which his reasons for the legacy (intended) to Mr. Goff were expressed. But the deceased, as deposed by Mr. Bramley, declined acceding to his suggestion upon this head—only observing in answer that "the words must remain as they were." The clause in question was then inserted verbatim from a former script—in which, however, the clause as to Miss Iley's legacy had preceded it.

[210] BRETT v. BRETT. Arches Court, Trinity Term, 4th Session, 1826.—The statute 25 Geo. II. c. 6, is limited in point of true construction to wills and codicils of real estate; though it extends in terms to all wills and codicils whatsoever. Hence, a legacy, &c., to a subscribing witness to a mere will or codicil of personalty is a good legacy, and as such recoverable at law; notwithstanding that statute.(a)—To arrive at the true meaning of any particular phrase in a statute, that particular phrase is not to be viewed detached from its context in the statute—it is to be viewed in connexion with its whole context; understanding by this, as well the "title" and "preamble," as the "purview," or enacting part, of the statute.

[Followed, Emanuel v. Constable, 1827, 3 Russ. 436.]

A decree in this cause issued on the 4th of April, 1826, calling upon Rosamond Brett—administratrix, with the will annexed, of Elizabeth Crossman, deceased, by virtue of letters of administration (with the said will annexed) thentofore granted to her by the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, as the daughter and a next of kin of the deceased (the residue of whose personal estate was undisposed of by her will)—to answer to John Brett, a legatee of the said deceased, in the sum of 250l., in a cause of "subtraction of legacy."

A proctor appeared to this decree for the party cited, alleging (on petition) that John Brett, the legatee promoting the suit, was a subscribing witness to the will—submitting that by reason of this, and of the statute 25 Geo. 2, c. 6, his legacy, being the very legacy sought to be recovered in this suit, was null and void—and praying that his party, the party cited, might be dismissed accordingly from any further observance of justice in the suit.

In objection to this prayer it was denied by the [211] proctor for the party promoting the suit that the legacy sued for was null and void by the said statute; admitting the legatee to be a subscribing witness to the will. And in support of that denial it was submitted that "the aforesaid statute was made to remove doubts that had arisen, who should be deemed legal witnesses within the intention of an act passed in the twenty-ninth year of the reign of Charles the Second, for the prevention of frauds and perjuries; and that, by the fifth section of such last-mentioned act, it is declared that such act relates to the devises and bequests of lands or tenements, devisable, either by force of the statute of wills or by that statute; or by force of the custom of Kent, or of the custom of any borough, or any other particular custom; and does not contain any enactment or declaration in respect to wills or testaments of or concerning personal estate only." Upon these grounds it was prayed that the Court would reject the prayer of the party cited; and direct or permit the suit to proceed.

There were no affidavits exhibited on either side—there being no fact or facts in dispute between the parties. The question of law as to the true construction of the statute of George the Second now, after argument, stood for the judgment of the Court.

On the part of the administratrix it was argued, as on that of the plaintiff in the case of Lees v. Summersgill (17 Vesey, p. 510), and principally on the same grounds, that a legacy to a subscribing witness to a will, though of personalty only, was void under the [212] statute of Geo. II.: and that what inference soever might be furnished from its preamble in favour of confining the operation of that statute to wills of real estate, still the words of the enacting clause were too clear and peremptory, comprehending all wills whatsoever to admit of any such limited construction—it being a known rule of interpreting acts of parliament that the preamble, though it may assist the construction of ambiguous words, cannot control a clear and express enactment. And the case of Lees and Summersgill itself was, of course, relied on, as a case in point—in which Sir William Grant, the then Master of the Rolls, had decided, upon argument, and after time taken for deliberation, that the statute extended to all wills and codicils whatsoever.

On the contrary, it was contended for the legatee, as for the defendant in the case of Lees and Summersgill, that the statute had no reference to a mere will of personal estate—its sole object clearly being devises within the Statute of Frauds. And the decision in Lees v. Summersgill was suggested (in answer to that case) to have been principally owing to misinformation, conveyed to the Master of the Rolls, as to the construction of the act, here, in Doctors' Commons—where the act was said (but erroneously) to have been "uniformly understood not to affect wills of personal estate." And in support of this part of the argument the practice here of rejecting the evidence of a subscribing witness, being also a legatee, on the score of interest, was relied on; as was also the judgment of the late Dean of the Arches, Sir William Wynne, in the case of Linton and Blackburn v. Law—a note of [213] which case (printed in the margin) (a) was read in the course of the argument to the Court; and which was maintained to be precisely in point for limiting the operation of the act to wills of real estate.

[214] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. Rosamond Brett, administratrix, with the will annexed, of Elizabeth Crossman, is cited by John Brett, [215] a legatee in the will, in a cause of "subtraction of legacy." She appears to the citation, but prays to be dismissed—insisting that the legacy is void, on the face of the will, inasmuch as the legatee is a subscribing witness. [216] The legatee in reply admits that he is a sub-

(a) Linton and Blackburn v. Law. Easter Term, 1st Session, 1798.

Isabella Berriman, widow, was the deceased: she died August, 1796, having made a will, and thereof appointed William Linton and Israel Blackburn executors. The will, which disposed of personal property only, was witnessed by two persons, one of whom was the said William Linton.

A caveat having been entered on the part of Esther Law, widow, the sister of the deceased, against probate of the said will being granted, the same was warned on behalf of the executors; and, on the first session of Michaelmas Term, 1796, probate was prayed to be granted to them jointly; and the cause proceeded until the by-day in that term; when the proctor of the said William Linton exhibited a proxy of renunciation from his party, and prayed him to be dismissed, for the purpose of becoming a witness. This was objected to by the proctor for Mrs. Law, and the Judge assigned to hear the petition of both proctors thereon.

The objection of the proctor of Mrs. Law to Linton being dismissed was as follows:—"That both the executors had been sworn to the performance of the will—that, shortly after the death of the testator, the said William Linton, as one of the executors, took upon himself the active management of the deceased's affairs, possessed himself of the whole effects, gave orders for the interment, and applied to John Henfree, an auctioneer, for the purpose of selling, by public auction, the deceased's goods; and the said John Henfree did, on the 22d November, 1796, and whilst the validity of the will was contesting, agreeable to the orders of the said William Linton, advertise in the public ledger for the sale of, and afterwards sold the same, and paid the proceeds into the hands of the said William Linton: and he, the said William Linton, among other things, afterwards paid on account of the deceased's estate, 7l. or thereabouts, to ——— Errington, for the use of ——— Connolie, the landlord of the deceased's house; and that he, the said William Linton, had also, by a proxy, dated 19th November, 1796, authorised his proctor to propound the will on his behalf, as one of the said executors—and that, on the 23d November, the will was propounded on his behalf; and a common condidit given in, and admitted accordingly." It was therefore submitted that "the said William Linton having so intermeddled, he could not, by law and practice, be at liberty to withdraw himself from the said cause for the purpose of being examined as a witness."

On the part of William Linton it was not denied that he had so intermeddled; but it was stated that "on the 7th day of September, the said William Linton attended, with the said Israel Blackburn, at Doctors' Commons, and was, through error, sworn as a joint executor, under the supposition that he was legally so appointed therein; that no caveat having at that time been entered, the said William Linton, in conjunction with the said Israel Blackburn, did incautiously, and in his own wrong, intermeddle in the goods, chattels, and credits of the said deceased; and that, on inquiring into the necessary evidence to be produced and examined on the condidit, to prove the due execution of the said will, it was discovered that the said William Linton was a subscribing witness to the said will; and thereupon the proctor of the scribing witness, but denies that his legacy is void on that score; as the will neither disposes nor purports to dispose of real property. The question before the Court is, accordingly, a mere question of law; for the parties are agreed as to the facts of the case. And the shape in which that question presents itself is this—Is the statute of Geo. II., in point of true construction, limited in its operation to wills and codicils of real estate; or does it extend to and affect all wills and codicils whatsoever.

The key to the opening of every law is the reason and spirit of the law—it is the "animus imponentis," the intention of the law-maker, expressed in the law itself, taken as a whole. Hence, to arrive at the true meaning of any particular phrase in a statute, that particular phrase is not to be viewed detached from its context in the statute: it is to be viewed in connexion with its whole context—meaning by this as well the title and preamble as the purview or enacting part of the statute. It is to the preamble more especially that we are to look for the reason or spirit of every statute; rehearsing this, as it ordinarily does, the evils sought to be remedied, or the doubts purported to be removed by the statute, and so evidencing, in the best and said William Linton, on the by-day after Michaelmas Term, 1796, prayed him, the said William Linton, to be dismissed from this suit, in order to his becoming a witness; submitting that the appointment of the said William Linton to be an executor to the said will, was and is null and void, to all intents and purposes, in law, by reason that he is a subscribing witness thereto. And the said proctor then declared that he proceeded no further in the said suit on behalf of the said William Linton; and prayed him to be dismissed."

The petition came on to be heard; when Dr. Nicholl, counsel for Linton, in support of his case, stated the act of the 25th Geo. II. cap. 6.

Court—Sir William Wynne. It has been urged that the appointment of William Linton to be an executor is void in law; and, in support of this, the act of the 25th Geo. II. has been relied on—this objection is new—that statute relates merely to real estate, and does not apply to personal property; and so the title purports—if it had been intended to extend to personal estate it would have been mentioned. The act runs thus, "Whereas some doubts have arisen on the act for preventing of frauds and perjuries who shall be deemed legal witnesses within the intent of the said act;" and it goes on to enact "that if any person shall attest the execution of any will or codicil made after June 24, 1752, to whom any beneficial devise, legacy, estate, interest, gift, or appointment of or affecting any real or personal estate shall be thereby given or made, such devise, legacy, estate, interest, gift, or appointment shall, so far as affects such person attesting the execution, be utterly void," &c. Now the Statute of Frauds and Perjuries (29 Car. 2) does not in any manner apply to personal estate. Again, by the said act 25th Geo. II. sec. 10, it is recited that "whereas in some of the British colonies or plantations in America the act of the 29th Car. II. has been received for law; or acts of assembly have been made, whereby the attestation and subscription of witnesses to devises of lands, tenements, and hereditaments have been required: therefore, to prevent doubts which may arise in relation to such attestation, it is enacted that this act shall extend to such of the said colonies and plantations where the said act of the 29th Car. II. is, by act of assembly, made, or usage received, as law; or where, by act of assembly or usage, the attestation and subscription of a witness or witnesses are made necessary to such devise; and shall have the same force and effect in the construction of, or for the avoiding of doubts upon, the said act of assembly and laws of the said colonies and plantations, as the same ought to have in the construction of, or for the avoiding of doubts upon, the said act of the 29th Car. II. in England." If, therefore, there had been any doubt upon the meaning of the preceding part of the act, the 10th section (which relates to colonies) does that doubt away; for that clearly relates to wills of land only. Besides, the practice of the Court hath been, ever since the passing of that act, for executors or legatees, who have been subscribing witnesses, to release for the purpose of becoming competent witnesses: and if they have been examined, without releasing, their depositions have constantly been refused to be read; which proves that the appointment or legacy in wills of personal property only is not void; nor has ever been considered so to be.

And the prayer that Linton might be dismissed, in order to be examined as a witness, was accordingly rejected.

most [217] satisfactory manner, the object or intention of the legislature in making and passing the statute itself.

The particular phrase, "any will or codicil," occurring in the statute, upon which the present question depends, viewed thus in connexion with its whole context in the statute, is not even difficult of interpretation, in my view of it. It is not, I think, to be taken in the general sense, which the phrase of itself, "any will or codicil," imports —on the contrary, it is to be taken in that limited sense of "any will or codicil of real estate," which the context satisfies me is the true interpretation or construction of the phrase.

The professed object of the statute is to obviate doubts relating to the attestation of wills of real estate. This is manifest, first and foremost, from the title of the act, which is in these words, "An act for avoiding and putting an end to certain doubts and questions relating to the attestation of wills and codicils of real estate in that part of Great Britain called England; and in his Majesty's plantations and colonies in America." Now, as to this title of the act. It has been said this act was penned by Lord Hardwick: but Lord Hardwick could never have used the phrase "any will or codicil" in the sense of "any will or codicil of real estate;" as Lord Hardwick must have known that there were wills and codicils of personalty as well: to which, equally with the other, it is sought to be inferred from this that the phrase "any will or codicil" ought, in point of true construction, to be extended. I am not aware that the Court is at liberty to go into any such extrinsic consideration as this of who framed or brought in the bill—that the Court is at liberty to travel, in any respect, out of the act itself, for [218] the true interpretation or construction of the act. But if it be, the Court may inquire, how could Lord Hardwick so misnomer the act, as it obviously is misnomered, if the act was meant, and must be taken, to affect wills of personal estate? The title of the act, if this be the true construction, should, at least, not to say must, have been different. But the title of an act of parliament, I may observe, is settled with some solemnity; and this, too, after it becomes an act—that is, after the question put, whether the bill shall pass? and that question carried in the affirmative. This seems to imply that in whatever sense the phrase "any will or codicil" was understood by the framer of the bill, the sense in which it was understood by the legislature, and in which the Court, consequently, is bound to construe it, is that of "any will or codicil of real estate." At all events, it seems to me full as unaccountable that this act should be so entitled if meant to affect personal estate, as that Lord Hardwick should have used the phrase "any will or codicil" in the sense of "any will or codicil of real estate"—limited, as the phrase is, to that sense by its whole context.

So much for the title of the act. Next, as to the preamble, which is in these words: "Whereas by an act made in the 29th year of his late Majesty, King Charles II., entitled, an act for prevention of frauds and perjuries, it is, amongst other things, enacted, that from and after the 24th day of June, in the year of our Lord 1677, all devises and bequests of any lands or tenements, devisable either by force of the Statute of Wills or by that statute, or by force of the custom of Kent, or the custom of any borough, [219] or any other particular custom, shall be in writing, and signed by the party so devising the same, or by some other person in his presence, and by his express direction; and shall be attested and subscribed in the presence of the said devisor by three or four credible witnesses, or else they shall be utterly void and of none effect, which hath been found to be a wise and good provision: but whereas doubts have arisen who are to be deemed legal witnesses within the intent of the said act; therefore, for avoiding the same, be it enacted," &c.

Such is the preamble; in which the self-same object, differently expressed, is specified, as in the title of the act. As expressed in the preamble, it is to remove doubts "who are to be deemed legal witnesses within the Statute of Frauds." As expressed in the title, it is to remove doubts "relating to the attestation of wills and codicils of real estate." But the title and preamble strictly correspond notwithstanding; as the only wills and codicils to the validity of which the attestation of subscribed witnesses is essential by the Statute of Frauds are "wills and codicils of real estate."

Its professed object, then, being devises within the Statute of Frauds, both according to the title and the preamble of this statute, I now come to the first and principal enacting clause (being that in which the phrase to be construed "any will or codicil" occurs) and which is in these words: Therefore, for avoiding such doubts, be it enacted, &c., that "if any person shall attest the execution of any will or codicil which shall be made after the 24th day of June, in the year of our Lord 1752, to whom any beneficial [220] devise, legacy, estate, interest, gift, or appointment of or affecting any real or personal estate, other than and except charges on lands, tenements or hereditaments, for payment of any debt or debts, shall be thereby given or made, such devise, legacy, estate, interest, gift, or appointment shall, so far only as concerns such person attesting the execution of such will or codicil, or any person claiming under him, be utterly null and void; and such person shall be admitted as a witness to the execution of such will or codicil within the intent of the said act: notwithstanding such devise, legacy, estate, interest, gift or appointment mentioned in such will or codicil."

Now it seems to me that the phrase "any will or codicil" in this enacting clause is so limited by the avowed object, as expressed in the title and preamble of the act, to devises—wills or codicils of real estate—that it ought not to be construed to affect mere testaments—wills or codicils of personal estate only. The Statute of Frauds required the attestation of three, at least, competent witnesses to every devise: so that if of three subscribed witnesses to a devise, one, for instance, was a legatee, this rendering him, of course, on the score of interest, an incompetent witness, by a necessary consequence vacated the whole devise. The sole object of the act in question, I think, is to remedy this evil—and this sole object it effects, I conceive, by annulling the legacy of every subscribed witness to a devise (and to a devise only), in order to restore the competency—preferring the sacrifice of a particular legacy, or of particular legacies, to that of the whole devise; of the whole will, so far as it relates to real property, inevitable under the Statute of Frauds, in the [221] event of the incompetency of any one of the three (there being only three) subscribed witnesses to the devise. And this being so, the statute of Geo. II. has, I should say, no reference whatever to a mere will of personalty, in true construction—that being an instrument not requiring the attestation of any subscribed witness (either by the Statute of Frauds or otherwise, as will appear in the sequel), in order to give it legal force and validity.

And this interpretation or construction of the first and principal clause or section of the act is fortified and confirmed to my mind by what occurs in the tenth section. I omit or pass over those sections intermediate between the first and the tenth, as not bearing upon the question, possibly, either way—only observing, however, that the second section plainly relates merely to wills of realty. But to the tenth section. Now, the tenth section provides that this act is to extend to such only of the British colonies as have received for law the "Statute of Frauds," or have made "acts of assembly," requiring, as the "Statute of Frauds" does, the attestation of subscribed witnesses to devises or wills of lands. Hence, if this act applies, in true construction, to wills of personalty, a legacy to one who is a subscribed witness to a will of personalty is void in such of the colonies as have adopted the Statute of Frauds, or have made a similar law of their own; but it is a good legacy in the other colonies. This could never, I think, be intended.

If the question then before the Court were "res integra," I should say that this act has no reference to a mere will of personalty, possibly with little hesitation. But the contrary having been held at the Rolls, [222] in a case similar to the present, that of Lees v. Summersgill, it is a conclusion this at which I venture to arrive, not without the greatest hesitation. Nor might the Court even feel itself at liberty to differ in its construction of this act, from the very eminent person who decided the case of Lees v. Summersgill, but for the following reason:—He, it clearly appears, either mistook, or was misled as to, the understanding and practice of these Courts, or and in respect to this particular statute: and to such misapprehension on his part, of misinformation on that of others, the decision in Lees v. Summersgill itself was, I am convinced, very considerably, if not principally, owing.

It has been suggested at the bar in that case, as the "understanding at Doctors' Commons," that the statute did not affect wills of personal estate. This suggestion I take to have been correct. But the Master of the Rolls, in his judgment, as reported, states himself to have found, upon inquiry, that the understanding at Doctors' Commons was not as suggested—on the contrary, that the statute was rather understood at Doctors' Commons to extend to all wills whatsoever. But that the statute was ever really so understood to extend in these Courts, I can find no trace or vestige. I think, therefore, either that the Master of the Rolls was misinformed in this particular; or which, perhaps, is more probable, that, somehow or other, he misapprehended what information he obtained on the subject, so as to take it in a contrary sense to that meant by his informant. For I am warranted, both by adjudged cases, and by the daily practice here, in saying that this act has been constantly understood in these Courts as affecting wills of real property only.

[223] And, first, as to adjudged cases, that of Linton and Blackburn v. Law, cited in the argument, is precise to this understanding of the statute. My own note of that case is pretty similar in substance to that which has been read in the argument. It is fuller, however, in the following particular; in which it corresponds with a very accurate note of the case, with which I have been favoured by Dr. Arnold. It states my predecessor to have fortified the argument in favour of his construction of the act, derived from the practice of subscribing witnesses, who are also legatees, uniformly releasing in order to their being examined, by a reference to several adjudged cases; in which his predecessors, to say the least, had recognized that practice, not as a mere practice, adopted ex majori cautela, or with any other view, but as a matter of strict legal necessity. By reference to the case of Blaquiere v. Robinson, in 1768, before Sir George Hay, where a legatee in a small piece of plate, also a subscribing witness, who had been examined, without his legacy being adverted to, was before the Court, praying to release and be re-examined—to which prayer, however, it being made after publication had passed in the cause, the Court refused to accede, and rejected the testimony of the witness; which it is obvious that it could only have done on the principle of the statute not affecting wills of personalty, so as to render the legacy in question, being a legacy to a subscribing witness, a void legacy. By reference, also, to the case of Finch v. Nichol, in 1753, before Sir George Lee; and that of Franks v. Simonds, in 1760, in Sir Edward Simpson's time; in each of which the Court permitted a party to release, and be re-examined, under [224] circumstances precisely similar to those in the case of Blaquiere v. Robinson—save only in that of publication not having passed, as it had in the case of Blaquiere v. Robinson, at the time when the Court was prayed to accept the party's release, and permit his re-examination. All these cases, however, plainly evidence the same understanding and construction of the statute—and hence I am warranted by adjudged cases in saying that the practice here has been to confine this statute, in its application, to wills and codicils of realty, as suggested at the bar in the case of Lees v. Summersgill; and not, as intimated by the Master of the Rolls, in the judgment in that case, to extend the statute in its application to all wills and codicils.

Nor does the ordinary practice of the office, in a certain particular, which I am about to state, evidence this understanding of the statute less plainly than the, as ordinary, practice of making subscribing witnesses, who are also legatees, release, in order to their being examined in support of the will. I mean the following practice.

A mere testament, I have said, requires no subscribing witness in order to give it full force and effect, either by the Statute of Frauds, or by any other law: it being only required to probate in common form of a will so not attested by any subscribing witness that an affidavit should be made by two persons to the signature of that will being of the hand-writing of the deceased. If, however, as often happens, the will be attested by one subscribing witness, the affidavit of one person to hand-writing is then only required; and not the affidavit of two persons, as in the case of a will wholly unattested. All, then, which subscribing wit-[225]-nesses effect, in respect of a will of mere personalty (so far as regards, for I am only speaking as to, probate of that will in common form), is to dispense with the necessity of any affidavit to hand-writing—in which particular only their attestation of the will is any other than mere surplusage.

Wills of personalty, however, we all know, are frequently attested by witnesses; and by witnesses, too, who are also legatees. Now what, let me ask, is the daily practice of the office in granting probate in common form of a will so circumstanced? Is it to consider the legacy void?—by no means—it is to consider the attestation void—to regard the party sustaining, primâ facie, the double character of subscribing witness and legatee, not in the light of no legatee in law, but in that of no subscribing witness. Accordingly, if of two subscribing witnesses to a will one, for instance, is a legatee, the affidavit of one person is required to probate of the will in common form, as if the will were subscribed by a single witness: if, again, both subscribing witnesses are legatees as well, an affidavit of two persons to hand-writing is then required; just as it would be if the will were wholly unattested. Surely all this is quite at variance with the notion of the statute in question having ever been understood here to affect wills of personalty.

Upon this shewing, it is clear that the judgment in Lees v. Summersgill proceeded upon a mistaken notion of the "understanding and practice" of these Courts as to the matter in question; a notion, however, but for which I repeat my conviction, that the statute in question might very probably have been differently construed in that case. And as for this reason, on the [226] one hand, I hold myself at liberty; so, on the other hand, I feel myself bound to pronounce that it is competent to the legatee to proceed in this suit, notwithstanding the objection taken by the administratrix. And this I do in consideration, not merely of the actual hardship (just, however, to advert to this) which a strict interpretation of the statute would too frequently inflict in individual cases; but in consideration of my strong view and impression of the legal propriety of expounding the statute liberally and beneficially on the grounds already suggested: especially, too, considering the authority derived to this mode of expounding it from the practice here, in the two particulars to which I have adverted—a practice sanctioned in one at least of the two by adjudged cases: to which, sitting here, it is even possibly matter of legal obligation that I should conform, in my construction of the act; although, under circumstances, it may have elsewhere received a different construction.(a)

TRAVERS AND EDGELL v. MILLER. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 3rd Session, 1826.—An allegation pleaded that a testator, in executing certain papers [marked A] as and for his will [such papers consisting of 33 sheets, numbered from 1 to 19, and from 21 to 34], verily believed a paper [marked B] itself, or a transcript or copy thereof, to be in its place [as the 20th (missing) sheet, supplied from the draft will] in and among such papers; and that if a transcript or copy of B were not in its place in and among papers A, when so executed by the testator, its omission was purely by mistake or accident; or lastly, that if a copy or transcript of B were in its place in and among papers A, when executed by the testator as and for his will, it had since been detached from the same (and lost or mislaid) unknown to, and contrary to the meaning and intention of, the testator; for that the testator meant and intended to give, will, bequeath, &c. in all things as in papers A and B (propounded as together containing his will) together contained. —The Court, deeming this allegation proved, pronounced for papers A and B (B inserted as or in supply of the 20th sheet of A) as together containing the will of the testator—on what principles, vide case of Bayldon v. Bayldon, post.

The facts of this case briefly stated were as follows:—Sir John Edward Riggs Miller, Baronet, the deceased [227] in the cause, gave instructions to his solicitor, Mr. Palmer, of Gray's-Inn, for his will, in the month of January, 1818. Pursuant to such instructions a draft will was prepared and submitted to the inspection of the testator, at that time in London; who caused certain alterations to be made in it: and of this draft-will so altered a copy-will was subsequently made, and forwarded to the deceased in the country, consisting of 34 sheets, numbered respectively from 1 to 34.

In the latter end of February, 1818, the testator wrote to Mr. Palmer on the subject of further alterations, requesting that Mr. Palmer would instruct him by letter what words to insert, and where to insert these in the said copy-will, previous to its being executed, in order to give such proposed alterations effect. In reply, however, Mr. Palmer, not feeling himself competent to advise the testator safely as to the proposed alterations without the copy-will itself, wrote to request that this might be returned to him; which it accordingly was, then consisting, with the rest of the 20th sheet (being a paper before the Court, marked letter B), such 20th sheet having been partially altered by the testator himself, in pencil, previous to its being sent to Mr. Palmer.

In the month of April following, the testator himself came to town, and had a further personal consultation on the subject of his will with Mr. Palmer, to whom he then gave instructions for perfecting the copy-will, by filling up blanks and otherwise; which having been [228] perfected in conformity with the instructions of the testator, several of the sheets were detached, and sent by Mr. Palmer to a law-stationer to be re-copied, he, Mr. Palmer, retaining the other sheets. Among the sheets so detached was the 20th sheet, but whether this 20th sheet was actually sent to the law-stationer to be re-copied (as it was meant and intended to be), or whether through error it was not so sent; or being sent, was either in fact not re-copied or not returned as re-copied by the law-stationer, no where appeared in the cause. The other detached sheets, however, were re-copied and returned, together with the originals; and a new or second copy-will was now made up, composed of the sheets so re-copied (whether, indeed, of the 20th, with the others, or not, no where appearing as above) and of the rest of the sheets which Mr. Palmer had retained in the meantime. And this new or second copy-will was forwarded to the testator at his residence, in the neighbourhood of Banbury, on the 1st of May, 1818.

This copy-will the testator retained in his possession as such till the 30th of July, 1818, when he took the same to his solicitor's at Banbury, and made it (or at least so purported) a will [namely, by executing it in the presence of three witnesses], whether consisting, however, of 34 sheets at that time, or of 33 only, there being no 20th sheet, still not appearing. But of the will (so to style it) sent by the testator shortly after to his banker's, in London, sealed up, for safe custody, there was no 20th sheet: it being composed of 33 sheets only, numbered from 1 to 19, and from 21 to 34; papers before the Court marked letter A. A discovery of this, immediately subsequent to the death of [229] the testator in the month of August, 1825, produced an application from the executors, Mr. Travers and Mr. Edgell, to Mr. Palmer; who, upon search among the testamentary papers of the deceased in his possession, found paper B among other loose sheets, formerly detached by him from the other sheets of the copy-will in order to their being re-copied by the law-stationer, as already stated, and delivered the same to the executors.

Under these circumstances, papers A and B were propounded by the executors as together containing the last will of the testator. And in order to their being pronounced for as such, it was expressly pleaded on the part of the executors that "the testator, in executing papers A as and for his will, verily believed paper B (itself, or a copy or transcript thereof) to be in its place, in and among such papers;" and that "if, in fact, a copy or transcript of paper B were not so in its place, in and among such papers, when executed by the said testator, its omission was purely by mistake and accident:" or, lastly, that "if a copy or transcript of paper B were in and among papers A when executed by the testator, as and for his will, it had since been detached from the same, and lost or mislaid, unknown to, or contrary to the meaning and intention of, the testator;" for that he, the testator, meant and intended to give, will, bequeath, devise, dispose of, and do in all things, as contained in papers A and B, together."

Such was the case—as to the papers themselves—of papers A, the 19th and 21st sheets, ended and commenced, severally, as follows:—"And in case there should not be any son, or daughter, of the body [230] of the said Eliza Miller, lawfully issuing, who shall attain"—[end of sheet 19]—"Moore Travers and Edgell Wyatt Edgell, and the survivor of them, and the heirs and assigns of such survivor, do, and shall, receive and take the rents, issues, and profits, thereof," &c. &c. [Commencement of sheet 21.] Paper B commenced in these words: "the age of 21 years, or die under that age, leaving issue male of his or her body, living at his or her death," &c.—and ended—"Upon trust that they the said John."

Hence it clearly appeared from the context, and not merely from the numbering of the sheets, that paper B, or a copy of it, was necessarily an intended component part of the will A, the true inference being (so contended on the part of the executors), that either its omission, at the time of the will A being executed by the testator, was purely unintentional, or that that will as executed contained a copy or transcript of paper B, as the twentieth sheet; but that this had somehow or other been accidentally detached from the rest (and afterwards lost or mislaid), unknown to the testator, in the interval between the execution of the will and its transmission by the testator to his banker's in London, for safe custody. And,

The Court so deeming; and that the facts of the case, as above pleaded on the part of the executors, were duly proved, pronounced for papers A and B (B inserted as, or in supply of, the twentieth sheet of A), as together containing the will of the testator.(a)[1]

[231] IN THE GOODS OF RICHARD BICKNELL, Deceased. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 3rd Session, 1826.—Probate of a will, altered in various respects by the testator subsequent to the execution thereof, decreed to the executors after the same had been restored to the state in which it was at the time of its being executed; it appearing by affidavits that the testator had so altered his will whilst of unsound mind; and there being also a proxy of consent to this from all the parties whose interests were affected by such alterations.

(On motion.)

Richard Bicknell died in the month of May, 1825, having first, whilst of sound mind, duly made and executed his will, bearing date the 28th of February, 1824; whereby he appointed two persons executors and residuary legatees in trust; and bequeathed the residue of his personal estate and effects, after the death of his wife (who had no interest in the residue), to his brothers and sisters, four in number; and to a relation, Sarah Bicknell, in equal proportions.

The deceased, after the execution of his said will, became of unsound mind; and whilst so of unsound mind made certain erasures, obliterations, alterations, and interlineations in his will. For instance he altered the word "five" to "two," thereby diminishing a certain bequest to his wife in the second sheet; he struck through the name of Sarah Bicknell, as one of his residuary legatees, in the third sheet; he obliterated various legacies in the fourth sheet, &c.

It appearing by affidavits that the whole of the above several alterations are made by the deceased whilst of unsound mind; and there being a proxy of consent from all the residuary legatees (the only persons whose interests were affected) that the will should be restored to the state in which it was at the time of its being executed—

The Court was pleased on motion of counsel to decree all [232] the words erased or obliterated in the will subsequent to the execution thereof to be re-inserted; and all the words interlined and written therein, after the same being executed, to be struck through; and to decree probate of the will, so restored to its original state, to the executors.

BAYLDON v. BAYLDON AND OTHERS. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 4th Session, 1826.—Where a will has nothing doubtful or incongruous on the face of it; suggesting itself the probability of some casual error to account for this in the body of the will; extrinsic evidence to the testator having meant other than the will expresses, is inadmissible; for the Court, after and notwithstanding such evidence, would still be bound to pronounce for the will in its actual state.—But there being some absurdity or ambiguity on the face of the will; probably owing, and so probably to be ascribed, to some casual error in the body of the will: the fact of some casual error in the body of the will may then be pleaded, in order to its being proved by extrinsic evidence. And in the event of such evidence being satisfactory both to the fact of some casual error, and to the error suggested being precisely that error; the Court is bound to pronounce for the will, not in its actual state, but with that error first reformed or corrected in manner suggested. —An allegation pleading the casual omission by the testator in his will of a legacy of 5000l. to a nephew, admitted to proof on this principle.

(On the admission of an allegation.)

Sir George Wood, Knight, formerly one of the Barons of his Majesty's Court of Exchequer, the deceased in this cause, died in the month of July, 1824—shortly after which probate of his will, bearing date 29th of November, 1823 (together with four codicils, bearing date respectively the 14th of October, 1814;(a)[2] the 8th of December, 1823; the 19th of May, 1824; and the 16th of July, 1824), was taken by Thomas and William Bayldon, the executors named in the second codicil.

[233] In consequence of the (alleged accidental) omission of a legacy of 5000l.,

(a)[1] For the principles upon which this judgment proceeded, see the judgment in the case of Bayldon v. Bayldon. Post, p. 232.

(a)[2] The will expressly provided that this (originally a codicil to a former will) should still be and remain in force.

three per cent. consolidated bank annuities, to his nephew Richard Bayldon, occurring in the said will; a decree by letters of request, issued under seal of this Court, at the instance of the said Richard Bayldon, calling upon the executors to bring in the probate so already taken, and to shew cause why the same should not be revoked—and why a new probate should not be granted, in which the omitted legacy should be inserted. The residuary legatees were also cited by this decree to "see proceedings in the cause."

An appearance was given to this decree by one proctor for the executors and one of the residuary legatees—and by another proctor for certain other of the residuary legatees. Several of the residuary legatees had still, however, not appeared in the cause—and the cause, so far as regarded them, was a proceeding in pœnam.

The residuary legatee who appeared by the same proctor with the executors had made an affidavit of scripts, annexed to which were three scripts, marked A, B, and C—the first, a draft of the will; the second, an abstract of the will; the third, a statement of relatives liable to payment of a legacy duty under the will—all purporting to be (as the will itself in these respects) in the hand-writing of, and made by, the deceased.

The question before the Court was the admission of an allegation filed on behalf, and setting up the case, of the party promoting the suit. It was opposed by the executors; contending that the facts pleaded were insufficient, if proved, to justify the Court in supplying [234] the omitted legacy from the draft will, as prayed by the party promoting the suit.

This allegation pleaded in substance,

1. The death of the party deceased in the month of July, 1824; and that he died possessed of a considerable real estate, and of personal property to the amount in value of 140,000l.

2. That the said deceased, with a view to making his last will and testament, drew up with his own hand as a draft of such will the script marked letter A, containing, among other, the following bequests:—"I give and bequeath the sum of 60,000l., three per cent. consolidated bank annuities, in manner following:—that is to say, 10,000l. thereof to Louisa Bayldon; 5000l. thereof to my brother John's daughter; 5000l. thereof to nephew Daniel Bayldon; 5000l. thereof to niece Frances, or Fanny Cook; 5000l. thereof to nephew Richard Bayldon; 5000l. thereof to niece Caroline Baker; 5000l. thereof to niece Elizabeth Bayldon; 5000l. thereof to the children of my niece Susanna Allen, now dead, as representing their mother, to take only as one person, equally among them; 6000l. thereof to niece Abigail Stocks; 5000l. thereof to my nephew Joseph Stocks; and 4000l., residue thereof, to my niece Elizabeth Hawkins."

3. That the said deceased, having fair copied the script A, executed the same, as and for his last will, in the presence of three credible witnesses, on the 29th of November, 1823; but in such fair copy did unintentionally, and by mistake, omit the words and figures following:—"5000l. thereof to nephew Richard Bayldon:" and that in executing his said will he, the said deceased, verily believed the said words and figures to be [235] contained in, and to form part of, the same; also that after so executing his will he, the deceased, with his own hand, added the date of the execution thereof, and the names of the witnesses, to the draft marked letter A.

4. The fourth article of the allegation referred, in supply of proof, to the script marked letter B, purporting to be, and contain, an abstract, drawn up with his own hand, of the contents of the said will of him, the deceased; in which the said deceased, in enumerating the persons among whom he had divided the aforesaid sum of 60,000l., three per cent. consolidated bank annuities, named and stated the said Richard Bayldon as a legatee, in the sum of 5000l. part thereof, in the words and figures following:—"Richard Bayldon (my nephew) 5000l."

5. The fifth article referred, in further supply of proof, to the script marked letter C, purporting to be a statement, also in his own hand, of the relatives of him, the deceased, who would be liable to payment of the legacy duty under his will, revised and completed (so alleged) by the deceased, after the execution of his said will, wherein he again referred to and recognised the said Richard Bayldon as a legatee, by the letters and figures, "Rd. B. 5000l."

6. The sixth article pleaded the deposits of these scripts by the said deceased, together with his executed will, in a tin box in his library in Bedford-square—and that the same were in the same plight and condition as when found, where the deceased had so deposited them, shortly after his death.

7, 8. The seventh article expressly pleaded the three several scripts, A, B, C, to be all of the proper hand-writing of the deceased: and the eighth, that the de-[236]-ceased, at the time of writing them, was of perfectly sound and disposing mind and memory.

9. That the deceased at all times entertained and expressed a great regard and affection for his said nephew, Richard Bayldon; whose advancement in the army he exerted himself to procure upon all occasions—and that such his regard and affection for his said nephew continued unimpaired until the time of his death.

10. The tenth article pleaded the probate taken, by his executors, of the deceased's said will; without the figures and words "5000l. thereof to nephew Richard Bayldon."

11. And the eleventh was the usual concluding article.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. Viewing the facts pleaded in this allegation in connexion with the several testamentary scripts before the Court, I have no doubt whatever as to the testator's intention (taking it generally) in this case. I have no doubt whatever that he intended a legacy to his nephew, Mr. Richard Bayldon—that he conceived that legacy to form a part of his will—and that the omission of it in the executed paper was a mere oversight and purely unintentional. The testator is pleaded and must be taken to have been, and no doubt was, of sound mind. At the same time, I am to recollect that he was far advanced in life. And that this aged testator, in fair copying a draft will, occupying many sheets of paper, should have omitted the legacy in question [an omission, too, occurring where and as it does, in a series of consecutive legacies to eleven per-[237]-sons, several of the same sir-name], casually and by accident, as suggested, is a suggestion that could scarcely be deemed very revolting in point of probability under any circumstances. But the question being whether this, the nephew's suggestion, be more probable; or, which is the other alternative, that the testator [taking the facts to be true pleaded in this allegation, and coupling these with what appears on the face of the several exhibits, A, B, and C, in other words, upon the extrinsic evidence now proposed to be offered on the part of the nephew] should have omitted the legacy in question on purpose or designedly in his will; the balance of probability, I repeat, this being the question, is so infinitely in favour of the nephew's suggestion, as quite to satisfy my mind, generally speaking, that the omission was purely accidental.

As to the fact, then, there can be no doubt. But is it competent to the Court in point of law to let in extrinsic evidence in proof of that fact; it being through the medium of such evidence only that the fact is capable of being proved? It is to this question that I have principally to address myself—and it is a question to be determined subject to and upon the following considerations:—

Where a will has nothing doubtful or incongruous on the face of it—suggesting, itself, the probability of some casual error to account for this, in the body of the will, extrinsic evidence to the testator having meant other than the will itself expresses, is inadmissible—as the Court after and notwithstanding such evidence would still be bound to pronounce for the will in its actual state. Upon this principle the Court proceeded, in [238] respect of Lady Bath's will; (a) in which, there being a residuary clause, disposing of the residue in a manner neither doubtful nor incongruous on the face of the will, it was attempted to substitute in the probate for this a residuary clause, open to a different construction, found in the "instructions"—an attempt which failed, principally on the ground suggested in the judgment of this Court; confirmed on appeal by that of the High Court of Delegates.

But there being, on the contrary, some absurdity or ambiguity on the face of the will, probably owing, and so probably to be ascribed, to some casual error (that is, to something either omitted or inserted contrary to the testator's true mind and intention) in the body of the will; the fact of some casual error in the body of the will is capable, in such case, of being pleaded, in order to its being proved by extrinsic evidence. And being so proved, the Court is at liberty, and is even bound, to pronounce for the will, not in its actual state, but with such error first reformed or corrected (either by the insertion, that is, of something omitted, or by the omission of something inserted, or as the case may be, in the will, contrary to the true mind and intention of the testator)—provided that, as well the precise nature of that error, as the fact of some casual error, suggested, is proved in the case to a moral certainty by such evidence. Upon this principle, a general residuary clause, held to have been casually omitted by the testator, was transferred from the "instructions" to the "will" itself, of which pro-[239]-bate was ultimately granted by the Court of Delegates, in the case of Blackwood v. Damer: (a) and in the present term only a judgment of this Court was founded on the self same principle; its judgment, I mean, in the case of Travers and Edgell v. Miller (see page 226, ante).

In the case then before the Court, in the first place, is there any thing doubtful or incongruous on the face of the will to be accounted for by, and so itself founding the suggestion of, some casual error in the body of the will?

And, secondly, if this be so, would the evidence [240] taken upon this allegation (being proved) plainly satisfy the Court, both as to the actual existence of some casual error, and to the error suggested being precisely that error—in order, this, that in proceeding to correct or reform it, in manner as suggested (the end or object of its being pleaded), the Court may feel convinced, to a moral certainty, that it is doing precisely what the testator, but for a mere oversight, would himself have done: in other words, that it is making the will in this respect precisely what the testator himself conceived it to have been, and died under the impression and belief that it actually was? If both these questions are to be answered in the affirmative, this allegation is admissible.

Now, as to the first of these points, there can be no doubt that there is an apparent ambiguity founding the suggestion, and so inferring the probability, of a casual omission in the will, on the face of the will itself. The testator is bequeathing the total sum of 60,000l. consols to certain of his relatives, in certain aliquot parts or portions, in the following way:—"10,000l., part thereof, to Louisa Bayldon; 5000l. thereof to brother John's daughter; 5000l. thereof to nephew Daniel Bayldon," and so on. Having so disposed, specifically, in the will as it stands, of 51,000l., he concludes—"and 4000l., residue thereof, to my niece Elizabeth Hawkins." But the residue of this 60,000l. in the will, as it stands, consists, not of 4000l., but of 9000l. Consequently, a specific bequest or specific bequests, to some person or to some persons, of the sum of 5000l., is or are apparently omitted in this will, through error or mistake on the face of it.

Secondly, would the evidence taken upon this alle-[241]-gation, if proved, enable the Court to fill up or supply that omission, in precise conformity with the testator's mind and intention, by pronouncing for his will, with a legacy of 5000l. to his nephew, Mr. Richard Bayldon, previously inserted? It would, I think, enable the Court to do this to a moral certainty. For,

In the first place, the Court will have for its guidance, in so supplying that omission, a draft of the will (script A), all in the hand-writing of the testator, in which occurs this very legacy of 5000l. to his nephew, Richard Bayldon. True it is that a testator may alter his mind; so that a draft-will may differ from an executed one in fifty respects, without it being necessary to resort to mistake or accident in order to account for this. The testator, accordingly, in fair copying his draft-will, might well have omitted the legacy in question to his nephew, Richard Bayldon, designedly. But is this at all consistent with the bequest of 4000l., residue of 60,000l., to his niece,

(a) Of that case the editor has reason to believe that the following is a correct outline:—

Blackwood v. Damer. Delegates, February 14th, 1783.

Mr. Jansen wrote, with his own hand, instructions for a will, in which he left the residue of his property to his youngest daughter, afterwards married to the Honourable Lionel Damer. The attorney, in writing over the will, omitted the residuary clause; and the will had also some other variations. The draft was read over to the testator, and left in his custody two days, when he executed it in due form. There were legacies to the executors in the will.

It was in evidence that the testator always afterwards expressed himself as having left the residue of his property to his youngest daughter.

The attorney positively deposed that the omission of the residuary clause was a mere casual omission on his part; the other variations, he supposed, he had verbal instructions from the testator to make.

The Court below had pronounced for the instructions as part of the will.

The Court of Delegates decreed that the residuary clause should stand as part of the will; but no other part of the instructions. Present, Mr. Justice Willes, Mr. Baron Eyre, Mr. Justice Nares, and Dr. Macham.

Elizabeth Hawkins? when in the will only 51,000l. of that 60,000l. is specifically bequeathed; leaving a residue of 9000l. Nor is this all; he writes, with his own hand, at the foot of the draft, after the will was executed, the day upon which it was executed, and the names of the subscribing witnesses; recognizing by this, as I must presume, the correctness in all respects of the draft, or rather its accordance, in all respects, with the executed will. If the matter rested here, there could be no doubt, I think, as well of the precise nature of this omission, as of its being purely unintentional.

The Court will also have for its guidance the script B, an abstract of the contents of his will; in which abstract, again, occurs the name of Mr. Richard Bayldon [242] as a legatee in the sum of 5000l.; this also in the hand-writing of the testator.

Lastly, it will have before it the script C, in the testator's hand-writing again, headed, "a statement of relatives liable to payment of a legacy duty under my will;" where again it has, "Rd. B. 5000l.," plainly written under the impression of this nephew being a legatee to that amount in the will.

Added to this the allegation being proved, there will be evidence before the Court of the testator's unimpaired regard and affection for this nephew; so as to render his exclusion from the will, as a specific legatee, in this sum of 5000l., under the circumstances, quite improbable. And this, the rather, as he still is a general (residuary) legatee in the will as it stands. For the residuary legatees in the will are the same eleven persons [reckoning Mrs. Allen's children one person, from the circumstance of their taking one share only] as are the specific legatees in the sum of 60,000l. in the draft will. Hence, though, in the actual will, there are only ten specific legatees in this sum of 60,000l., the name of Mr. Richard Bayldon as a legatee in 5000l., "part thereof," being omitted—that such omission is by a mere oversight on the part of the testator, and that it was never intended, can, under all the circumstances, in my judgment, admit of no doubt or question whatever.

Upon these considerations the Court admits this allegation to proof—pledging itself in the end, in the event of its being proved, to decree probate of this will, with the legacy in question, of 5000l. to Mr. Richard Bayldon, first inserted.

Allegation admitted.

[243] BRAHAM v. BURCHELL. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, By-Day, 1826.—A., as executor of B., cited to bring in the probate, taken in common form, of her will, seven years before by A.; and to prove the will per testes; at the instance of C., as the representative of D., the mother and sole next of kin of B.—A., who appeared under protest, dismissed with costs, the Court holding that it was only competent to C. to do in the premises what D., if living, could have done; that D., if living, could not have cited A. in effect as cited by C.; finally, that the grounds suggested, in objection to the protest [being the same meant in the end to be relied on, in opposition to the will], were unavailing in objection to the protest [and would in the end be equally so, in opposition to the will].—Every legatee who puts in suit the validity of a will must bring into and leave in the registry of the Court the amount of his legacy, if paid, to abide the event of that suit.—A married woman who possesses a separate property may dispose of that separate property by will independent of her husband and just as if she were a feme sole; whether such separate property were vested in the hands of trustees to her separate use or not.—Where a wife assuming a right to dispose of property by will, but which right is questionable, actually disposes of such property by will, a Court of Probate on proof of the mere factum of the will should pronounce for it; leaving the wife's assumed right of disposal to be questioned, if at all, in another Court.—If a feme covert make a will, being at that time intestable in law; still, if surviving, she republishes that will subsequent to the death of the husband, it is a good will in law.—The mere conservation of a will for many years may under circumstances amount to a republication of that will, so far as regards personal property.

(On protest.)

Anna Selina Storace, the deceased in this cause, died in the month of August, 1817, without a father; leaving behind her Elizabeth Storace, her natural and lawful mother and only next of kin; the only person who would have been entitled to her personal estate and effects in case she had died intestate. The deceased, however, left a will, bearing date the 10th day of August, 1797. And in the month of October 1817, probate of that will was granted to Joseph Burchell, Esquire (party in this cause), the surviving executor in common form; the personal property of the deceased being sworn by the executor not to amount in value to the sum of 50,000l.

In the month of June, 1824, a decree issued, at the instance of William Spencer Harris Braham (the other party in the cause), as the residuary legatee named in the will and administrator, with the same annexed, of the effects of Elizabeth Storace, the deceased's mother; citing the executor to bring in the probate of the deceased's will, and to prove the will by witnesses; otherwise to shew cause why the said probate should not be revoked and the will declared null and void in law; and why letters of administration of the effects of the deceased, as dying intestate, a widow, without child or [244] father, should not be granted to the said William Spencer Harris Braham as the representative of Elizabeth Storace, the mother and sole next of kin of the deceased.

Mr. Burchell appeared to this decree under protest—and the present question arose as to the merits of that protest, subsequently extended into an act of Court; written to by both parties and sustained in the usual manner by exhibits and affidavits.

In support of the protest it was in substance alleged, in the act of Court, on behalf of the executor,

That the deceased, Anna Selina Storace, spinster (falsely described in the citation Anna Selina Fischer, otherwise Fisher, widow), died in 1817, leaving a mother and only next of kin; that the deceased duly made and executed her last will and testament, bearing date the 10th of August, 1797; that a few days before her death she, the deceased, recognized her said will, saying that "she had made her will, and that it was to her satisfaction;" that shortly after her death the said will was found in her bureau, among other papers of moment and concern, by Elizabeth Storace, her mother, and delivered to the said Joseph Burchell, the surviving executor named in the same; that the said Joseph Burchell delayed for some time taking probate of the said will and until he was urged to the same by the said Elizabeth Storace; who, on the 3d of October, 1817, made an affidavit in support of the will, in which she described her daughter to have died a spinster; whereupon probate issued of the said will to the said Joseph Burchell on the 11th of October, 1817; that the will being so proved, partly by the means of, was also in all respects fully acquiesced in by, the [245] said Elizabeth Storace, the said mother of the deceased; and that the said Elizabeth Storace assisted in a variety of ways (specified in the act) in carrying into execution the said will at all times and upon all occasions, until her own decease in the month of May, 1821; that a legacy of 2000l. bequeathed by the deceased in her said will to Mr. John Braham, the reputed father (by the said deceased) of William Spencer Harris Braham, had been vested by the said John Braham in the names of trustees, for the benefit of his said son; and that his said son was in the receipt of the interest of the said legacy, and had been, from shortly after the said deceased's death in 1817; that the said William Spencer Harris Braham had himself from time to time settled accounts and received balances with and from the said Joseph Burchell, as executor of the deceased's said will; and finally, that the said deceased's effects had been fully administered pursuant to the provisions of the said will (under the sanction and by order of the Court of Chancery) at the time of the issue of the decree, suggesting the invalidity of the said will in June, 1824. Upon these grounds it was prayed that the Court would pronounce for the protest and dismiss the executor.

In opposition to this prayer it was alleged in substance, on behalf of the party promoting the suit;

That the deceased was lawfully married to Johann Abraham, otherwise Abraham Fischer, otherwise Fisher, at Vienna, in the month of March, 1784; that Fisher and the said deceased cohabited at Vienna for about a twelvemonth (and had issue a son, who died in his infancy), when they finally separated, and the said deceased thereupon resumed her maiden name of [246] Storace and continued the use of it to the time of her death; that Fisher died at Sligo in Ireland in the year 1805; that from 1796 to 1812 the said deceased cohabited with Mr. John Braham, by whom she had several children; among others, William Spencer Harris Braham, the only survivor, born in the year 1802; that the said deceased at no time shortly before her death adverted, in any manner, to her will of 1797, but to a subsequent will made shortly before her death, whereby she had bequeathed the bulk of her property to her son, the said William Spencer Harris Braham; that the said deceased always entertained and expressed the greatest affection for her said son, and frequently within twelve months of her death declared that she had "made her will," and that her said son was chiefly interested therein; that on the Thursday following the death of the said deceased (who died on a Sunday), the said Elizabeth Storace, mother of the deceased, burnt and destroyed many of her papers, and among others (probably) her said last will; that the will of August, 1797, was not found by the said Elizabeth Storace, the deceased's mother, among the deceased's papers of moment and concern; but by a friend of the said deceased, a Miss Walthew, in a bundle among old tax receipts and papers of a similar description; that upon the said deceased's death Elizabeth Storace, who was then upwards of eighty years old, adopted the said Joseph Burchell and his son Mr. John Burchell (a solicitor) as her legal advisers in all matters of business; and that she, the said Elizabeth Storace, in forwarding the probate, and subsequently in assisting in the execution of the said will of August, 1797, acted under the undue influence [247] and control of the said Mr. Burchell; and in ignorance or under misapprehension of her own legal rights as sole next of kin of the deceased, in the event of the said deceased's actual or legal intestacy: lastly, that the said William Spencer Harris Braham only became aware of the legal rights of the said Elizabeth Storace (and consequently only became aware of his own legal rights as the representative of the said Elizabeth Storace) in that event, shortly before the issue of the citation in this cause. For these reasons it was prayed that the Court would overrule the executor's protest and assign him to appear absolutely.(a)

A rejoinder to this on the part of the executor,

Denied that any lawful marriage ever took place be-[248]-tween the deceased and Fisher—and alleged that the executor never represented to the mother of the deceased that the said marriage was invalid; but, on the contrary, that he, the executor, who had no knowledge on the subject one way or the other, was himself so assured by the mother, who was resident with her daughter at Vienna at the time, and was privy to all the circumstances of the said marriage—that the said deceased never made and executed any other will than that of August, 1797, and never adverted to any other will as made and executed by her; although she, the deceased, did contemplate making a provision by will for her son; and did, in contemplation thereof, shortly before her death procure his baptismal certificate as for the purpose of enabling her to describe him correctly in her then intended will—at the same time that she, the deceased, on many occasions expressed to Mr. Burchell and others her wish to induce or compel Mr. Braham to provide for her said son; adding at such times her full conviction that "if she were to leave him a fortune, his father would do nothing for him"—that as under these circumstances the said deceased might possibly have made a subsequent will unknown to those about her, her said executor, previous to applying for probate of the will of August, 1797, offered by public advertisements a reward of (a) It was considered advisable on the part of the executor to object to the relevancy of this reply, as containing matter not in any way responsive to the protest; and the validity of that objection was formally submitted to the Court, and argued by counsel (a rather unusual proceeding) on the first session of Michaelmas Term, 1825: but the Court overruled the objection, deeming the reply not so clearly irrelevant as absolutely on the face of it to exempt the executor from the obligation of rejoining; leaving it, however, to the executor either to rejoin or to conclude the act as it stood at his own option. But until the act was concluded the Court declined expressing any opinion as to the relevancy, either wholly or in part, of the reply, save only that it was not so irrelevant as to justify the Court in taking the step prayed by the executor of expunging it wholly or in part, or deeming it expunged, from the act. Had the executor not rejoined upon any matter in the reply, ultimately held not irrelevant by the Court, he of course would have been the sufferer by this.

The Court in overruling this objection reserved the question of the costs occasioned by it. But in the end, in dismissing the protest with costs, it excepted those occasioned by the hearing on the objection to the relevancy of the reply taken by the executor, as stated above; as conceiving it a step in the cause not called for or warranted by the circumstances.

500l. for the actual production of any subsequent will of the deceased; but that no such subsequent will or draft or trace or vestige of any subsequent will was produced in consequence of such advertisements and offered reward—that the papers burnt and destroyed by the mother, shortly after the death of the deceased, were papers of no moment; and that no subsequent [249] will of the deceased was probably burnt or destroyed among these, as suggested on the other side—that the will of 1797 was found by the mother, as she herself had deposed; and not by the said Maria Walthew, as now sought to be represented—that the mother of the deceased, a shrewd woman, and conversant with business and accounts, was fully apprised of her own sole heirship in the event of her daughter's intestacy; and was also fully apprised that such her daughter's intestacy might not improbably be set up, provided her marriage with Fisher could be proved to have been a lawful marriage—lastly, that the parties benefited by the will were strangers to the executor and his family; who were on terms of intimacy with and warmly attached to the mother and son of the deceased; so that the said executor would not by choice have postponed the interest of these last to that of the legatees in the will, by taking probate of the will; in preference to advising the mother to apply for administration as in a case of intestacy.

In support of the protest affidavits are exhibited of Mr. Burchell, the executor; of his son, Mr. John Burchell; and of three others; fully sustaining the facts stated, in the act of Court, on the part of the executor, both in chief and in the rejoinder.

In support of the reply were also exhibited, on the part of Mr. Braham, several affidavits (twelve in number), principally to the following effect.

Mr. Braham stated his belief of the facts alleged on his behalf; and certificates of the alleged marriage of the deceased with Fischer, or Fisher, at Vienna, in 1784, were exhibited annexed to his affidavit.

Mr. Douglas Kinnaird deposed to having understood, [250] from the deceased, that her son would enjoy the bulk of her property—and that he, Mr. Kinnaird, was to be one of her executors, and trustee for her said son, jointly with Mr. Soane.

Louisa Cook deposed that Elizabeth Storace, the mother of the deceased, told her, the deponent, on several occasions, that "she thought her said daughter must have made a will subsequent to the will proved;" and that the will proved was found in her presence, by Maria Walthew, among a bundle of old papers—also, that in her search for a will she had found the envelope of a will, but there being no will enclosed had burnt the said envelope. She also deposed to the perfect confidence of the mother in Mr. Burchell, and to the mother saying that she had submitted to the old will, under his advice, as an inevitable evil, since no other will could be found; though she was satisfied the deceased had made another will.

Mr. Michael Kelly stated that he knew the deceased at Vienna in 1784, when and where Elizabeth Storace, the mother of the deceased, was resident with her said daughter—that he well remembered Fisher's alleged marriage with the deceased; at which he had no doubt that he was, though he had no distinct recollection of having been, present, as alleged. He also spoke to the cohabitation for a twelvemonth, and to the then separation of the parties; and to Fisher's death at Sligo, as alleged in the act.

Maria Walthew deposed to the deceased having often in conversation recognized her marriage with Fisher as a valid marriage—and that the same was often spoken of and adverted to as such, both by the deceased herself and by her mother, Elizabeth Storace—[251] also to the will in question having been found by her, the deponent, in an envelope, with the seal broken, in a bundle of old papers, on the Thursday following the deceased's death; after a search had been made on the Tuesday following (the deceased having died on a Sunday) among her papers for a will without effect—that after such search, and previous to the will being found, Elizabeth Storace informed her, the deponent, that "as no will was found she was sole heir to the deceased's property."

Tomaso Rovedino deposed to a conversation having taken place in June, 1817, between him and the deceased, in which she said that she intended to make Mr. Soane and Mr. Kinnaird her executors, and trustees for her son—that a few days after, having met the deponent, she talked to him as if then engaged in making her will—and on the 5th of the following July intimated that she had finished the same.

Lucy Brettell; Diana Barber, the deceased's servant; Maria Paddock, another servant of the deceased; and Mary Church, her nurse, deposed severally to circumstances inferring strongly the probability of a will made by the deceased at a late period of her life in favour of her son, William Spencer Harris Braham.

And most of the above several deponents spoke to the deceased's regard and affection for her said son, in the strongest and most explicit terms.

Lastly—Mr. Peter Ogier stated in his affidavit that a few months after the deceased's death, having heard that a will of the deceased, made by her during her coverture, had been acted upon; and having doubts as to the validity of such will, he, the deponent, called upon the mother of the deceased, who then admitted to [252] him that the said will had been made during her daughter's coverture, but said that under advice that she, the mother, could not oppose the said will, she had consented, reluctantly, to probate being taken of the same.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The circumstances of this case are as follows:—

Anna Selina Storace, the deceased in the cause, died on the 17th of August, 1817. Her will, the subject of the suit, bears date on the 10th of August, 1797. It is a will all in her own hand-writing; it is duly executed; and it is attested by two persons, the clerks of Mr. Buxton, a solicitor in Great Marlborough-street, who appears to have furnished the deceased with a draft of the will.

By this will she directs, in the first place, that the sum of 5000l. East India Stock, standing in the names of trustees, but which she describes as "her property," shall, from and immediately after her decease, be transferred to and vested in other trustees, Mr. Prince Hoare and Mr. Joseph Burchell (party in the cause), upon trust to pay and apply the interest and annual produce to her mother, Elizabeth Storace, for life; and then to her nephew, Brinsley John Storace, until he attains the age of twenty-five; and upon his attaining that age, to pay and transfer the principal sum to her said nephew, absolutely: but in the event of her said nephew dying under twenty-five, she gives and bequeaths the said 5000l. to the children of her cousin, Emely Toosey, in equal proportions, upon their attaining their ages of twenty-five respectively. She limits or appoints the use of her household furniture, plate, linen, &c., to her mother for life; and then over; the [253] same in all respects as the sum of 5000l., East India Stock. She bequeaths the sum of 700l. to two aunts, of the name of Trusler; the sum of 500l. to her brother's widow, Mary Storace, together with all her wearing-apparel, her harp, and her music; the sum of 500l. to Mr. Rauzzini, of Bath; the sum of 50l. to each of her trustees, Mr. Hoare and Mr. Burchell; to Mr. John Braham the sum of 2000l.; to the old and new Musical Funds the sum of 1000l. each; and the rest and residue, after a few other legacies of small amount, to the children of her said cousin, Emely Toosey, and to Miss Emma White, in equal proportions. And she appoints Mr. Joseph Burchell and Mrs. Mary Storace, her brother's widow (but who died in her life time), executor and executrix of her said will.

This will, such as I have described it, both in form and substance, was found in her bureau, shortly after the death of the deceased, among other papers of moment and concern, by Elizabeth Storace, her mother, and sole next of kin. But there being some reason to believe or suspect that the deceased had made another later will, Mr. Burchell, the surviving executor, delays, from time to time, applying for probate of this, until every diligence had been used for the purpose of ascertaining whether the deceased really left any testamentary instrument of a subsequent date. Among other means used for the discovery of such an instrument, three several advertisements were inserted in as many daily journals, offering a reward of 500l. for the production of any will of the deceased, subsequent to that of August, 1797. Still, however, no will of a later date is produced; nor even do those advertisements produce information from any quarter tending [254] to shew that the deceased in this cause ever put pen to paper, either to frame or to execute any other will than that already described of August, 1797. At length, in the month of October, 1817, probate is taken of this will by Mr. Burchell, the executor, in common form, upon an affidavit of the mother, as to the finding and plight and condition of the will; such an affidavit being necessary to probate of the will passing in common form, in consequence of an erasure in the body of the will; in which, as originally executed, Mr. Buxton, her then solicitor, was also named an executor.

It is alleged and sworn that the executor, Mr. Burchell, in so taking probate of the will, was urged and pressed to this by the mother, and sole next of kin of the deceased; that is, by the person entitled both to represent the deceased, and to the whole of her property, in the event of her actual or legal intestacy. This, at least, is certain, that she was not only privy, but a party, to the probate. She makes the affidavit to which I have just adverted, in order to its being proved, and so in support of the will. In that affidavit I observe that the deceased is described "Anna Selina Storace, spinster."

Probate is taken, then, of this will of August, 1797, clearly with the knowledge and consent of the mother, the only person who had any apparent either right or interest to contest its validity. She survives (the mother) till the month of May, 1821; and it is admitted that, during that whole interval, she is both acquiescent in the will, and even actively co-operating in giving effect to, and carrying into execution, the provisions and bequests contained in it, in every possible variety of ways. For instance, she is in the receipt of [255] the income derived to her from the will, and gives discharges for the same, from time to time, to the executor, up to the period of her own decease. She furnishes the executor with the names and descriptions, and assists him in the discovery, of the persons entitled to the residue, the bulk, of the deceased's property, under the will. In the year 1818 the executor, finding that several of the residuary legatees are minors and orphans, declines proceeding to a full distribution of the property, under the will, without the sanction of the Court of Chancery. A suit, an amicable suit, is accordingly commenced in Chancery in the month of May, 1818, and continues till the month of August, 1822. The mother is constantly consulted and advised with, as to that suit, by the executor; and is sworn on many occasions to have assisted in respect to the same at all times until she herself died in May, 1821.

During this suit in Chancery the executors' accounts are passed in the Court of Chancery; and the whole of the deceased's property remaining unapplied is paid by the executor into the registry of that Court. And it appears that in the month of June, 1824, at the issuing of this decree, the deceased's property had been all but fully administered, pursuant to the provisions of this will; as all the several legatees and all the residuary legatees, excepting one, who was still a minor at that time, had received their legacies and shares of the residue under this will at that time by order of the Court of Chancery.

The executor, of course, conceives upon this that he is functus officio—that he is entitled to his full discharge, and that he is not liable to any further call. But in [256] the month of June, 1824, a decree issues citing him to bring in the probate and support the validity of this will of August, 1797, then for the first time questioned by evidence, at the instance of Mr. William Spencer Harris Braham (the other party in the cause), a reputed or natural son of the deceased, by Mr. John Braham, himself a legatee in the will in the sum of 2000l.; with whom the deceased appears to have cohabited for a number of years.

It is obvious from this that the present plaintiff is not proceeding as such in his own right. He is proceeding as administrator, with the will annexed, of Elizabeth Storace, the mother of the deceased; who, principally, it should seem, under the advice or at the recommendation of Mr. Burchell, his opponent in this cause, made a will bequeathing him her whole property. Accordingly, it is in her right, and as her representative only, that he claims to controvert this will.

Now could the mother of the deceased, had she been living, after an interval of seven years have cited the executor, according to the terms of this decree, under the circumstances already described? This is clearly a proper subject of inquiry, for it can only be upon some special shewing that her representative is entitled to go a step in this matter beyond what she herself, the party whom he represents, could have gone.

In the first place, in doing this, she must have deposited, in the first instance, the actual amount of what, in the interval of seven years she had received or derived from or under the will. Every legatee who puts in suit the validity of a will in this Court must bring into and leave in the registry of this Court the [257] amount of his legacy, if paid, to abide the event of that suit.(a) The mother of the deceased must have conformed to this rule; nor is her grandson and representative exempt from a similar obligation. Accordingly, if Mr. Braham can be permitted and is willing to proceed in this suit, he must clearly deposit, in limine, the actual amount of monies received by his testatrix under the will of the deceased. He must also, possibly, deposit, in limine, what interest has accrued upon the legacy of 2000l. bequeathed, as I have said, to his father, Mr. John Braham, since the death of the deceased. For it appears that Mr. John Braham, the father, on the death of the deceased, directed that legacy to be invested in the names of trustees for the benefit of his son, the present plaintiff; and that he, the present plaintiff, has since received, and still receives, the produce or interest of that legacy. He has, consequently, himself benefited, derivatively at least, under this will to the extent of the interest which has accrued upon the sum of 2000l. for the last nine years. At the same time these, to be sure, are mere outlying considerations. Neither, possibly, might the mother of the deceased have been, nor may her grandson and representative now be, deterred from putting it in suit by the obligation of making certain deposits previous to contesting this will.

Could, then, the mother of the deceased, having fulfilled this condition, have instituted a proceeding similar to the present in the month of June, 1824? On the contrary, would not she have been barred (and by [258] consequence is not her representative barred, unless upon some special shewing), as by acquiescence in the will or otherwise, from putting this will in suit at that time? In order to determine this, it becomes necessary to consider what the alleged or suggested grounds of the invalidity of the will really are. And in considering this I shall be necessarily led to say with how little probability of success in my judgment, so far as appears, the validity of this will either now is, or at any time was, capable of being contested by any party. For I may say, once for all, that the case now suggested, as in objection to the protest, is obviously the same in substance upon which, being pleaded and proved, it is ultimately meant to be relied in opposition to the will.

It is suggested then, as in objection to the protest, and it is ultimately, as just said, meant to be pleaded and proved as in opposition to the will, that the will in question was a will made by the deceased in and during her coverture—and that not having recognised or republished it in and during her widowhood, it is by consequence a will that is merely null and void in law. And in order to defeat, I presume, the effect of certain declarations proved to have been made by the deceased—as that "she was testate," and that "her will was to her satisfaction;" which might otherwise be contended to have amounted to a republication of the will in question, it is suggested that these were not declarations meant by the deceased to apply to this but to some other will; which it is accordingly suggested that the deceased made shortly before her death, and in which she bequeathed the bulk of her property to her son, the present plaintiff. Now to con-[259]-sider the case so set up in both parts of it: and first, as to the suggestion of this being a will made during coverture.

I. It is alleged in the act on petition on the part of Mr. Braham, the plaintiff, that the deceased in this cause, at that time Anna Selina Storace, spinster, was lawfully married to Johann Abraham, otherwise Abraham Fischer, otherwise Fisher, at Vienna, on the 29th of March, 1784; and that he, Fischer or Fisher, died at Sligo, in Ireland, where he had for some time previously resided, not until the year 1805; consequently not until seven or eight years, as appears by the date, subsequent to the making and execution of this will.

The facts so alleged are supported by a variety of affidavits, which it is to be observed are only good in support of this case as a suggested case; that is, as laying grounds for the Court to over-rule the protest of the executor, and put him on proof of the will. They are facts to be regularly pleaded and proved, not to be merely alleged in an act on petition and sustained by voluntary affidavits in order to be of any final avail in the cause, the executor being put on proof of the will. But to what does the proof of the facts so furnished by these affidavits, and by the "certificate of marriage" annexed to one of them amount, in support of this case, as a suggested case?

It amounts to strong proof of a fact of marriage between Fisher and the deceased at the time alleged. But I see no reason to believe from it, under all the circumstances, that a valid marriage was ever contracted by and between these parties, either then or at any other time. On the contrary, there is much in the case as to which there is no dispute; there are many [260] facts as to which the parties are agreed—which look directly the other way. This is evidenced, I think, to some extent, by the previous and by all the subsequent history and conduct of the parties.

The deceased at and previous to the time of this marriage was, and had been, an actress, performing at the principal theatre in Vienna; and Fischer, or Fisher, was a composer of music attached to that establishment. The marriage is alleged to have been celebrated in the evangelic reformed church in that city; and "certificates" of that marriage are exhibited, it should seem, duly verified. One of the two persons present as "witnesses" of the marriage (so certified) appears by these to have been Mr. Michael Kelly, the composer, whose affidavit is before the Court; in which he says that he perfectly recollects the occasion of the marriage certified, which he has no doubt whatever took place as certified; and that he was, though he has no distinct recollection of having been, present at the ceremony; he perfectly remembers, he says, having had a suit of clothes made on the occasion of the marriage. This is strong evidence, I repeat, of the suggested fact of marriage; but looking, not invidiously, to the known lax habits too often indulged in by theatrical performers, especially on foreign boards, it is by no means improbable, a priori, that it was a mere fact of marriage within the knowledge of both parties—serviceable to both parties as for obviating scandal or otherwise at the time; but imposing upon either party no lasting obligation. And this view of the case, which, it will presently appear, is confirmed by the whole subsequent history of the parties, derives a still further confirmation from what occurs on the death of the deceased—[261] when the mother, living, for so it appears, with the deceased at the time, and so privy, I must presume, to all the circumstances of the marriage, makes an affidavit in which she deposes to her daughter having died a spinster—so deposing in support of a will which she is apprised at the time, as I shall shew in the sequel, that her daughter's lawful marriage with Fisher would probably invalidate; when she, as the sole next of kin of the deceased, would become absolutely entitled to the representation of the deceased, and to the whole of her property.

But the subsequent history of the parties infers this to have been a mere fact of marriage, I think, almost conclusively. The parties cohabit during about twelve months only, in the course of which they have a son, who dies in his infancy. They then separate, and such their cohabitation is never renewed. The deceased returns to this country, where she resumes her maiden name; the use of which she continues uninterruptedly to the time of her death. Nor is it merely by passing under her maiden name that the deceased herself thus repudiates her marriage. She acts as a feme sole during the whole remainder of her life in all respects; her conduct in every particular of which plainly infers that she at least deemed her marriage with Fisher invalid in law.

But the whole subsequent conduct of Fisher himself furnishes the same inference still more strongly. He lived till 1805 in straitened circumstances; earning a precarious livelihood by teaching music at and in the neighbourhood of Sligo in Ireland. Meantime, Storace's fame as an actress could be no secret to him; any more than it could be that she had acquired a large [262] fortune, or at least was in the receipt of a large income. There is no vestige, however, with all this, of any attempt on his part either to possess himself of her fortune or even to participate in her income. There was much besides equally notorious in the history of the deceased, under which Fisher, if the lawful husband of the deceased, could scarcely have acquiesced as he did. The deceased in 1796 forms a connexion with Mr. Braham, by whom she becomes the mother of several children, though Mr. Spencer Harris Braham is the only survivor of these; a connexion which subsists up to the year 1812. Fisher must have known all along of that connexion; he must have been aware from time to time of the birth of a spurious issue, the fruit of that connexion, which still, in the eye of the law, were his issue, if he, in truth, were the lawful husband of the deceased. And it is utterly inconsistent, I think, with a knowledge or belief of this on his part, that he should be perfectly quiescent in the deceased's connexion with Mr. Braham for the nine years during which he survived its commencement; neither instituting any complaint nor soliciting any, either protection or redress.

Upon the whole, then, it seems to the Court that the deceased was not, upon this shewing, as suggested, a feme covert in law at the time of the making and execution of this will. But even if she were, I am by no means satisfied that this, as assumed on the part of Mr. Braham, would, per se, under any circumstances, have rendered this will absolutely null and void in law. If ever there was a case in which the circumstance of its being the will of a married woman ought not, in point of equity, to have the effect of wholly invalidating [263] a will, it is the case before the Court. For what is the will in this case? It is the will of a married woman (assuming the deceased to have been such in law at the date of the will) made a dozen years after her final separation from her husband, and disposing of the fruits of her own sole industry—of monies, that is, which she herself had acquired whilst acting throughout in her single capacity, and passing all along by her maiden name. Now could Fisher, if the survivor even, by proving himself ever so incontestably to have been the lawful husband of the deceased, have defeated this will to the extent of rendering it a mere nullity in law and so to be treated by this Court? I entertain, perhaps, strong doubts of this. A married woman who possesses separate property may dispose of that separate property by will independent of her husband, and just as if she were a feme sole. The property so acquired by the deceased, as I have described, which the husband had never in her lifetime reduced into his own possession, and over which he had never attempted to exercise any marital right, might well be the separate property of the deceased; over which, accordingly, she had a perfect jus disponendi, though, at the time of exercising it, a lawful wife. Part of the property of which this will purports to dispose I observe to have been vested in the hands of trustees, to the use of the deceased—a circumstance not quite immaterial; though a wife, it is now held, may dispose of her separate property by will, whether vested in the hands of trustees to her separate use or not. Upon this view of the case I am by no means clear that, even if Fisher had survived the deceased, and had proved himself ever so incontestably, I repeat, to have been her lawful hus-[264]-band, it might still not have been incumbent on this Court (whose principal concern is with the "factum" of an instrument of this nature) to have decreed probate of this will (of course, in that event, a limited probate) to Mr. Burchell, the executor; leaving the wife's assumed right of disposal to be questioned, if at all, in another Court; the jus disponendi, the right of disposal, in these cases, being a question into which this Court is not in the habit of looking too nicely; as it is a question upon which, in effect, it is not competent to this Court ultimately to adjudicate.

But Fisher, assuming him still to have been the lawful husband, was not the survivor—he died in the lifetime of the deceased. And we all know that if a wife makes a will, being intestable at the time of the will making; still if, surviving, she approves and confirms (in a word, republishes) that will after the death of the husband, it is a good will. Now that the deceased, if there be no other will in question, did approve and confirm (in effect, republish) this will, is indisputable. The mere conservation for so many years of this will, in connexion with its place of deposit, may so evidence adherence to, and approval of, this will as to amount to a republication of it, for any thing that I am prepared to say to the contrary. But however this be, her repeated and even solemn declarations,(a) to [265] which I have already adverted, if applicable to, are clearly a virtual republication of, this will—so that in the absence of any other will to which the Court can safely apply those declarations, this is a will equally good and valid in law, to all intents and purposes whatsoever, whether the testatrix were a feme covert at the time of making it or a feme sole.

II. Can the Court, then, safely apply these declarations to any other will than this of August, 1797? And this leads me briefly to consider that other part of the case now set up, which consists of a suggestion that the declarations in question were not meant by the deceased to apply to this will of 1797 (and consequently that the Court ought not so to apply them; which, if it ought, as already said, there is an end of the plaintiff's case, whether the deceased were a married woman in 1797 or a spinster), but to that other will which she is suggested to have made towards the end of her life, and by which she bequeathed the bulk of her fortune to her son, the party promoting this suit.

(a) The Court here adverted, in particular, to an affidavit of Dr. Hooper, the deceased's medical attendant during her last illness (exhibited on behalf of the executor), in which he deposed that "a few days previous to the death of the deceased, he, the deponent, being of opinion that she could not recover from her said illness, inquired of the said deceased, in the presence of Miss Walthew and, he thinks, of the mother of the deceased, 'if she had arranged her worldly affairs?' to which she immediately replied, 'I have made my will'—that the deponent thereupon asked her, 'whether her will was to her satisfaction?' when she answered 'Yes,' or to that very effect."

In proof of this part of the suggested case, as of that other of which the Court has already disposed, there are exhibited, on the part of Mr. Braham, a variety of affidavits. But to what extent are these affidavits good? Merely to this extent. They render it, a priori, highly probable that the deceased should have executed a later will of this tenor—they even shew that the deceased contemplated the execution of some such will. But they fail even to render it probable, as contrasted with the adverse [266] evidence and looking to all the circumstances of the case, that the deceased ever did actually execute any subsequent will. On the one hand, the deceased's declarations on that head, as spoken to in these affidavits (although mere declarations, especially stated in voluntary affidavits, are little relied on by the Court in matters of this nature) are good in proof that the deceased had a strong regard and affection for her son—["as strong a regard and affection," several of the affidavits express it, "as a mother could have for a son"] and contemplated making a provision for him as such. This, too, is confirmed by what Mr. Joseph Burchell, the executor, has deposed, namely, that within a few months of her decease she, the deceased, required of him or of his son, Mr. John Burchell, her solicitor, the legal names and description of her said son, for the very purpose of inserting them correctly in, of course, her then intended will. This is precise to the fact of intention; though it is equally so to the fact of intention not then carried into effect—a few months only, this, before the death of the deceased. But on the other hand, I am to recollect that there are circumstances in the case which account for the deceased not making this contemplated disposition of her property, at least not improbably. For it is in evidence that the deceased was extremely irritated at all times with Mr. John Braham, the father of this son; who had abandoned her in 1812, after a cohabitation of sixteen years, and married another female; that she had even consulted and advised with the Burchells as to whether the father were not compellable by law to provide wholly or in part for that son—observing that "he ought so to do, more especially as he was possessed [267] of a large fortune and in the receipt of an ample income;" and adding that "if she, the deceased, were to give or leave her son a fortune, it would only furnish the father with a pretext or excuse for doing nothing for him; and be the means of his saving his money to enrich his children by the female for whom she had been abandoned." All this is stated by Mr. Burchell and his son in their affidavits —affidavits full as credible as any exhibited in the cause. And that the deceased might probably act upon this view of the subject is confirmed, to some extent, by the contents of this will of August, 1797, itself—in which, notwithstanding her subsisting connexion with Mr. Braham, and that she was bearing children to him (though whether any child was actually born in August, 1797, does not quite appear), she is content with a legacy to him of 2000*l.*—leaving him, it is to be inferred, to provide for the children of that connexion, and disposing of the bulk of her property, the produce of her own talents and industry, to her own relations. And when, upon the death of the deceased, and after the extraordinary pains taken and means used for the discovery of a subsequent will that I have already described, no subsequent will is produced, nor any thing tending to shew that the deceased ever actually made such a will, I must say that the balance of probability is, in my judgment, very much against the case set up (this part of it), that the deceased, whatever at times she might have meant or intended in that respect, ever actually made and executed any will revocatory of this of August, 1797.

But did the proof of the suggested case (this part of it) go much further; did it render, not merely the in-[268]-tention to execute, but the actual execution of, a later will by her ever so probable; could the Court, let me ask, upon that mere probability, however founded, pronounce against the force and effect of this, the only subsisting will? Surely not. What could even proof made of a subsequent will do? Only this—render it questionable whether this will of August, 1797 (the prior will in that event), were an operative will. For even if the deceased were proved to have made a latter will, revocatory of the former will, still, no such latter will being forthcoming on the death of the deceased, the legal inference would be that she herself had destroyed it; for there is no proof whatever of the suggestion that it was destroyed by the mother, inadvertently, after the death of the deceased. Now if the deceased herself destroyed the latter revocatory will, the former will might well revive; so that even proof made (of which there is none) of the actual execution of a latter will by the deceased would only render the force and validity of this prior will questionable; it would, by no means, infer it null and void in law.

Upon the whole, I am clearly of opinion that it would not have been competent to the mother of the deceased, had she been living, to have put the executor on proof of this will, after an interval of seven years, upon any such grounds as are now suggested. The mother was the deceased's sole next of kin. At the time when probate was taken by the executor she apparently entertained no doubts of the validity, although she might, and no doubt did, regret the existence of this will: but even supposing that she did entertain any such doubts, she was at liberty to waive those doubts; and her conduct throughout, already [269] described, to the period of her own decease, nearly amounts, I think, to a full waiver of them. She urges the executor to take probate; she is a party to its being taken; she acquiesces in the will, and is even active in giving it effect in a variety of ways. The executor, it has been said in argument, should have proved this will, per testes, at the time: but against whom was he to have done this, and to what effect? The mother, the sole next of kin, and who alone had a right to oppose, was before the Court, sustaining the will; and what could a mere examination of the subscribed witnesses to the factum of the will have done in support of it? they would doubtless have proved the mere factum of the will; but this, the mere factum of the will, as it ever was, so it still is, unquestioned by any party.

Could, however, her representative do, in June, 1824, what the mother of the deceased herself, if then living, can not have done? If he could, as already said, this can only be upon some special shewing. His legal advisers were aware of this; and accordingly they have suggested, in effect, in order to meet this legal exigency, that the mother of the deceased, at the time of her daughter's death, was an old woman, upwards of eighty years of age, who placed implicit confidence in the Mr. Burchells (father and son); and that her conduct throughout in the matter of her daughter's will was solely owing, and ought only to be ascribed, to her ignorance or misapprehension of her own legal rights, in the event of her daughter's intestacy in law; which ignorance or misapprehension on her part is also suggested to have been owing to the misrepresentations, [270] at the time of the two Mr. Burchells, made in order to induce her not to contest the will.

Of these two suggestions, the first is not only without proof; it is against proof: it is in proof that the mother acted with the full knowledge and apprehension of her own legal rights, in the event of her daughter's intestacy; and that she was a sensible woman, well acquainted with money matters and accounts, and perfectly conversant with matters of business, in which (that is, in such of them as any way interested or concerned herself) she always took an active part, even up to the time of her own decease in 1821, four years subsequent to that of her daughter in 1817. A series of her letters is before the Court, written in all those years, fully inferring this; and evidencing that she was not a likely person to place implicit reliance on any advice operating to her own wrong, or in her own prejudice. As to that other suggestion, of any such advice having been given her by the executor at the time to induce her not to contest the will, it is a suggestion equally against proof as the first, and it is one still more destitute of probability. I am satisfied that the mother was not only fully apprised of what her rights, as sole next of kin, would have been if her daughter could be shewn to have died intestate; but that she was fully apprised of these by Mr. Burchell, the executor, himself, and by his son, Mr. John Burchell, her solicitor, as he had been that of the deceased; and that it was distinctly pointed out to her at the time, by both the Mr. Burchells, that if the will of her daughter was made during her coverture, it might be invalid, when she would become entitled as her sole next of kin to the [271] whole of her property. So far again as respects the probability of the suggestion, the probability is, that Mr. Burchell, instead of acting the part imputed to him, would have done the very contrary. He had no interest in sustaining the will; to the parties principally benefited by and under it he was an utter stranger, even by name. On the other hand, he was on terms of great intimacy with the mother of the deceased, and well knew, and apparently was warmly attached to the plaintiff, her grandson. Under these circumstances I am bound to conclude that his wishes and feelings would have led him to impeach this will, had any grounds of legal impeachment suggested themselves to his mind at the time; instead, as imputed to him, of going out of his way, and betraying the confidence reposed in him, in order to give it force and validity.

Finally, could the mother of the deceased, and can her representative, if permitted so to do, embark in this suit with any probable hope of success? The observations that have already fallen from the Court furnish an obvious answer to this inquiry. The utmost to which the case now suggested could extend, were nearly every part of it put in plea and formally proved,(a)[1] would be to make it questionable whether the will of 1797 revived or not, on the destruction, by the deceased, of the subsequent revocatory will; assuming it to be proved, that is, that the deceased actually made [272] and executed a subsequent revocatory will; for the suggested inadvertent destruction of such subsequent will, by the mother, after the death of the deceased, is a mere suggestion, and one that is plainly incapable of proof. And I am satisfied that, under these circumstance, I am providing best for the interest of all parties, as well as doing the executor a mere act of justice, in admitting his protest, and dismissing the present suit. But I am also satisfied that I should be doing him imperfect justice in not dismissing the suit with costs; (a)[2] especially considering that he, the executor, is in possession of no funds whatever of the deceased; so that, if left by the Court to pay his own costs, he must do this de bonis propriis; and that his opponent has acquired, derivatively at least, a considerable property under the very will now sought to be controverted.

THOMPSON v. DIXON. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 1826.—An executor who has renounced, in order to his becoming a witness in a suit commenced touching the validity of the will, may, at the termination of such suit, retract his renunciation, and take probate of the will.

(On motion.)

Fanny Mortiboys, the party deceased, died in the month of January, 1826, leaving a will, of which she appointed William Welch Lea and Edward Thompson executors, who were duly sworn, as executors, on the 15th day of March following; but a caveat having been entered, and an appearance subsequently given on behalf of Mary Dixon, widow, a second cousin once removed, and (pretended) next of kin of the deceased, [273] William Welch Lea, one of the executors, duly renounced the probate and execution of the will—in order, this, to his being, in future, examined as a witness in support of the will in the suit so commenced touching its validity.

In consequence, however, of the termination of that suit by the proctor for the said Mary Dixon, declaring that he "proceeded no further" in the suit, the executor, William Welch Lea, had retracted his renunciation of the probate and execution of the will, whereupon

The Court was prayed, and was now pleased, on motion of counsel, to decree probate of the said will to the said William Welch Lea, jointly with the other executor; the said William Welch Lea being first resworn as executor.

Motion granted.

IN THE GOODS OF WILLIAM THORNTON, Deceased. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 1826.—One of several executors who has renounced may, after the deaths of his co-executors who have proved the will, retract his renunciation and take probate, as a matter of course. But the same right does not accrue to an executor who has renounced, after administration, with the will annexed, granted; from the possible inconvenience that might accrue, in other quarters, if the chain of executorship, once broken, were thus suffered to revive.—Nor may administration, with the will annexed, be then granted to such executor; a residuary legatee, if any, being preferably entitled—if there be no residuary legatee, a next of kin.

(On motion.)

William Thornton, the party deceased in this cause, died in the year 1822; having made his will, and thereof appointed George Dodd and Charles Parsons executors.

(a)[1] That is, were the whole of that case pleaded and proved, except that part of it which suggested that the (latter) will was inadvertently burnt by the mother, after the death of the deceased; which was a mere suggestion, and one plainly incapable of being proved.

(a)[2] With a certain exception, however, as to a part of the costs, for which, see note (a), p. 247.

In the month of October, 1822, administration, with the will annexed, issued to Mar-[274]-garet Thornton, widow, as the residuary legatee for life named in the will, on the renunciation of the said executors; and she was lately dead, leaving effects of the deceased unadministered. Mr. Parsons, one of the executors, upon this, retracted his renunciation; and the Court was now moved by counsel to admit this retractation, and to decree probate of the will of the deceased to Mr. Parsons, as one of his executors.

In support of the motion it was submitted that an executor, after a renunciation and probate or administration granted, had still a right to probate whenever a vacancy occurred in the representation of the deceased. After a probate granted, this was said to be recognised by the practice of the office, which was in the constant habit of permitting one of several executors who had renounced, after the death of his co-executors who had proved the will, to retract that renunciation, and to take probate as a matter of course. It was now contended, on the authority of a passage in Mr. Toller's Law of Executors,(a) that the same right accrued to an executor after administration, with a will annexed, granted, although the office, it was said, had objected to this on the ground of the possible inconvenience that might accrue, in other quarters, from chains of execu-[275]-torship once broken, being thus suffered to revive. Should this deceased, for instance, it was objected by the office, have been the surviving executor of other testators, and should administrations have been granted of their effects, on the renunciation of his executors, if the chain of executorship were to revive, as now proposed, there would be double and conflicting representations of such testators; the one by grant of administration, as above; the other, by the revived chain of executorship.

The Court was of opinion upon this state of facts that the objection raised by the office was a valid objection—and there being, so far as appeared, no instance of, or precedent for, a grant of this description in the office, declined acceding to the motion.

It was then prayed that administration with the will annexed might issue to Mr. Parsons, the executor; by which means the objection raised by the office would be obviated. This would preclude, it was said, a revived chain of executorship, and, consequently, the occurrence of the inconvenience suggested by the office; and still give the representation to the executor, who was submitted to be entitled to it. But,

Per Curiam. Parsons is not the residuary legatee—the wife was residuary legatee for life only; and there is no residuary legatee substituted. Under these circumstances, as the next of kin are before the Court, praying the administration, they have clearly, I think, a preferable title to it.

Motion refused.

[276] Cox v. Cox. Consistory Court, Trinity Term, 4th Session, 1826.—An allotment of alimony pendente lite reduced, on proof that the husband was no longer in a condition to aliment the wife pendente lite, at the rate originally assigned.—This, on motion, founded upon the mere affidavit of the husband—the husband's prayer being, in effect, unopposed by the wife.

(On motion.)

This was a cause or business of restitution of conjugal rights, promoted by Frances Charlotte Cox, wife of Robert Albion Cox, Esquire, against the said Robert Albion Cox.

The citation was returned on the first session of Hilary Term, 1825; and a libel in common form, brought in on the third session of that term, was admitted without opposition; the husband's proctor, at the same time, confessing the marriage, as pleaded.

On the same day the proctor for the wife brought in an allegation of faculties;

(a) See Toller's Law of Executors, vol. i. c. 3, s. 1, where, after speaking of the renunciation of an executor, and grant of administration with the will annexed, he continues, "After such administration, the executor cannot retract his refusal during the lifetime of the administrator; but he may do so after the administrator's death."

See, too, Roberts on Wills, vol. ii. part 6, c. 2, s. 1, who says on the same point, "After administration granted he," the executor, "cannot assume the execution during the life of the administrator, but after his death he may retract his renunciation, however formally made."

which was afterwards admitted, also without opposition: and on the husband's answers to that allegation of faculties, admitting a (then present) income of 1680l. per annum, the Court, on the second session of Trinity Term in that year, allotted as alimony to the wife, pending the suit, the sum of 300l. per annum; to commence from the return of the citation, and to be paid quarterly.

The present was an application to the Court to reduce the alimony so allotted to the wife pending the suit; founded upon an affidavit of the husband that, "subsequent to his answers to the allegation of faculties, given in the cause, and the allotment of alimony thereon his salary, as one of the commissioners for [277] settling Spanish claims" (admitted in the answers at 1500l.), "had been reduced to 1000l. per annum, which reduction had commenced from the 5th day of April preceding;" and also that "his receipts as collector of the orphan dues, within the port of London" (returned in the answers at 150l. per annum), "had produced in the last year the sum of 80l. only." And this sum of 1080l. per annum, together with an average sum of 30l. per annum, payable to the husband for his attendance as a member of the court of assistants of the Goldsmiths' Company, was sworn by the husband to constitute his only then present income.

Upon this state of facts, uncontradicted on the part of the wife,

The Court was pleased to reduce the wife's alimony, pending suit, to the sum of 220l. per annum; to commence payable at that rate from and after the next quarterly payment, made under the original decree.(a)[1]

KING v. SANSOM, OTHERWISE KING. Consistory Court, Trinity Term, 1826.—A marriage by license null and void, by reason of minority and want of legal consent, under 26 Geo. II. c. 33, held to be rendered a good and valid marriage by the retrospective operation of 3 Geo. IV. c. 75—it being held that the parties, though not actually cohabiting up to the time of the passing of 3 Geo. IV. c. 75, did still "continue to live and reside together as husband and wife," in legal construction, within its true intent and meaning, up to that time, sufficiently to render the retrospective provisions of 3 Geo. IV. c. 75, applicable to such their marriage.

Judgment—Sir Christopher Robinson. This is a suit of nullity of marriage, promoted and brought by Charles King against "Mary Sansom, [278] falsely calling herself Mary King, and wife of the said Charles King," so described, at least, in the proceedings in the cause.

It is pleaded in the libel, and proved on the part of the husband, the promoter of the cause, that the marriage sought to be annulled was a marriage had by license, without the knowledge, privity, or consent of the father of the husband—the husband being a minor at that time, of little more than nineteen years of age; though, in order to the obtaining of his marriage license, he swore himself to have attained his majority. Consequently, under the statute 26 Geo. II. c. 33, the marriage in question, a marriage had in the year 1812, is clearly null and void in law; and the husband, de facto, is entitled to the sentence, declaring and pronouncing it so to be, which he now prays.

But a subsequent statute (a)[2] has by retrospective provisions ratified and confirmed marriages so null and void in their original construction as above, under certain circumstances—being—"where the parties had continued to live together, as husband and wife, till the death of one of them, or till the passing of the act;" or "had only discontinued their cohabitation for the purpose, or during the pending, of some proceeding touching the validity of their marriage." Is, or is not, the marriage in question rendered good and valid, [279] by the retrospective provisions of this subsequent statute?

The parties to this marriage are both still living; and it is pleaded and proved that at the time of the passing of this subsequent statute they, the parties, had not discontinued their cohabitation only for the purpose or during the pending of some proceeding touching the validity of their marriage. Accordingly, the question which arises upon this act as to the present validity or the contrary of the marriage in question is, and can only be, whether at that time, within the true intent and meaning of the act, the parties had discontinued their cohabitation at all? It is, in other words, whether they had or had not "continued to live together as husband and wife," in legal construction, within the true intent and meaning of the act, up to the time of the passing of 3 Geo. IV. c. 75, in July, 1822.

(a)[1] In this stage of the cause it soon after finally determined by the death of the defendant, the husband. An allegation had previously been filed, on behalf of the husband, pleading adultery committed by the wife, and praying a divorce.

(a)[2] Stat. 3 Geo. IV. c. 75; a statute still operative upon the marriage in question, by virtue of the saving, in 4 Geo. IV. c. 76 (the subsisting marriage act), sec. 1.

Now, in order to negative this; and consequently to sustain the nullity of the marriage in question, under the statute of 26 Geo. II. c. 33, notwithstanding the retrospective provisions of the statute of 3 Geo. IV. c. 75, it is pleaded and proved on the part of the husband that, "about ten months after the solemnization of the said marriage, an agreement was entered into between Charles King, the elder, Charles King, the younger, Mary Sansom, spinster, and John Sansom, father of the said Mary Sansom" [that is, between the parties in the cause and their fathers severally and respectively], "that they, the said Charles King, the younger, and the said Mary Sansom should live separate and apart from each other; and that the said Charles King, the elder, and Charles King, the younger, should execute a certain bond to the said [280] John Sansom, which said bond was duly executed by the said Charles King, the elder, and Charles King, the younger, on the 7th day of September, 1813—it being recited in that bond that 'Charles King, the younger, and Mary, his present wife, had agreed to live separate and apart from each other; and that the said Charles King, the younger, had proposed and agreed to pay and allow unto the said John Sansom, for the use and benefit of his said wife, and towards her separate maintenance, the sum of 5l. per annum; and that the said Charles King, the elder, had agreed to join his said son in a bond for the due and regular payment thereof,' and the bond itself conditioning accordingly." And it is also pleaded and proved (proved, possibly, to the utmost feasible extent) on the part of the husband, that "they, the said Charles King, the younger, and Mary Sansom, falsely calling herself King" (so pleaded), "had never" (actually) "lived and cohabited together as husband and wife, subsequent to the execution of the said bond in September, 1813." And it is upon this shewing that the Court is prayed to pronounce the marriage in question null and void, under the statute of George II., notwithstanding the retrospective provisions, to which I have adverted in the more recent act of his present Majesty.

But it appears to me that the parties in this cause did "continue to live together as husband and wife" until the passing of this more recent act, if not actually, or, in fact, still in legal construction, within the true intent and meaning of that act, so as to render this a good and valid marriage by its retrospective operation. Married persons separating, by mere voluntary agree-[281]-ment, without any legal sanction, are still, in the eye of the law, in a state of matrimonial cohabitation, how locally situate soever; and upon what terms soever of matrimonial intercourse. The actual separation of the parties in this case was without any reference apparently to doubts entertained by both or either as to the legal validity of their marriage. On the contrary, they separate by virtue, to some extent, of a deed, in which the party proceeded against is expressly recognised as the wife of the party proceeding in this suit—and by which a separate maintenance is provided for her expressly in that character. It is, in short, just such a mere separation as might have taken place between the parties, had their marriage not been faulty in its original construction—had the husband, for instance, been a major at that time; or, being a minor, had his father's consent been obtained; or had this, lastly, been a marriage had or celebrated in virtue of banns duly published. Accordingly their separation is one to which the law as administered in these Courts can be no party; it is a separation, in short, to which it can give no heed, and can shew no countenance. Under these circumstances, admitting it to be proved that these parties were not actually cohabiting up to the time of the passing of 3 Geo. IV. c. 75; still, in my judgment, they did "continue to live together as husband and wife," in legal construction within its true intent and meaning up to that time, sufficiently to bring the marriage within the retrospective provisions of that act. And the retrospective provisions of that act, if applicable to, clearly rendering this a good and valid marriage, I am bound, as deeming them so applicable, to withhold the declaratory sentence of its nul-[282]-lity now prayed by the husband; and I pronounce accordingly, by dismissing the wife from any further observance of justice in this suit.(a)[1]

STAYTE, OTHERWISE FARQUHARSON v. FARQUHARSON. Consistory Court, Trinity Term, By-Day, 1826.—A marriage had in virtue of false banns (the wife de facto personating, at the time of the marriage, the female as for whose marrage with the husband de facto, the banns had been published) pronounced null and void under the statute 26 Geo. II. c. 33, a statute still in force as to the particular marriage under 3 Geo. IV. c. 75, and 4 Geo. IV. c. 76.

This was a cause of nullity of marriage by reason of undue publication of banns, promoted by Elizabeth Stayte, spinster, falsely called Elizabeth, otherwise Mary, Farquharson, and wife of James Farquharson, against the said James Farquharson.

The libel pleaded in the several articles in substance—

1. The marriage act, 26 Geo. II. c. 33, and that the said act had not, as to the marriage in question, been repealed, but that the same was still in force.(a)[2]

2. That Elizabeth Stayte, spinster, party in the cause, was the daughter of Edward Stayte and Elizabeth, his wife, of Woodstock in the county of Oxford; and was baptized in the parish church of Woodstock on the 1st September, 1802, by the name of "Elizabeth" only: [283] and that an entry of such baptism was then and there duly made, a copy of which entry was in article.

3. Exhibited in supply of proof in the usual form.

4. That in the beginning of the year 1821 the said James Farquharson, being then a minor, paid his courtship and addresses to one Mary Hides, who consented to be married to him; and that banns of marriage were accordingly published, in the parish church of St. George, Hanover-square, on three successive Sundays in the month of April, in that year, between the said James Farquharson and the said Mary Hides; (a)[3] but that, notwithstanding, such intended marriage did not ultimately take place.

5. That at or about the time last-mentioned the said James Farquharson became also acquainted with the said Elizabeth Stayte, then also a minor, and paid his courtship and addresses to the said Elizabeth Stayte, who also consented to be married to him; and that the said James Farquharson, in order the more effectually to conceal such their intended marriage from their respective parents, prevailed on the said Elizabeth Stayte to marry him by the assumed names of Mary Hides, under and in virtue of the banns so published as aforesaid, as for the marriage of the said James Farquharson with the said Mary Hides.

6. The sixth article pleaded the said fact of marriage on the 21st of October, 1821; and the entry of the same in the marriage register-book of St. George, Hanover-square: in which book on which occasion she, the said Elizabeth Stayte, signed the names of [284] Mary Hides—that the said marriage was had without the consent of the parents of the said Elizabeth Stayte; and without license or banns, other than those published, as for the marriage of the said James Farquharson and Mary Hides as aforesaid.

7. The seventh article exhibited in supply of proof a true copy of the original entry of the said marriage, with the usual averments, as to the identity of the parties, &c.

8. The eighth, that the names James Farquharson and Mary Hides in the said entry were in the hand-writing of the parties in the cause respectively.

9. And the ninth, that Elizabeth Stayte from the time of her birth, constantly and

(a)[1] Appealed on the part of the husband to the Court of Arches, where the cause is now depending.

(a)[2] See, with respect to the law applicable to the particular marriage in question, vol. 1, page 94, note (a). And as to the subsisting law with respect to marriages by banns generally, see 4 Geo. IV. c. 76, § 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 12, 13. And by that act, § 22, the marriages of persons who shall knowingly and wilfully intermarry, without due publication of banns (unless by license), are null and void, to all intents and purposes whatsoever. See also 5 Geo. IV. c. 32.

(a)[3] The original register-book of banns kept in and for the parish of St. George, Hanover-square, for the year 1821, in verification of this averment as produced at the hearing of the cause.

invariably passed, and was called and known, by those names only and not by any other.

10 and 11. The tenth and eleventh were articles pleading only the jurisdiction of the Court; and praying that the marriage so had between the parties might be pronounced null and void.

Upon this libel and exhibits eight witnesses were examined: and

The Court, being satisfied upon their evidence that the facts of the case were proved as pleaded; and that the law was as pleaded in the first article—namely, that the statute of 26 Geo. II. c. 33, was still unrepealed as to the marriage in question (see 1 Add. 94, note (a))—pronounced the said marriage, as had without any due publication of banns, null and void, and condemned Mr. Farquharson in costs.

REPORTS of CASES ARGUED and DETERMINED in the ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS at DOCTORS' COMMONS and in the HIGH COURT of DELEGATES. By JOHN HAGGARD, LL.D. Vol. I. Containing Cases from Michaelmas Term, 1827, to Trinity Term, 1828, inclusive; and some Cases of an earlier date in the Supplement. London, 1829.

[1] REPORTS OF CASES ARGUED AND DETERMINED IN THE ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS AT DOCTORS' COMMONS; AND IN THE HIGH COURT OF DELEGATES.

THE COUNTESS OF PORTSMOUTH v. THE EARL OF PORTSMOUTH, BY HIS COMMITTEE.

Arches Court, Michaelmas Term, 2nd Session, 1827.—Practice—If due diligence has been used the Court will grant an extension of the term probatory, in order that material witnesses may be examined.

[See further, p. 356, post.]

On the extension of the term probatory.

This was originally a suit of nullity of marriage instituted in the Consistory Court of London, on the part of the Earl of Portsmouth, acting by his committee; and in an early stage of the proceedings came up by appeal to the Court of Arches, where, on the third session of Hilary Term, 1827, it was retained.

On the third session of Trinity Term an allegation, on behalf of Lady Portsmouth, which consisted of thirty-one articles (besides the concluding article), with five and thirty exhibits, was admitted [2] without opposition. On the first session of the present term the answers to this allegation were brought in; and on the same day Jenner, as counsel for Lady Portsmouth (after reading the affidavit of the proctor as to his inability during the long vacation to examine all the witnesses upon his allegation, on account of their great number, and the absence of many of them from London), applied for an extension of the term probatory; and the Court then ordered "the assignation to prove" to be continued; but directed that an affidavit should be exhibited, stating the names of those witnesses whom it was proposed to examine, and, further, that they were material witnesses. In compliance with this order Lady Portsmouth had made an affidavit, which set forth "that, notwithstanding the utmost diligence and activity had been used by her proctor, there still remained several important witnesses [stating some names and addresses] who were likely to be able to depose to the capacity of the said Earl of Portsmouth, and that material evidence might be expected from them."

When this affidavit had been read, Lushington, on the part of Lord Portsmouth, said that the affidavit did not, apparently, contain an enumeration of all the witnesses whom it was intended to produce: however, he would not object to the sufficiency of the affidavit, nor to the extension of the term probatory, on a clear understanding that the names and descriptions of any further witnesses, proposed to be examined, should be communicated in a day or two.

To this arrangement Lady Portsmouth's counsel acceded.

[3] Per Curiam. The Court is extremely anxious not to preclude Lady Portsmouth from an examination of the witnesses she may think of importance to her cause. The circumstances of the case are very special; and it is quite proper that the party should have a full opportunity of defending the legality of her marriage. As the proposal of Lord Portsmouth's counsel has been acquiesced in, the Court will grant an extension of the term probatory till the first of January, 1828; but it must expect that the defence will be conducted with due diligence.

In reference to this and similar applications, arising upon the orders of Court issued on the first session of Easter Term, 1827, the Court observed that the consent of the adverse proctor would not alone be sufficient to induce the Judge to continue a term probatory as matter of course, though it would have great weight with him as shewing "reasonable cause;" but the circumstances must be stated to the Court for its approbation, and this for the sake of the suitor, lest too much facility of accommodation should be given. This regulation would also, practically, be found convenient to the proctors as a justification for declining to accede, without strong grounds, to a postponement.

The Court took this opportunity of reading certain orders passed in 1684; and, after stating their history, pointed out the strictness with which the expediting of causes was enforced.

For the orders then read—vide Appendix, A.

[4] NORRIS v. HEMINGWAY. Arches Court, Michaelmas Term, 2nd Session, 1827.—Payment of a legacy decreed to a married woman, "whose receipt was to be a discharge to the executor, notwithstanding coverture;" her husband (a bankrupt) and his provisional assignee being first cited.

On motion.

James Elliott, by his last will and testament duly executed in writing, among other legacies, bequeathed the sum of 100l. to Sarah, wife of Thomas Norris; and directed "that the receipts of the several female legatees should be a sufficient discharge notwithstanding any present or future coverture." On the 31st of August, 1826, probate of this will was granted by the Prerogative Court of Canterbury to John Hemingway, the sole executor; and on the 14th of September, 1827, a citation issued under seal of this Court—the Court of Arches, at the suit of the said Sarah Norris, calling upon the executor to answer to her in a cause of subtraction of legacy.(a)[1]

To this citation a proctor appeared and alleged, on the part of the executor, that Thomas Norris, the husband, had, since the death of the testator, assigned his estate and effects to a provisional assignee, appointed by the Court for the relief of Insol-[5]-vent Debtors,(a)[2] and to whom, as he (the executor) was advised, the interest in the said legacy had passed. The proctor then brought into the registry of this Court 90l., as the amount of the legacy minus the duty, and the executor was dismissed, without opposition, from the effect of the citation.

On this day Lushington, for the legatee, after referring to the case of Lee v. Prieaux,(b) where the husband was also a bankrupt; and where Lord Alvanley (Master of the Rolls) held that in the bequest of a legacy to a feme covert the words, "her receipt to be a sufficient discharge to the executors," was equivalent with saying "to her sole and separate use;" moved that the money in this case should be paid out of the registry to Mrs. Norris upon her own receipt.

Per Curiam. The Court said—though, according to the adjudged cases, little doubt could be entertained that this was a bequest to the separate use of the wife, yet, as the husband was insolvent, and the interests of creditors might be affected. It should direct, in the first instance, the husband and the provisional assignee to be cited to shew cause why the legacy should not be paid to the legatee.

(a)[1] The following account of the Court of Arches is taken from the Report of His Majesty's Commissioners for inquiring into Courts of Justice. [1823.] "The Court of Arches is chiefly a court of appeal from the courts of the several bishops or ordinaries within the province of Canterbury, and its appellant jurisdiction extends to all causes or suits relative to wills, intestacies, tithes, church-rates, marriages, and other matters cognizable in these courts. It has an original jurisdiction in suits for subtraction of legacy, where the will is proved in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury." [Oughton, tit. 15, ss. 1, 2, 9, and per Holt, C. J., 1st Lord Raymond, 453.] "It also entertains suits on letters of request from inferior jurisdictions within the province."

A decree with intimation was accordingly served, personally, on the husband and the provisional assignee; but they offered no opposition. On the fourth session, therefore, the Court directed the legacy to be paid to Mrs. Norris.

[6] RICHARDSON v. RICHARDSON. Arches Court, Michaelmas Term, 3rd Session, 1827.—1. In a cause of divorce, articles to account for the husband's delay in instituting the suit are admissible, but need not be examined to unless the defence renders it necessary to justify his conduct.—2. If adultery, continued for many years, attended with pregnancy and birth of a child, during the husband's absence from Great Britain, be pleaded, it is useless to prove more than a few facts—such as the birth of a child, identity, and non-access.

On admission of the libel.

This cause was brought by letters of request from the Commissary of Surrey, and was a proceeding for divorce by reason of adultery charged against the wife. The question now before the Court was the admissibility of the libel, which entered into a detailed account of the marriage, separation, and subsequent history. It consisted of twenty-eight articles.

The first article pleaded that on the 25th of March, 1802, Robert Richardson and Marianne Romney were married at Calcutta, in the East Indies, according to the rites and ceremonies of the Church of England, and an entry of their marriage was made in the register.

The second, that copies of the registers, duly authenticated, are annually sent over by the Governor General in Council, and deposited among the archives of the India House.

The third, that the exhibit, No. 1, is a true copy of the entry of their marriage, extracted from the said archives.

The fourth, that the parties cohabited in India till December, 1812, and had seven children, four of whom are living. That Mrs. Richardson then came to England on account of her children's health, and accompanied by them; that Mr. Richardson was and has ever since been necessarily detained in India; that, notwithstanding she had [7] been extravagant in India,(a) he made a liberal provision for her and her children.

The fifth, that he consigned her to the care of his brother-in-law, the Honorable and Reverend Edward Turnour, and to his step-mother, the Dowager Lady Winterton, who, as well as his other relations, received and treated her kindly.

The sixth, that shortly after her arrival in England she entered into a dissipated mode of living, and incurred debts to a considerable amount, and evinced great and unbecoming levity; that, after remonstrating, the Dowager Lady Winterton, and Mr. Richardson's relations and friends, withdrew from her their countenance, and declined all personal intercourse.

The seventh, that in the beginning of June, 1814, Lady Winterton wrote an account of what had passed to Richardson, and inclosed a letter she had received from Mrs. Richardson in answer to her remonstrances.

The eighth exhibited those letters.

The ninth, that Richardson, on receiving these letters, sent over a power of attorney, authorizing his brother (who was then in England), and two friends, Cartwright and Brown, to remove his children from Mrs. Richardson, to conclude an agreement for a separate maintenance, to execute the necessary deeds, and also to institute a suit for divorce; and directed that his wife should be allowed a sum not exceeding 300l. a year.

The tenth exhibited letters to Lady Winterton, communicating such his resolutions.

The eleventh, that the children were removed, [8] and articles of separation entered into; and that an annuity of 300l. a year was settled upon her.

The twelfth article exhibited the deed of separation.

(a) The sentences, printed in italics, were struck out by order of the Court.

The thirteenth, that soon after the execution of the deed Mrs. Richardson removed from Hampstead, and that his relations had no further intercourse with her; that the annuity was regularly paid to Robert Barker, one of her trustees, on his producing a receipt, signed by her, in proof that she was alive. That Francis Richardson, the brother, who had returned from India in June, 1817, having in the middle of the year 1819 heard that she had been living and was carrying on an adulterous intercourse with one Verity, applied to Barker to be informed of her residence, which was unknown to, and concealed from, the husband's relations; that on Barker's declining to inform him he stopped the annuity, but shortly after received two letters from her, the last dated from Brighton; that then the annuity was again paid to her trustee; that Francis Richardson made inquiries at Brighton, where, and with whom, she was living, but could not discover.

The fourteenth, that Francis Richardson in 1819 communicated, by letter, to his brother the reports he had heard of his wife's conduct, and his endeavours to discover her, with a view to institute proceedings for a divorce; that Robert Richardson supposing, erroneously, that proceedings would be, or had been, instituted against her under the power of attorney, gave no directions; but, at length, having learned that his personal authority was necessary, he executed a proxy, and transmitted it to Francis Richardson; that it arrived in England about the middle of June, 1825, when, Mr. Cartwright being [9] dead, and Francis Richardson on the Continent, and Mr. Richardson's relations unwilling to render public Mrs. Richardson's misconduct, some delay took place; but upon the continued adultery, as was subsequently pleaded, having been ascertained, Francis Richardson felt himself compelled to proceed.

The remaining articles pleaded adultery from 1816 to the time of giving in the libel, with three different persons in succession, her pregnancy by one of them, the birth of a child in 1824, her declarations as to who was the father, and cohabitation with the other two as their wife, and adoption of their name; identity, diversity, and the usual formal articles.

Dodson and Pickard in opposition to the libel. The certificate of the marriage is a copy of a copy: this is not a proper mode of pleading, but we do not press the objection. The principal objections are, first, that the husband, having so long forborne bringing the suit, is barred. In 1814 he was informed of her levity; the deed of separation gives her licence to live with whom she pleaded, and that the husband will not disturb her. [Court. As a feme sole, not in a state of adultery. Deeds of this description have always been so construed; and this deed is in the usual terms.] In 1819 the husband was positively informed she was living in open adultery; he knew no suit was begun, for the annuity continued to be paid; and the proxy, i.e. his personal authority, confirmed what was done under the power of attorney. [Court. But does not that confirmation lead to the inference that he, bonâ fide, conceived proceedings had been instituted?] The other objection is, that pleading the extravagance of [10] the wife is irrelevant, and will lead to useless contradictions.

Jenner and Lushington, contrà, were stopped by the Court.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The first three articles only go to establish the marriage; and though a formal objection was taken to the mode of pleading the register, it was not pressed, and I, therefore, need not consider it. The eleven next articles enter at considerable length into the history of the parties, not, as I conceive, for the purpose of proving adultery, or of criminating the wife, but to account for the conduct of the husband, and to remove any unfavourable impression that might arise—if the delay in bringing the suit were not explained. In this view the general substance is admissible; and furnishes a sufficient reason why the husband should not be precluded, on the ground of laches, or acquiescence in his wrong, from proceeding in this suit. This is the answer to the first objection; at the same time the Court will not expect these articles to be examined to, unless the wife should set up such a defence as may render it necessary to prove all the preliminary history, in order to the husband's justification. The other objection to the irrelevancy of the parts that plead the extravagance of the wife is, I think, quite sound; and I shall direct the libel to be reformed in this respect, as the introduction of any such matter will lead to useless expence, and load the cause with pleading and evidence that cannot have any real bearing on the point at issue.

The remaining articles minutely detail Mrs. Rich-[11]-ardson's various adulterous connexions. It cannot be essential, and, consequently, it would not be proper, to examine them all. If there is full proof of a few of the facts, particularly of the birth of the child, of her identity, and of her husband's absence in India, as pleaded; this is all that can be essential. To trace her to all the different parts of the kingdom where the adultery is laid would lead to an expence quite enormous, and which would be oppressive even to the wife, who will, almost necessarily, have some extra costs to pay; but it would be still more oppressive to the husband, on whom the ordinary costs of both parties fall, if these Courts were to require such a superabundance of proof. I have thrown out these suggestions in the hope of preventing expences that may well be spared, and, at present, have only to admit the libel with the slight alteration that I have mentioned.

Libel to be reformed.

On the by-day after Hilary Term, 1828, the Court pronounced that this libel was fully proved: and on an affidavit that Mr. Richardson was residing in the East Indies, and not expected to return; the Court permitted the bond, enjoined by the 107th canon, to be entered into by his brother; and then signed the sentence of separation.

[12] JENKINS v. BARRETT. Arches Court, Michaelmas Term, 3rd Session, 1827.—On appeal in a criminal suit, an extension of the term probatory being prayed by the promoter, a delay of nine months without making substantial progress in the cause, or examining a single witness (after the suit had been already depending in the Court of Appeal two years), is a sufficient ground to dismiss the defendant, and condemn the promoter in payment of a sum nomine expensarum. —In a suit for brawling, under 5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 4, s. 1, the words of brawling must be set forth in the articles. The words "other enormous ecclesiastical offences" in a citation are surplusage, and will not support a charge of smiting under 5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 4, s. 2.—5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 4, was not intended to abridge the ecclesiastical jurisdiction in cases of brawling.

An appeal from the Consistory Court of St. David's.

This was a cause, originally depending in the Episcopal Consistorial Court of St. David's, held at Carmarthen, wherein the office of the Judge was voluntarily promoted by John Barrett, churchwarden of the parish of Llangain, in the county of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, against Esau Jenkins of the said parish, farmer, citing him to appear and "to answer certain articles touching and concerning his soul's health, and the lawful correction and reformation of his manners and excesses, and more especially for quarrelling, chiding, and brawling in the church and church-yard of Llangain, and for other enormous crimes and offences of ecclesiastical cognizance."

Such was the tenor of the citation; but the heading of the articles (from the admission of which articles the cause was appealed), after reciting the charges contained in the citation, thus proceeded: "and for clenching your fist in the said church, and putting yourself in a fighting and threatening posture there, and thereby impeding and preventing the Reverend Daniel Rowlands, clerk, then the officiating minister of the parish of Llangain aforesaid, from performing certain ceremonies, rites, and official duties within the said church." The articles pleaded, first, the 5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 4, s. 1, against quarrelling, chiding or brawling in a church or church-yard; secondly, that by the same statute (s. 2) "it is further enacted that if any person [13] shall smite, or lay violent hands upon any other, either in any church or church-yard, then, ipso facto, every person so offending shall be deemed excommunicate." (a) They then charged, thirdly, "that you the said Esau Jenkins did, upon the 13th of July, 1824, brawl, chide, and quarrel in the parish church of Llangain, and did in an angry and passionate manner (brawling, chiding, and quarrelling in the said church) come on violently towards the said Daniel Rowlands, who was in the reading-desk, and had his surplice on, and was ready to perform the solemnization of matrimony between one David Davies of the parish of Llangonnock, in the county and diocese aforesaid, a bachelor, and Mary Jenkins of the parish of Llangain, a single woman, who were standing before him for that purpose, and you the said Esau Jenkins, with your hat on, clenched your fist, and put yourself in a fighting and threatening manner and posture [and declared that the said Daniel Rowlands should not proceed with such ceremony, that the said Mary Jenkins was your daughter, that she was yours, and that she should not be married until she had been baptized in the usual form, as practised among the sect of Christians called Anabaptists, to which you yourself belonged]; (b) that in consequence thereof, he the said Daniel Rowlands was obliged to take off his surplice, and go out of the church, without solemnizing the said marriage."

Fourthly, "that you, the said Esau Jenkins, did on the said 13th of July, 1824, in the parish church of Llangain, come violently, with your hat [14] on, towards the said Daniel Rowlands, who had on his surplice, and was preparing and going to officiate and perform the ceremony of baptism on one Mary Jenkins, your daughter (who was then of full age), by her desire, and at her request, when you said 'that she should not be baptized, and that you would prevent it to the utmost of your power;' and jumped on towards the font or christening place in a very violent and outrageous manner, appearing determined to prevent the ceremony by force, and you repeatedly, and continuing your hat on, declared to the said Daniel Rowlands that he should not baptize your daughter, and bring such a slur or disgrace on the religion of Baptists, which you professed; that you did then use several other brawling, chiding, and abusive words and expressions to and against the said Daniel Rowlands, and did create and occasion great noise and confusion amongst the congregation and people then assembled in the said church and church-yard, for the purpose of witnessing the solemnization of the said marriage." The articles concluded by praying "that the said Esau Jenkins be duly corrected and punished according to the exigency of the law and be condemned in costs."

At the hearing of the appeal, on the third session of Hilary Term, 1826, the admissibility of the articles was debated.

Lushington in support of the appeal, and in objection to the articles. The articles and citation do not agree. The citation is for brawling, and other enormous ecclesiastical offences: no offence can be [15] so generally set out—it cannot cover the charge, now laid in the articles under the statute, for smiting, which is the greater offence. In the third article not a single species of brawling is alleged. The whole case should have been set forth in the citation; the articles are not in a specific shape—they must be reformed. The offences as charged, if properly laid, are of ecclesiastical cognizance; but it is apparent that the case is not fully stated.

Dodson contrà. The objection as to an omission of specific words in the third article does not extend to the whole of that article; and if it is an objection, it is not applicable to the fourth.

Per Curiam. In this case I am bound to pronounce for the appeal, as some parts of the articles are not admissible. The charge of "smiting" could not be supported under those general words, "other enormous ecclesiastical offences," which are mere surplusage. Besides, a threatening posture, though an assault at common law, even without a blow, is not held here to be "smiting" within the statute. This must, then, be considered a proceeding for "brawling" only; therefore the second article should not have been admitted. The third article must be reformed: it should recite some words of quarrelling; for though the statute was not intended to abridge the ecclesiastical jurisdiction,(a) yet as [16] it provides for brawling by "words only;" and as this is a proceeding under the statute, some word should be alleged. The (b) Inserted on the articles being reformed.

(a) Vide 2 Add. 144, and 1 Consistory Reports, 181. In the case of Dawe and Nockolds v. Williams, 2 Add. 130, prohibition was applied for to the Court of King's Bench, on the ground that suits for "brawling" could not be entertained by "letters of request." Abbott, C. J., in discharging the rule nisi for the prohibition, said—"Taking this offence to have been created by the 5 & 6 Ed. VI. c. 4, I should think that the authority hereby given to the ordinary is to be exercised in the same manner as any other authority given to that officer. Now one mode of exercising his authority is by letters of request to the archbishop or his substitutes. But in Wenmouth v. Collins (2 Ld. Raym. 850), Lord Holt appears to have been of opinion that the offence of brawling was not created by the statute which has been referred to, and I think that his opinion was correct. If that be so, all difficulty is removed, and there can be no doubt that the Court of Arches may derive jurisdiction from letters of request. This rule must therefore be discharged with costs." Ex parte Williams, 4 B. & C. 315.

fourth article details sufficiently what passed; and that the young woman was of age, and might contract marriage with whom she pleased, and exercise her judgment in the choice of a religion, without the interference of her father.

I shall expect all proper diligence in the future stages of this cause.(b) If the facts are truly laid in these articles, the defendant will act more wisely in giving an affirmative issue, and paying the expences; or, at least, something nomine expensarum. It cannot be held that this conduct is justifiable; for though, entertaining a conscientious difference of opinion, he may claim the utmost toleration, yet he must exercise some himself; he must allow a choice in marriage and religion to his daughter, who is now beyond that age when by law she is subject to a father's control; nor can he be per-[17]-mitted to enter the church, and interfere in the ministration of its ceremonies. If the party is aware that the charge can be substantiated, I recommend an early adjustment of this cause. The articles, when reformed as I have directed, will be admissible.

To these articles a responsive plea was admitted, in the Court of Arches, without opposition; which, after specifically denying the charges, pleaded: "That Jenkins and his daughter were Protestant dissenters of the Baptist denomination, who believe that the sacrament of baptism should only be administered to certain adults, and by immersion; that the same was known to the said Reverend Daniel Rowlands, whom [on the day and time alleged] they found in his surplice, in a seat under the pulpit of the church; that upon their entering the church he immediately asked Mary Jenkins whether she had been baptized; that upon her replying she had not, he declared he would not solemnize the marriage unless she would first consent to be baptized; and upon her declining so to be baptized, he took off his surplice; that at length she said she was willing to be baptized, provided he would immerse her in water, being the mode of baptism approved of by Baptists; that her said father then also declared that the baptism of his daughter should be by immersion, and not by sprinkling; that he made such observation firmly and aloud; but temperately and respectfully, and not in a passionate manner."

After this allegation had been admitted a decree for answers was served upon Barrett on the [18] 19th of July, 1827; but no appearance had been given thereto, nor had any evidence been taken on either side; when on this day the proctor for the respondent (the promoter of the suit) applied to the Court for an extension of the term probatory, to enable him to examine witnesses upon the articles; and in support of his application exhibited an affidavit.

Dodson for the respondent.

Lushington contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The duty of the Court in this case is quite obvious. The suit originally commenced in the Consistory Court of St. David's against the defendant (the present appellant) "for quarrelling, chiding, and brawling in the parish church of Llangain"—an offence undoubtedly proper to be repressed, particularly under the circumstances charged in the articles, which, if true, will constitute brawling of an aggravated character. It is a suit brought by a churchwarden—the officer of the parish, and of the ordinary, specially appointed to preserve decorum in the church; a very proper person to institute these proceedings, if he has stepped forward from a sincere and unmixed desire of enforcing the observance of order. Primâ facie, then, the articles are exhibited for a proper purpose, and by a proper person. But these considerations rendered it more essential that the cause should be diligently prosecuted, not only for the correction of the individual offender, but as an example to deter others from similar acts of indecency. The process of the Court might otherwise lose much of its effect from the tardiness of its [19] censures; or, what is still more to be guarded against, might be abused, and become an instrument of oppression and persecution.

What, then, has been the course of these proceedings? They have already depended three years, and yet have hardly got beyond their earliest stage. The (b) The Court, in the course of the argument, said: The appeal was entered two years ago. How has this delay arisen? Has it ever been asserted that a treaty of agreement was on foot? There must have been such faults on both sides that I am not prepared to say that it would not be the best way to dismiss the suit at once. Either party could have urged it on.

citation was extracted on the 23d of October, 1824, and was returned into Court on the 15th of November: in the month of February, 1825, the articles were admitted: an appeal was instituted; and in April, 1825, the inhibition was served: the process was not brought into this Court till the 10th of December, and even then a proxy for the respondent was not exhibited; and the appeal—from a grievance only—was not heard till Hilary Term, 1827. The case was then for the first time brought to the notice of this Court, when the delay was so manifest—though it did not appear to which party most blame was imputable—that the Court could not fail to observe upon it, and signified at that time that it should expect the cause to proceed with all due diligence (see p. 16, supra). The Court pronounced for the appeal, and directed the articles to be reformed—this was on the third session of Hilary Term; and yet the articles, notwithstanding the previous delay and the urgent recommendation of the Court, were not admitted on being reformed till the second session of Trinity Term; and it was not till the fourth session that the party stood assigned to prove. Not one witness has since been examined; so that the whole of Easter and Trinity Terms, and the long vacation, that is to say nine months, have elapsed, and [20] the cause has not, substantially, advanced one single step.

With whom, or where, has been this delay? Primâ facie, with the promoter of the suit; for if the charge were true, and it were sincerely wished to punish the offence, and thus by a timely example prevent a repetition of it, it was incumbent on him immediately to have proceeded and proved his case. On the fourth session of Trinity Term the defendant gave a responsive allegation; but to this he was not obliged, as no witnesses had been examined on the articles. In the Court of Arches, then, the defendant has, at least, shewn due diligence: there was no call upon him to enter into his defence till there was some evidence offered in proof of the charge; but answers were called for; the decree was promptly served, and up to this moment the answers have not been brought in. Is any satisfactory reason assigned for all this delay? The proctor for the promoter has relied on a long affidavit, and some letters which are annexed to it; but his own statement is, that not any steps were taken by him till after the admission of the defensive allegation, and then only to the extent of a mere enquiry—whether an arrangement of the suit could not be effected. The first letter adverted to in the affidavit is from the proctor in London to his client's proctor in Wales; this was written on the 15th of September: the first original letter produced is dated Carmarthen, 1st of October: it is addressed to the respondent's proctor by the proctor for the defendant in the Court below, and commences in these terms: "I believe both these individuals are heartily tired of this suit, and that it will be to the advantage of all parties to drop [21] further proceedings, each paying his own costs. As the question whether a clergyman is bound to marry a dissenter, baptized or unbaptized, cannot be tried in this suit, the bishop (now of Sarum) and the dissenters can have no interest or motive in proceeding further." So that it turns out this suit was not brought by the parish-officer simply to preserve decorum and decency in the church; but that there were other parties (who are not before this Court) and other motives; and that the proceedings are instituted on purpose to try, incidentally and collaterally, another question; to the merits of which question, however, I shall not advert in any degree.(a)

It is not necessary for me to notice any other circumstances than what have happened in this Court; it is sufficient for me that there has been such gross delay in not hitherto examining any witnesses in support of the articles, and that in a cause requiring at all times due diligence; but, particularly, under the recommendation and express direction of the Court, that I am bound in justice to dismiss the defendant. These proceedings have been now hanging over the head of this man for three years: the process of the Court, I repeat, might thus be made available for vexatious purposes. It therefore appears to me desirable to put an end to this suit, which is an object, it is said, that both parties are anxious to attain; but I do not think that I shall satisfy the demands of justice by simply dismissing it. The [22] defendant may have been in some degree in pari delicto; but was justified in appealing, and, as far as the proceedings have taken place under my cognizance, and since the admonition of the Court, his cause has been conducted with promptitude and attention, and without any appearance of unnecessary delay. I therefore dismiss the suit, and condemn the promoter in the sum of 30l. nomine expensarum.

(a) Reference being made by counsel to the case of Kemp v. Wickes, 3 Phill. 264, the Court observed that the decision in that case was confined to burials, to which also the rubric only applied.

BARRETT v. BARRETT. Arches Court, Michaelmas Term, 4th Session, 1827.—A party being before the Court in a suit for divorce by reason of cruelty, acts of adultery subsequent to the citation may be pleaded.

This suit was originally brought in the Commissary Court of Surrey; and was promoted by Rowena Barrett against her husband, George Barrett, for a divorce by reason of his cruelty.

The citation was returned on the second session of Michaelmas Term, 1826. Upon the admission of the libel the cause was appealed; and on the by-day after Trinity Term, 1827, this Court pronounced against the appeal; but at the petition of both proctors retained the cause. On the first session of the present term the proctor for the husband confessed the marriage, but otherwise gave a negative issue. The proctor for the wife was assigned to prove the libel.

Lushington now moved on affidavit to permit additional articles to the libel or an allegation to be given in pleading acts of adultery by the husband, subsequent to the commencement of the suit.

Arnold opposed the motion.

[23] Per Curiam. As the wife will be clearly entitled to a separation on account of the adultery, if proved, the only question is whether a new citation is necessary. I think it is unnecessary, since the husband is already before the Court; and since it cannot be objected that any distinction exists between the proceeding on one ground or the other. It would, therefore, save useless expence to receive the allegation, notwithstanding the original citation was only for cruelty.

Motion granted.

HAMERTON v. HAMERTON. Arches Court, Michaelmas Term, By-Day, 1827.—1. When alimony, pendente lite, is decreed to commence from the return of the citation, all sums paid subsequent to that return are to be allowed as part payment. 2. When no sufficient cause is shewn for neglecting to comply with a monition personally served, a party may at once be pronounced contumacious: but aliter, for a mere informality, if he has virtually obeyed, or is ready to obey, the monition.

[Referred to, Mackonochie v. Lord Penzance, 1881, 6 A. C. 434.]

An appeal from the Consistory Court of Gloucester.

This was originally a proceeding in the Episcopal Consistorial Court of Gloucester, in a cause of divorce, by reason of adultery, brought by William Medows Hamerton, against Isabella Frances Hamerton, his wife. The citation in the Court below was returned on the 26th of April, 1827. On the 2d of August the libel and the allegation of faculties were admitted; upon which alimony of 300l. per annum, to be paid monthly, pendente lite, and to commence from the return of the citation, was decreed. A monition issued at the same time for payment. On the 3d of August this monition was executed by a personal service on Major Hamerton, the promoter of the suit; and on the 27th of September it was [24] returned as duly certified, when, no appearance being given to it, the contumacy of the husband was accused, and a certificate thereof instantly granted.(a) Receipts for various sums, as paid to the wife by the husband, were afterwards during the sitting of the Court produced and rejected.

On this an appeal was presented to the Court of Arches; and the præsertim of the appeal was "for refusing to allow any or either of the sum or sums of sixty pounds, sixty pounds, and seven pounds ten shillings, paid by the said William Medows Hamerton to the said Frances Isabella, his wife, or to her agent, since the institution of this suit, to be taken in part of alimony decreed in the cause; and for pronouncing at the same Court the said William Medows Hamerton to be in contempt for not appearing to a certain monition issued against him for the payment of the same." Jenner and Addams contrà.

[25] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. It is difficult to ascertain from the process what was done, or intended to be done, in this cause by the Court at Gloucester—whether the monition was obeyed or evaded and resisted. The monition itself is thus worded—"That William Medows Hamerton do pay or cause to be paid to Isabella Frances [26] Hamerton, or to her proctor, for her use, an alimony pendente lite of twenty-five pounds per month, the same to be computed from the twenty-sixth day of April now last past, and so from thenceforward every month during the continuance of this suit, under pain of the law, and contempt thereof." This monition, therefore, does not require a personal appearance: nor does it direct the payment of the alimony into Court—but to the party or her proctor. As far as I can discover, the party on whom this monition was served did not intend to be contumacious, but proposed to shew that he had complied with the orders of the Court. Three months had elapsed from the return of the citation to the date of the monition: at which time 75l. only were due to the wife for alimony; but taking the period to the return of the monition, only five months had passed, and consequently 125l. would, on that calculation, be the utmost extent of her claim. Now, on the 27th of September, the day on which the monition was returned, what does the husband's proctor do? He refers to certain receipts purporting to be for various sums paid to the use of the wife, amounting together to 127l. 10s., and "also a proportionate part of 70l. as part of alimony decreed." What then is meant by this? The dates of the receipts are not given; no affidavits are offered to shew that these payments had been actually made since the return of the citation—the receipts themselves were not exhibited, or at least they are not transmitted in the process to this Court. It seems, however, from the præsertim of the appeal, that it was intended to establish that certain payments had been made to the wife since [27] the institution of the suit, and, therefore, that the party was not in contempt. But it is difficult, from the documents before me, to Court below was proceeding to follow up the decree of contumacy by certifying the contempt of Major Hamerton to the Court of Chancery; when Lushington applied to this Court for its interference.

Addams contrà, stated that these steps had been taken in error; but that Major Hamerton was in no danger of arrest.

The Court said that the measure complained of was certainly very irregular; but as the inhibition had not been returned, this Court had nothing before it upon which to act: it had, however, no doubt that on this expression of its opinion the proceedings would be stayed.

On the same day in the Vice-Chancellor's Court, Mr. Koe applied for an order to restrain the cursitor of the Court from issuing out a writ de contumace capiendo against Major Hamerton, on the ground that he had appealed from the Ecclesiastical Court of Gloucester, but before the inhibition could be served the Court of Gloucester had granted a significavit; and upon the production of that instrument a writ for the arrest of Major Hamerton would issue as of course. Under these circumstances Mr. Koe trusted his Honour would interfere to protect this gentleman from arrest on a process that was not bailable. He had used every diligence in procuring the inhibition, so that no blame was attributable to him on that head. [The Vice-Chancellor asked why the Court of Arches did not interpose its authority for the purpose of enforcing its own order?] Mr. Koe replied that the Ecclesiastical Court could not now protect Major Hamerton, as the affair had passed into the hands of the officer of the Court of Chancery.

The Vice-Chancellor, on referring to the Act of Parliament (53 Geo. III. c. 127), found that the officer was "authorised and required to grant the writ upon the production of the monition." His Honour, therefore, felt that he could not be justified in making an order in opposition to a positive Act of Parliament. The case was a novel one, and might, in his opinion, be mentioned to the Lord Chancellor.

The Lord Chancellor on the same day refused to entertain the application until notice should be served on the wife; and being informed that she was in France said, notice to her solicitor would be deemed good service. Further steps were, however, unnecessary, as no attempt was made to sue out the writ, after the opinion expressed by the Court of Arches.

pronounce confidently with what object these receipts were brought to the notice of the Court, or whether the Judge did right or wrong in the steps he then took. If there were no affidavit to shew that the receipts were for payments made subsequent, à fortiori, if by the dates it appeared that they were prior, to the return of the citation; if no later payment were attempted to be proved, and no reasonable cause assigned for the neglect—in that case, as the monition had, on the 3d of August, been personally served on the husband, I am of opinion that the Court was justified in enforcing its decree by pronouncing him contumacious. If, on the other hand, the receipts were dated after the citation, and the mere want of affidavits to authenticate them was the principal informality to complain of, the Court should have allowed a short time to the party to verify their contents before it certified him to be in contempt.

But in every point of view there is sufficient to induce me to arrive at this conclusion, that it will be beneficial for all parties not to remit the cause. I wish it, however, to be distinctly understood, that if these payments were made after the return of the citation, they must be deducted as so much on account of the alimony that has been allotted to the wife; but if before, then they are not to be deducted, and the husband must forthwith pay the balance that is now due, and proceed immediately to the examination of his witnesses upon the libel. I pronounce for the appeal and retain the cause.

[28] WYLLIE v. MOTT & FRENCH. Arches Court, Michaelmas Term, By-Day, 1827.—In a libel for perturbation of seat a title must not be pleaded as founded on purchase, sale, letting or bequest, all which are illegal and void. The suit may rest on a possessory title and acquiescence of former churchwardens and on the fitness of the party—from the number of family, amount of property, &c. —Pews in a church belong to the parish for the use of the inhabitants, and cannot be sold nor let without a special Act of Parliament.—Churchwardens must exercise a just discretion in the allotment of pews, subject to the correction of the ordinary.—A party not giving in his answers on the day of the return of the decree personally served, will be pronounced contumacious; similiter a witness not appearing to a compulsory.—The occupier of a pew ceasing to be an inhabitant of the parish cannot let the pew with, and thus annex it to, his house, but it reverts to the disposal of the churchwardens.—A pew can only be appropriated to a house by faculty or by prescription.—In a suit for perturbation of seat, if it appears that the churchwardens have acted properly in displacing the plaintiff, the Court will dismiss them; but will not proceed to confirm the possession of the person seated by them, as it does not form part of the question before the Court, and may be injurious to the parish by taking the pew more out of the power of the churchwardens.

On admission of the libel.

This cause was brought by letters of request from the Commissary of Surrey, and was promoted by Alexander Wyllie, alleging himself to be a parishioner and inhabitant of the parish of Thames Ditton, against John Mott and Robert French, churchwardens of the said parish, citing them to shew cause why he should not be reinstated in the possession and occupation of a certain pew in the parish church. An appearance having been given for the churchwardens, a libel was brought in; and on the fourth session of Hilary Term was debated.

Jenner in opposition to its admission. The title to a pew resting on a sale is bad: Even a faculty to a person and his heirs for ever is illegal; but no faculty is pleaded here. A removal by the churchwardens is justifiable, in order to put an end to such a claim.

Lushington contrà. The principle is not contended for that pews can be let or sold, but the practice very generally prevails. In some London parishes the pews are let by the churchwardens. [Court. It is done under a special Act of Parliament in St. George's, Hanover Square; is not that the case in the parishes alluded to?] It is apprehended not. When the gallery was erected, certainly it was not legal to sell the pews. Mr. Wyllie does not assert a permanent right. The parish having received the money cannot now turn [29] him out, unless great public inconvenience results. He was originally seated by consent of the churchwardens for the time being, and has long retained the pew, and is a proper person to occupy it. This is a sufficient possessory title against a disturber. Both parties are in eodem delicto. Astley v. Biddle (3 Phill. 517. 1 Hagg. Con. Reports, 318, note) was a case exactly similar. Though the title was bad the party was allowed to continue.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a suit instituted by Alexander Wyllie, a parishioner and inhabitant of the parish of Thames Ditton, against John Mott and Robert French, churchwardens, for disturbing him in a seat which he occupied in that church; or, as it is technically called, for perturbation of seat. The libel sets forth all the history and circumstances of the case, and, among other matters, the history of the building of a gallery, with additional pews in that church; the allotment of those pews in consequence of a purchase and sale; and subsequent transfers by bequests and letting; all which modes of acquiring seats must be, and have been, acknowledged by the counsel to give no legal title. Seats in the church belong to the parish, for the use of the inhabitants, and by law cannot be sold nor let, without a special Act of Parliament for the purpose. The question then is whether the party, by amending his plea, can set forth such a title as would justify the interposition of the Court in his favour; that is, whether the libel may be so reformed as to rest the claim on the ground of possession alone, or must be rejected altogether.

[30] The first article pleads that the church of Thames Ditton being insufficient for the accommodation of the parishioners, it was agreed at a vestry held on the 13th of July, 1809, to build a gallery; that a faculty was obtained and the gallery erected. This is introductory and not improper.

The second article states that the churchwardens and vestry sold the seats; that the pew No. 4 was sold to Mrs. Moss for 17l. 10s., and a receipt given by the vestry clerk; that No. 5 was sold to Lady Sullivan, and a receipt also given, and it exhibits the former receipt dated in March, 1811. This is alleging what, from the beginning to the end, was an illegal transaction, and can furnish no ground of title: the money paid can only be considered as voluntary contributions and subscriptions towards the building: it may be a reason, in the discretion of the churchwardens, for seating these persons, and such seating may give a possessory right—sufficient against a mere disturber; but if the Court were to admit any part of this article it would lend a countenance to a proceeding contrary to law. The sale and purchase do not improve—they rather operate against the claim; because if a party seeks to found his title on an illegal origin, it goes far to justify his removal. I reject the whole of the second article.

The third article pleads that, on payment of the sum of 17l. 10s., Mrs. Moss was placed in pew No. 4; that her daughter, Mrs. Wyllie, sat in the pew, and inhabited another house in the parish, to which Mrs. Moss in 1820 removed, and where she continued to reside with Wyllie and his family till her death in September, 1826; [31] that Wyllie and his family occupied this pew till June, 1822. This article must be reformed—leaving it to state that Mrs. Moss was put into possession of this pew by the churchwardens, and omitting every thing that relates to the money paid on that account—a circumstance that cannot assist the case.

The fourth article—open to the same observation, is to the following effect:—That in June, 1822, on Lady Sullivan quitting the parish, Wyllie, with the consent of the churchwardens, removed to No. 5, agreeing to pay 5l. a year; and that Mr. Lowden, with the consent of the churchwardens, was placed in No. 4, agreeing to pay Mrs. Moss 3l. a year; that Wyllie sat in No. 5, paying Lady Sullivan 5l. a year, till September, 1826, when Mott and French, the churchwardens, gave him notice that they had appropriated the pew to Thomas Morgan, Esq., and dispossessed him. That Lowden continued in possession of No. 4, paying Mrs. Moss 3l. a year till her death, but now refuses to pay. It may be pleaded that on Lady Sullivan quitting the parish, Wyllie was seated in No. 5, with the consent of the churchwardens; but all that refers to the agreements and payments must be struck out as irrelevant and illegal. With this reform, the article will shew something of a possessory title, viz. original occupation with the consent—and possession for four years without objection, and consequently with the presumed concurrence—of the churchwardens.

The fifth article alleges that Mrs. Moss, by will, left a pew, No. 4, to Wyllie, and appointed him and David Willis her executors; and a copy [32] of the will is exhibited. This, again, I must reject: it is perfectly irrelevant: it forms no semblance of a title; on the contrary, it bears rather against Wyllie's case, making it rely for support on that which the Court can never admit to be averred as a proper or legal foundation. Mrs. Moss could not transfer a right which, at best, was only personal.

The sixth article pleads that Wyllie's family consists of himself, his wife, and ten children; that he has a house and forty-one acres of land, both freehold; and that he rents thirty-three acres; that he is rated at 119l. a year; and since he was dispossessed of No. 5, has not had any accommodation for himself and family to attend divine service at this church. This may be admitted, as shewing that he was a fit person to occupy the pew; and that he had no other sittings for his family; for if the churchwardens, for the purpose of asserting their right, and putting a stop to the illegal practice of letting pews, had placed him in another equally good and commodious, that might not have been improper.

This libel, then, is admissible if confined to the facts of the erection of the gallery; to the seating of Mrs. Moss and of Wyllie by the churchwardens, at first, in No. 4; to Wyllie's removal to No. 5, with the consent of the churchwardens, on its becoming vacant by Lady Sullivan's leaving the parish, or giving up possession of the pew; to Wyllie's quiet occupation from 1822 to 1826, and his fitness to retain it. It will then rest with the churchwardens to justify the removal and displacing of him.

In respect to the payment of rent by Wyllie to [33] Lady Sullivan, and by Lowden to Wyllie, it stands on no legal foundation. They have paid it in their own wrong, and it is their own fault if they pay any more. It is an illegal practice which this Court can never sanction nor approve. The gallery and pews belong to the parish, and are for the use of the inhabitants; and the churchwardens must exercise a just discretion in allotting them. If they exercise that discretion improperly, the ordinary will set them right, after having heard all parties.

I reject the second and fifth articles, and direct the third and fourth to be reformed.

The libel, thus reformed, was admitted; and on the first session of Michaelmas Term the term probatory was prayed to be extended, on the ground that the answers were not brought in,(a) though the decree had been personally served upon the defendants in July last: it was [34] further stated that a compulsory was, on this day, returned against a witness on the libel, and that he had not appeared.

Per Curiam. The Court—upon the proctor for the defendants engaging that the answers should be brought in on the second session—extended the time; but observed that it was not sufficient for the proctor to appear to the decree for answers; but that the answers themselves ought to have been brought in; a practice which would be expected in future. The Court also did not pronounce the witness, upon whom the compulsory had been served, contumacious, but continued the certificate to the next session; stating, however, that henceforward it should pronounce a party contumacious on the return of the compulsory.

This cause now came before the Court on a question of the admissibility of an allegation given in on the part of the churchwardens, in substance, as follows:—

1. The first article, in contradiction to the third position of the libel, alleges that Mrs. Moss, from the time she quitted her house, only resided occasionally with Wyllie; and for two years before her death resided almost constantly, and boarded, with her son George Moss, at Thames Ditton.

2. The second recites the fourth article of the libel, and denies that Wyllie was put into possession of the pew on account of the increase of his family; but alleges that without the consent [35] of the churchwardens, he rented it of Lady Sullivan for 5l. a year, when she quitted the parish in 1822, on condition that he should quit it on notice from Lady Sullivan, or her son, Sir Charles Sullivan, who was expected to purchase or rent the house she had occupied; that while this house was untenanted, Wyllie was not disturbed in the occupation of the pew; that in May, 1826, he quitted the house, and let it to Mrs. Turquand, and gave her possession of the pew, and neither he nor his family sat there afterwards; that he had a lodging for three months; but

(a) In another case in the Prerogative Court no witness had been produced on an allegation admitted in Easter Term; and no attempt had been made to serve the decree for answers till two or three days before the first session of this term, when the decree was returned with a certificate that the party could not be found: the Court, referring to the delay of four months before any steps had been taken to enforce the giving in of the answers, refused an application for the extension of the term probatory, or to issue a decree viis et modis against the party. It, however, recommended the adverse proctor to bring in the answers, or if they were only material, as authenticating exhibits, to admit, in acts of Court, the validity of such exhibits. If this was not done; and, at the hearing, the answers should appear important, the Court might then rescind the conclusion of the cause.

in October removed entirely to London, and ceased to be a parishioner and inhabitant of the parish of Thames Ditton.

3. The third pleads that Wyllie occupies a house in Conduit Street, where he, his wife, and greater part of his family have almost constantly resided since he quitted Thames Ditton, and that they attend divine service at the parish church of St. George, Hanover Square, or some other church or chapel in the neighbourhood.

4. That the pew No. 4 was allotted to Mrs. Moss, as occupier of a certain house; that Wyllie, who married her daughter, continued to occupy it till 1822, when he gave it up to Silvester Lowden, Esq., who occupied Mrs. Moss' house: that the pews Nos. 4 and 5 are nearly of the same size; but that No. 5 will hold one person more, viz. seven or eight persons.

5. That when the pew No. 5 was built in pursuance of a faculty in April, 1811, it was allotted to Lady Sullivan, as occupier of one of the largest houses in the parish, and has always been considered as allotted to the occupier of that house: that at [36] Lady-day, 1826, the house and grounds were let for fourteen years to Thomas Morgan, Esq.; that he, shortly after, took possession of it; that he has a wife, three children, and a governess in this house, and that he and his family are in the constant habit of attending Thames Ditton church.

6. That Morgan, understanding the pew No. 5 belonged to him as occupier of this house in July, 1826, intended to take possession of it; that he found it occupied by Mrs. Turquand and her family; that he then applied to the incumbent and churchwardens to be seated, and with their knowledge, consent, and approbation, and with that of the principal inhabitants, on the 1st of October, 1826, took, and has ever since remained in undisturbed, possession of the pew.

7. That Morgan has a young and increasing family, and that his premises are assessed to the poor rates at 140l. per annum.

8. That Wyllie, since quitting the parish in 1826, has only occasionally visited it, principally for the purpose of collecting his rents, and then slept at the house of one of his friends; and that at the time of issuing the decree in this cause he was not, and is not, a parishioner and inhabitant of Thames Ditton.

9. That, on account of the increased population, in 1820 two additional pews were built—one was allotted to Mr. Fowell Buxton, the other was offered to Wyllie for his tenants or himself, but he refused it; that the population is sixteen hundred, and the church will not, conveniently, accommodate more than three hundred and fifty; that Mrs. Turquand, subsequent to Morgan's [37] sitting in No. 5, has frequently occupied one of the pews built in 1820.

10. That the prayer of Wyllie may be rejected; that Morgan may be confirmed in the possession and occupation of No. 5; and that Wyllie may be condemned in costs.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. On the facts disclosed in the libel, and in the present allegation, it is not a very difficult undertaking for the Court to conjecture, with some degree of probability at least, the real state of this question: and as it were much to be regretted that, through ignorance or obstinacy, the parties should persist in a useless contest, the Court, in the hope of relieving them from litigating, will, at this stage, take a short view of the facts, and of the law applicable to those facts.

The suit is brought by Mr. Wyllie against the churchwardens of Thames Ditton for perturbation of seat, and contains a prayer that he may be reinstated in the occupation of a certain pew in the parish church. In the libel he attempted to found a possessory title on purchase, hiring, and private bargain—as if pews in a parish church were the subjects of private property, and did not belong to the parish for the use and occupation of the parishioners at large. The Court, holding that, by the established principles of law, no title to pews could rest on such a foundation,(a) directed the libel to be reformed, by striking out all that applied to any such origin of Wyllie's right. The [38] libel thus reformed grounded the claim on a possessory title, and alleged in substance: that on a certain pew, No. 5, becoming vacant in 1822, by the former possessor quitting the parish, Wyllie was put in possession, or at least suffered to take it with the consent of the churchwardens; that he was continued in possession till 1826, when he was displaced by the present churchwardens, though he and his family were proper occupants. The Court, on that occasion, expressed its opinion that, as the ordinary has the superintendence of churchwardens, if they had exercised their subordinate discretion improperly in removing Mr. Wyllie, the Court ought to control them, and direct Mr. Wyllie to be reinstated in the pew (vide supra, p. 33).

The object of this allegation now offered is to shew that the churchwardens have acted discreetly and properly in the seating of the present occupant; and, coupling it with what is stated in the libel, there is a strong appearance that Wyllie has no possessory claim. The history given on both sides admits that about 1811 the gallery was built in pursuance of a faculty obtained for that purpose; that pews were then allotted by the churchwardens; and that No. 5, the pew in question, was assigned to Lady Sullivan, the occupier of one of the largest houses in the parish. What bargain was made between her and the churchwardens is not material; for, undoubtedly, by law, she could not purchase the pew. In like manner the pew, No. 4, was allotted to Mrs. Moss, the mother-in-law of Mr. Wyllie, and he occupied it by her sufferance; but in 1822, on Lady Sullivan quitting the parish, Mr. Wyllie removed to No. 5, [39] and paid to Lady Sullivan a yearly rent of 5l. for the occupation of it, under a mistaken idea that she could dispose of this pew as her property; Mrs. Moss then let No. 4, at 3l. a-year, to Mr. Lowden, a parishioner, and, on her death in 1826, bequeathed it to Wyllie. It is now further pleaded that, in May, 1826, Wyllie let his house, and after having lived on for some time in lodgings, that he left the parish in October of that year; but, considering the pew as his private property, he transferred it, with his house, to his tenant, Mrs. Turquand. So that not only he received rent from Mr. Lowden for No. 4, but he appropriated No. 5 to his own house. At Lady Day, 1826, Mr. Morgan became the occupier of Lady Sullivan's house, and, in consequence of an incorrect notion prevailing in the parish that the pew No. 5 had been appropriated to that house, he applied to be seated in it, and required that the transfer to Mrs. Turquand should not be recognized. The churchwardens accordingly removed Mrs. Turquand, and Mr. Morgan and his family were put into possession.

The subject seems to have been misunderstood on all sides; the correct view of it was, that in 1822, when Lady Sullivan ceased to be a parishioner, the pew reverted to the parish, and was at the disposal of the churchwardens; for it never was legally appropriated to the house. In like manner also, if the facts be accurately stated in this allegation, all claim on the part of Wyllie expired in 1826, when he quitted the parish; he could have no power to seat his tenant, Mrs. Turquand, in it, and thus annex it to his house; for this could only be done by a faculty, or by prescription which presupposes a faculty; for, if he [40] let his house from year to year, and were permitted to transfer the possession of this pew to each succeeding tenant, this would, in effect, be annexation. It never was allotted, even nominally, to this house: when his personal title ceased, the pew reverted to the parish, and the churchwardens had a right to place in it whatever family they judged most fitting. In the exercise of that right they have seated Mr. Morgan, a person of respectability, who has a large and increasing family, who inhabits one of the principal houses, and who pays highly to the parish rates. This may be properly pleaded in defence of their conduct; but at the same time, whether they have exercised a sound discretion in their selection of the actual occupant, is no part of the question to be decided in the present suit. The only question here is whether they have unjustifiably disturbed Mr. Wyllie. If Wyllie, having a numerous family, and contributing largely to the rates, had, though originally acquiring it without due authority, continued in undisputed possession of this pew, under long acquiescence of former churchwardens, and of the parishioners, from 1822 till September, 1826; if there were no reason to believe that he was about to quit the parish; and if these churchwardens, under a notion that a pew had been allotted to the house Mr. Morgan rents, had then attempted to remove Wyllie, there would, in my judgment, have been no sufficient ground for the proceeding, and the case would have borne a very different aspect. But if what is now disclosed be true —if Wyllie has left his house and the parish, and has attempted to hand over the pew to his tenant, without the sanction of the church-[41]-wardens, he may act wisely in abandoning this suit.

I would notice one other circumstance—the prayer of this allegation, "That the Court would confirm Morgan in the possession of the pew." In the first place, this suit was not instituted for any such purpose.(a) It is a suit of perturbation brought by Wyllie: if he were not improperly disturbed, the defendants will be dismissed; but there will be no further question. In the next place, the Court would not go out of its way to confirm the possession; for this might be attended with injurious consequences to the parish. By such a step, particularly after it has been pleaded in the fifth article of this allegation, "that the pew No. 5 has always been considered as allotted to the occupier of Lady Sullivan's house," the Court would countenance the idea, which rather ought to be checked, that the pew is specially appropriated to this house. If the population be increasing, and the church-room already insufficient, as pleaded, no seat ought to be put out of the power of the churchwardens. This pew will accommodate seven or eight persons. Mr. Morgan's family may be reduced to one or two—though resident in this house, it might, for the necessary accommodation of the parish, be proper either to remove him, or, at least, to seat some other persons jointly with him. This, it is true, is not to be done except in a case of strong necessity; but the power of doing so, in order to provide for the convenient attendance of the other parishioners at divine worship, ought not to be [42] excluded. Upon the whole, I admit the allegation, but not without hopes that the suit will not proceed.

On the third session of Hilary Term, 1828, the proctor of Mr. Wyllie declared that he proceeded no further: when—Lushington prayed that he might be dismissed.

Jenner prayed costs: the churchwardens had only come forward to perform their duty as the officers of the parish; and, having been successful, were entitled to the protection of the Court. The colour originally given to the case was shewn to be false by the counterpleading, and had led the churchwardens into unnecessary expence.

Per Curiam. The Court said that if Wyllie had stopped after the expression of its opinion when the libel was admitted, it might have been disposed to have dismissed him without any costs: that although it thought he might well have stopped earlier, it could not saddle him with the whole of the costs, on a supposition that the parish would not do its duty to its own officers by payment of their expences: the Court would, therefore, dismiss Wyllie, condemning him in 20l., nomine expensarum.

[43] THE OFFICE OF THE JUDGE PROMOTED BY OLIVER AND TOLL v. HOBART. Arches Court, Michaelmas Term, By-Day, 1827.—In criminal suits articles must be so specific as to afford a fair opportunity of defence.

An appeal from the Episcopal Consistorial Court of Exeter.

On the 21st of June, 1827, a citation issued calling upon the Reverend Henry Charles Hobart, rector of Beerferrers, in the county of Devon, "to answer to certain articles to be administered to him touching and concerning the reformation of his manners and excesses, and more especially for adultery, fornication, or incontinency, and other crimes and offences by virtue of our office, at the promotion of Joseph Burgess Oliver and John Toll, late churchwardens of Beerferrers."

Upon the return of this citation an appearance was given for the party cited; and on the same day articles were exhibited: they were ten in number; and the first pleaded that by the ecclesiastical laws, canons, and constitutions of the Church of England, all clerks in holy orders are liable [for offences of the nature set forth in the citation] to be suspended from the exercise of their clerical functions, and be deprived of their ecclesiastical benefices.

The sixth charged: "That, for fifteen years last past, or for the greatest part of that time, you, the said Henry Charles Hobart, have lived in the parsonage house at Beerferrers, separate from your wife, in a state of illicit intercourse with Mary Merrifield, residing as a maid-servant in your house and family; and [44] that constantly during the said period you have committed the crime of fornication with the said Mary Merrifield; that about fourteen or fifteen years ago you were seen in bed together with the said Mary Merrifield; that you have at all times during the said period openly conducted yourself with the greatest familiarity towards the said Mary Merrifield, and have treated her as your mistress and not as your servant; and that, about nine or ten years ago, you were in the constant habit of sleeping at night with the said Mary Merrifield in the same bed in your parsonage house at Beerferrers, and were frequently in the bed-room together with the said Mary Merrifield in the day time when the door was locked; and that you were at that time in the habit of frequently kissing the said Mary Merrifield, and treated her in every respect as your mistress; and that you frequently, about the same time, used to sit in one chair with the said Mary Merrifield in the parlour: and that, at divers times within the last eight years, you have been seen in the bed-room of the said Mary Merrifield with your arm round her neck, sometimes leaning your head on her bosom, and in other indecent situations with her; and that within the last eight years you frequently occupied the same bed at night with the said Mary Merrifield in your parsonage house at Beerferrers; and more particularly that, on one night about seven or eight years ago, one Jane Dingle, who was then living with you as a servant, came to the door of your bed-room for the purpose of procuring some lozenges for Elizabeth Merrifield, sister of the said Mary Merrifield, who was ill in the house; and [45] that you being then in bed with the said Mary Merrifield, a conversation took place between you and her as to who should get out of bed for such purpose; and that, shortly afterwards, the door was partly opened either by you or the said Mary Merrifield, and the lozenges given out to the said Jane Dingle; and that within the last two years you have been frequently seen walking together with the said Mary Merrifield arm in arm; and at one time within the said period you were seen sitting together with the said Mary Merrifield on a seat in the garden of your parsonage house, with one arm about her neck, and the other hand up her petticoats: and that you have continually for the period of the last fifteen years, and down to within eight months last past continued to be guilty of divers acts of adultery, fornication, and incontinence with the said Mary Merrifield; and that you have within the said period of fifteen years, and more particularly within eight months last past, been guilty of divers other acts of indecency of behaviour with the said Mary Merrifield."

The concluding article prayed, "That the said Henry Charles Hobart be duly and canonically corrected and punished according to the exigency of the law, and be condemned in costs."

Two additional articles and an exhibit were subsequently given in, setting forth that the rectory of Beerferrers having become void by the cession of the said Henry Charles Hobart, he was, on or about the twenty-second day of April, 1822, duly and lawfully admitted and instituted into the same.

On the 7th of September, 1827, the Judge of the Court below "pronounced the articles to be [46] inadmissible—rejected the same, and condemned the promovents in costs." From this decree an appeal was prosecuted; and on this day Lushington and Blake were heard in support of it; and Jenner and Addams for the respondent.

Per Curiam. If these facts had been properly laid—the suit being against a clergyman for a suspension from his office, and for a deprivation of his benefice—the Court would have been of opinion that the suit might have proceeded, notwithstanding eight months had elapsed after most of the charges were laid; for the case is not within the statute of 27 Geo. III. c. 44, as was decided by this Court in the cause of Burgoyne v. Free,(a) confirmed by the opinion of the Court of King's Bench; when, on an application for a prohibition, the question was fully argued and deliberately determined: and though it is true that the subject has been carried up to the House of Lords on a writ of error, yet, till the judgment of the Court of King's Bench has been reversed by that tribunal, the Court is to presume that it was correct, and must act upon it when similar charges are brought to its notice.

[47] The suit itself was instituted partly, if not principally, for the relief of the parishioners from such a nuisance and scandal: but, on the other hand, as they have long acquiesced, and as the suit is criminal and contains charges so heavy against a clergyman, it is due to him, in point of justice, that the charges should be laid so

(a) 2 Add. 414. 5 B. & C. 400, 765.

Note.—In Burgoyne v. Free, on the writ of consultation being duly notified to the Court of Arches, the Judge admitted the articles reformed in such a manner as to be applicable only for the purpose of founding a sentence of suspension or deprivation. Upon their admission, an appeal was prosecuted to the High Court of Delegates; and that Court being informed that the question of prohibition had been carried up to the House of Lords by writ of error, declined at that time to enter upon the cause, expressing a hope that the attention of the Supreme Court might speedily be called to so important a point.

specifically as to enable him to defend himself, and to prove them unfounded if they really are so. In respect even to the more recent charges, there is now no offer made to supply the want of specification. Upon the whole, therefore, the Court is of opinion that the Judge at Exeter did right in rejecting the articles and dismissing the defendant with costs. It, accordingly, affirms the decree; condemns the appellants in costs, and remits the cause.(a)[1]

Note.—A doubt having been expressed in the case of Saunder v. Davies (1 Addams, 296) whether, under the 122d canon (of 1603), entitled, "No sentence of deprivation or deposition to be pronounced against a minister but by the bishop," the Judge of the Arches Court had a power of pronouncing a sentence of deprivation; it has been thought advisable to print in an appendix two cases where the exercise of such authority by that Judge was sanctioned by the High Court of Delegates. One of them is the case of Rich v. Gerard and Loder, referred to in the case above cited. Vide Appendix B.

[48] MAGNAY & OTHERS v. THE RECTOR, CHURCHWARDENS, AND PARISHIONERS OF THE UNITED PARISHES OF ST. MICHAEL, PATERNOSTER ROYAL, AND OF ST. MARTIN VINTRY. Peculiars Court of Canterbury,(a)[2] Michaelmas Term, 2nd Session, 1827.—A faculty for the appropriation of a vault "to the use of a family, so long as they continue parishioners and inhabitants of the parish," will be granted, if it may be done without probable inconvenience to the parish.

On motion.

This was a business of granting a licence or faculty to the executors named in the last will and testament of Christopher Magnay, deceased, late alderman for the ward of Vintry, and late a parishioner and inhabitant of the parish of St. Martin Vintry, London, "For setting apart, appropriating, and confirming a certain vault (with the entrance thereto), many years ago made or built of brick under the north aisle, and extending [49] under a pew, and next to the chancel of the parish church of St. Michael, Paternoster Royal, as and for a burial-place for the interment of the bodies of the said Christopher Magnay, and of his family for ever, exclusive of all others; and also for the removal of the corpses of the said Christopher Magnay, Jane Magnay, his former wife, and of his two sons respectively deceased, from the general vault in the said parish church where the same now remain, into the said private vault, the same having never been hitherto appropriated."

A decree, with the usual intimation, had issued under seal of the Court, citing the rector, churchwardens, and parishioners of the said two united parishes of St. Michael, Paternoster Royal, and St. Martin Vintry, in special, and all others in general, to appear, and shew cause why such licence or faculty should not be granted. This decree was publicly read in the parish church of St. Michael, Paternoster Royal, and was returned into Court, duly certified as to the execution thereof, on the first session of this term.

A certificate, under the hands and seals of the rector and churchwardens of the said united parishes, consenting to the appropriation of the vault, had also been filed in the registry: and an affidavit of the parish clerk was exhibited, setting forth that four persons only had been interred in the vault for which a faculty was prayed, three of whom were neither parishioners nor inhabitants of either of the said united parishes; and that the vault had never been appropriated: which was confirmed by a search made among the records in the registry of the peculiars.

(a)[1] If the suit could have gone on and the articles been admitted, it might perhaps have been deemed proper to direct that the prayer should be specifically framed "for suspension and deprivation," in conformity with the pleading of the first article.

(a)[2] "The Peculiars of His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury comprise a number of parishes, most of which are situated in London and the neighbouring counties. They are divided into districts, the principal of which are the Deanery of the Arches in London, the Deanery of Shoreham in Kent, and the Deanery of Croydon in Surrey. The Judge is properly Dean of the Arches, an appellation not unfrequently though inaccurately applied to the official principal of the Arches Court of Canterbury. These two offices have been generally, though they are not necessarily, held by the same person." Extracted from the Report of the Commissioners—vide note (a) p. 4, supra.

Haggard moved for the faculty.

[50] Per Curiam. The Court observed that the circumstances under which the present application was made afforded a presumption that there was sufficient burial room in the parish to allow of this appropriation.(a)[1] In the city, generally, there was no want of burial accommodation, particularly in the case of united parishes, and the fact of this parish receiving strangers into its vaults led also strongly to such a conclusion. The faculty, however, must be limited in the same manner as faculties for pews, "to the use of the family as long as they continue parishioners and inhabitants;" and, in this instance, it must also contain a clause that the bodies already deposited in the vault shall not be removed.

Faculty decreed.

[51] MORRELL v. MORRELL. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 1st Session, 1827.—The Court will grant administration with a nuncupative will annexed, as contained in an affidavit of three witnesses, holding that 29 Car. II. c. 3, s. 23, applies to merchant seamen.

On motion.

Charles Morrell, while second mate on board a merchant-ship homeward bound from Jamaica, died at sea on the morning of the 25th of February, 1827, after an illness of three weeks.

The deceased, on the evening preceding his death, being then confined to his hammock, requested the attendance of the master and steward of the vessel, as also of a surgeon in the Royal Navy (a passenger on board), and then in their presence and hearing addressed them (as set forth in their affidavit sworn on the 6th of April) to the following effect:—"That he wished to make his will; and that it was his desire that all the property he should die possessed of should go to his mother, to act respecting it as she might think proper." The affidavit further stated "that from the weather being then so tempestuous, and from the rolling of the ship, it was scarcely possible for any one to have written a paper of any length at that time; and the master being constantly engaged on deck, the preparation of a will for the deceased to execute was postponed, and he died without having made any will other than that which he had thus ex-[52]-pressed." The personal estate of the deceased, consisting of a balance of wages, his watch, and wearing apparel, was sworn to be under the value of 20l.

The deceased left behind him his mother and two brothers—both minors—the only parties entitled in distribution to his personal estate in case he had died intestate. In the month of August a decree, with intimation, issued at the instance of the mother; and having been personally served on the two minors in the presence of their aunt (after their mother, their next of kin), and on the said aunt at whose house they then were:—(a)[2]

Lushington now moved that letters of administration, with the will nuncupative annexed of Charles Morrell, the deceased, be granted to Sarah Morrell, widow, the natural and lawful mother, next of kin, and universal legatee therein named. It seemed to him that this will did not fall within the restriction imposed on nuncupative wills by the statute of frauds, though some doubt had been entertained whether the 23d section applied to seamen on board merchant ships.(b)

Per Curiam. The Court was of opinion that this will, being made at sea, would come under the exception in the 23d section of the statute of frauds; but said that in this case there was what was nearly tan-[53]-tamount to a rogatio testium, as appeared from the full statement of facts given in the affidavit of three disinterested and respectable persons. The property was very small and the disposition natural. The Court, therefore, decreed administration with the will, as contained in the affidavit, to the mother as sole legatee—no executor having been named.

Motion granted.

(b) Provided always, that notwithstanding this Act, any soldier being in actual military service, or any mariner or seaman being at sea, may dispose of his moveables, wages, and personal estate as he or they might have done before the making of this Act. 29 Car. II. c. 3, s. 23.

YOUNG, OTHERWISE MEARING v. BROWN. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 1st Session, 1827.—An administrator, pendente lite, will be appointed, such appointment being necessary from the nature of the deceased's property, and from the conduct of one of the parties in the suit: and the nominee of the other party, on whose conduct there is no imputation, may be selected if shewn to be impartial, competent, and responsible.

On motion.

Phillimore moved for an administration pending suit on the affidavit of Mr. Young, one of the parties: "That the deceased, James Brown Unwin, was, at his death, possessed of certain freehold and leasehold houses (at Bethnal Green, and in Quaker Street, Spitalfields), some of which are tenanted by persons accustomed to pay their rents weekly, and that unless they are so collected there is great danger they may be irrecoverable. That Brown, the other party, since the commencement of this suit, has received some of the rents, and distrained for others; and having removed some of the household furniture and goods belonging to the deceased from his late dwelling-house, retains them in his possession." Young further made oath, "That he verily believes it is for the interest of this estate that there should be an administrator pending the suit; and that William Gale, of Bethnal Green Road, who was the chief collector of the deceased's rents during his life, should be so appointed."

[54] Per Curiam. This is an application for a grant of administration pendente lite; and the first question is, whether any necessity exists for the grant. The estate consists principally of houses of which the rents must be collected weekly, otherwise there will be great danger of loss. This fact, as well as Brown's conduct, in collecting the rents, shews a necessity for the grant. The Court, then, is satisfied that an administration pending suit is proper in this case; and the next question is, to whom it shall make the grant. The Court never selects either of the parties, but generally an indifferent nominee.(a) Young is executor of a latter will; there is no imputation on his conduct; but from the proceedings it appears that Brown took probate, and, in some degree, privately, of an earlier will; and he has since got possession of some of the effects—conduct which was improper, and which is not denied. Who, then, does Young propose? Mr. Gale, who filled the office of receiver during the life-time of the deceased: he knows the property, no objection is offered to his responsibility and impartiality, nor any dissent expressed to his appointment. Let the decree issue to him.

Motion granted.

On a prayer to condemn Brown in the costs the Court declined so to do. It thought the application premature, as the motion had been entirely ex parte; besides, no objection had been made to the person proposed, by Young, as administrator.

[55] LAW v. CAMPBELL. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 1st Session, 1827.—The Court will grant administration, with the will annexed, to one of two universal legatees, a decree with intimation having issued in the name of the other, who was since dead.

On motion.

James Law, late a lieutenant in His Majesty's 46th regiment, died on the 20th of October, 1823, in the East Indies, leaving Lieutenant Campbell, on duty in that country, sole executor of his will. The deceased appointed his uncles, Henry and Edward Law, universal legatees. In July, 1827, a decree, with the usual intimation, issued at the instance of Henry Law, and was served on Lieutenant Campbell's agents and also upon the Royal Exchange: no appearance being given, a decree for the administration, with the will annexed, passed on the caveat-day in October to the said Henry Law: but this decree having become ineffective by his death, Addams moved the Court to rescind it and to grant the administration, upon the original process, to Edward Law, the surviving universal legatee. He cited the case of Maidman v. All Persons in General, 1 Phill. 51, as analogous.

Per Curiam. By granting this motion the Court only waves the mere form of citing the next of kin; and it does not, under the circumstances, and the property being small, consider a new process necessary. The administration may pass.

Motion granted.

[56] CONSTABLE v. STEIBEL & EMANUEL. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 1st Session, 1827.—Hand-writing and finding are sufficient to support a codicil confirming a legacy under a will; which codicil came out of the custody of and was propounded by the person solely benefited under it; who had been sworn executor of the will and one codicil four months before producing this paper, and the validity of whose legacy under the will was at the time a question depending in the Court of Chancery.—In Courts of Probate it is almost a settled principle not to pronounce for disputed papers on evidence of hand-writing alone. —Evidence to the genuineness not of a mere signature, but of a holograph of some length, is more cogent and weighty than evidence of a contrary tendency.

Edward Emanuel, the deceased in this cause, a bachelor of the age of 25 years, died at Paris on the 18th of March, 1825, of a wound inflicted by himself on the 16th of the same month. By his will, written with his own hand, and dated the 6th of July, 1824, he gave, among other legacies, the sum of 2000l. to Robert Constable; and appointed him, Sigismund Steibel, Samuel Steibel, and Henry Emanuel, his brother, executors. The latter he also made residuary legatee. The deceased likewise prepared and wrote a codicil bearing date the 12th or 13th of March, 1825. Of this will and codicil Robert Constable and Samuel Steibel were sworn executors on the 12th of July following, but the probate did not issue until the 9th of September. In November of the same year a bill in Chancery was filed against the acting executors (by Joel Emanuel, the father of the residuary legatee, who was a minor) to compel them to account for the 2000l. bequeathed to Constable, on the ground that the legacy was void in consequence of his being a subscribing witness to the will. Subsequent to the filing of this bill Constable produced a paper in the following terms:—

"13th March, 1825.

"I request Mr. Constable to pay my debts in France. His salary and 35l. to be paid independant of the 2000l. I bequeath him. "EDWARD EMANUEL."

[57] In December, 1825, a decree issued from the Prerogative Court of Canterbury at the instance of Constable, citing his co-acting executor to take probate of this paper as a codicil to the deceased's will; and in Hilary Term, 1826, a further decree to see proceedings issued against Henry Emanuel, one other of the executors and the residuary legatee. An appearance was given by separate proctors for both the parties cited: the paper was then propounded, on behalf of Constable, as a further codicil to the will of the deceased and asserted to be all in his own hand-writing: allegations were admitted in support of and opposition to this paper; and upon the evidence taken on both sides—

Lushington and Addams for Constable, contended that the weight of evidence was in favour of the genuineness of the hand-writing; that the account of the finding was natural and satisfactory; that the contents were probable; and that fabrication was highly improbable.

Jenner and Pickard for the residuary legatee, argued that the time of producing the paper and its date—on the very day on which the deceased and Constable had a serious quarrel—were very suspicious; that the finding was not inconsistent with fraud, as the box had been for some time in Constable's power; that the evidence to the hand-writing was contradictory and inconclusive: that the Court therefore would pronounce that Constable, on whom the onus probandi lay, had failed in proof.

Dodson on behalf of Steibel, submitted to the judgment of the Court.

[58] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This case lies in a narrow compass and is not attended with any particular difficulty. It has lost much of the importance which it possessed in its earlier stages, since I understand a Court of Equity has put the same construction on the statute, the 25th Geo. II. c. 5, as this Court had previously done; having decided that, in a will disposing only of personalty, a legacy to an attesting witness is not void by that statute.(a)

The question arises on a paper propounded as a second codicil to the will of Edward Emanuel. The will and first codicil are not contested; they are all in the deceased's hand-writing; the will is dated on the 6th of July, 1824, just before he went abroad; by this will he gives a legacy of 2000l. to Robert Constable, who had been a classical tutor in the deceased's family; and he appoints him an executor in conjunction with Samuel and Sigismund Steibel and his own brother Henry, to whom he also bequeaths the residue. In July, 1825, probate was taken of this will and the first codicil by Robert Constable and Samuel Steibel, a power being reserved to the two other executors. The effects were sworn under 14,000l.; and I am informed that they do not exceed 13,000l. This probate did not pass the seal till the September following. In the month of November of the same year, proceedings were instituted in the Court of Chancery by the father of the residuary legatee, [59] to obtain a decision of that Court as to the effect of the statute, the 25th Geo. II., upon the legacy to Mr. Constable, and, as I have already observed, it was there held that the statute does not apply to wills of personalty only.(a) In the mean time the codicil in dispute was propounded by Constable, who stated that it was all in the hand-writing of the deceased: it is in these words:—

(a) See the case of Brett v. Brett, 3 Add. 210. On the 21st of May, 1827, that decision was affirmed by the High Court of Delegates, after hearing counsel for the appellant only.

"13th March, 1825.

"I request Mr. Constable to pay my debts in France. His salary and 35l. to be paid independant of the 2000l. I bequeath him. "EDWARD EMANUEL."

The last clause of this paper is now of no importance: and to the salary Constable would of course be entitled, unless there was something to shew that it had been paid. The only effect, then, of this codicil is to recognize the debt for the money alleged to have been advanced. Now that such a sum was due is not at all improbable; because it appears from the evidence that the deceased was obliged on the morning he left Montmorency to borrow twenty francs; and, from the papers in the cause, it seems that he must have been occasionally in want of money, although he had a letter of credit upon the cashier of Rothschild's banking-house at Paris. This sum of 35l. is, however, the whole matter in dispute; and the question is whether this paper is genuine or fabricated—whether it is the hand-writing of the deceased or a forgery. It is true that the burthen of proof, to shew that the paper is genuine, lies upon Constable, the party setting it up; and though the acknowledgment of a debt of 35l. ad-[60]-vanced as a loan would be no sufficient object to induce the fabrication of such a document, yet, as it also recognises the legacy of 2000l. under the will, that recognition might have been supposed of far greater importance. Is Mr. Constable, then, guilty of a forgery of this instrument, and to be condemned in the costs of these proceedings? for that is almost the only question to which this case is reduced: the Court would certainly require pretty strong proof before it would arrive at that conclusion.

The first evidence in support of the genuineness of the paper refers to the hand-writing. Here are several witnesses (so many, indeed, that it will be unnecessary to advert to the evidence of Hamilton) intimately acquainted with the hand-writing of the deceased, who depose that, in their opinion, the paper was written by the deceased; and this affirmative evidence is not to a mere subscription, which may be more easily and exactly imitated, but to a holograph of three lines: the witnesses, therefore, are more able to pronounce decidedly upon such a paper than if called upon to speak to a few letters composing a signature. This evidence then is, if evidence of hand-writing can be, of considerable weight. But the inclination, amounting almost to a settled principle, of this Court—founded perhaps on the facility with which hand-writing may be imitated—has been not to pronounce for a disputed paper on proof of hand-writing alone, but to require some corroborating circumstances. These are peculiarly necessary in the present case, where there is much conflicting evidence on this point; for there are a great number of witnesses, also well acquainted with [61] the hand-writing of the deceased, who speak to their belief that the paper is a forgery, being, in their opinion, unlike his ordinary character. These witnesses are not to be laid entirely out of consideration; but I never can think that evidence of dissimilitude is equally cogent and weighty with evidence of similitude, and for this reason—that it requires great skill so to imitate hand-writing, especially for several lines, as to deceive persons well acquainted with the original character; and who are not very likely to form an erroneous opinion if, on carefully inspecting such a paper, they are satisfied that it is genuine. On the other hand, dissimilitude may be occasioned by a variety of circumstances—by the state of the health and spirits of the writer, by his materials, by his position, by his hurry or care—circumstances which deserve still more consideration when witnesses rest their opinion on a fancied dissimilarity of individual letters. But the reasons given by this class of witnesses frequently shake their testimony; and we also know that when persons come prepared to speak in favour of a preconceived opinion, their evidence must be received with some degree of caution. Here, when the witnesses descend into particulars, their reasons are so trivial, so unsupported by the exhibits in the cause, and so discrepant from each other, that I think if they had not been swayed by prepossessions, they would hardly have ventured to arrive at the conclusion that the paper in question was not of the hand-writing of the deceased.

A comparison of hand-writing is also resorted to; and for that purpose two engravers, on the part of the residuary legatees, are produced; but it is [62] well known that men of this employment, from their habit of attending to the exact form of every letter, when engaged to make fac similes, are so alive to the least dissimilitude, that any little difference would strike them as of importance. Here, moreover, they do not agree. One engraver is confident that the codicil is not of the hand-writing of the deceased; while the other says that he cannot venture to form an opinion, and that there is not such a difference as would justify him in asserting that the paper in question was not written by the same person who wrote the will. Consistently with the cautious reserve of this last witness, a gentleman from the bank deposes, that he sees nothing of a feigned hand in the instrument; but that, on the contrary, the likeness is so exact that it would have passed a power of attorney. These are among the persons generally produced in this Court to speak to feigned hand-writing. I have also looked into the answers of the parties opposing this paper; and I do not find that they much vary the result of this portion of the evidence. Mr. Emanuel, the guardian of the minor and father of the deceased, has so strong an impression, that he swears to his belief that no part of the codicil is in the deceased's hand-writing; but Mr. Steibel, one of the acting executors, will not go so far, "he cannot form a belief or disbelief whether the subscription to the codicil is of the proper subscription of the deceased." There is no testimony that carries this branch of the case further; and if I were bound to pause here, and to form an opinion whether this paper is in the hand-writing of the deceased, I would say that the evidence in favour of it so [63] far preponderates that I should be disposed to pronounce the codicil genuine.

But there is another point for my consideration, viz. the history of the paper itself and of the finding. How was it produced? The first witness on this part of the case is Sophia Killen, a young girl, servant to Constable, the party in the cause. Constable's sister is also stated to have been present at the finding; but she is dead. Killen's account is to this effect—that when Constable returned from France he brought two trunks and a box. The box was corded and deposited in a back garret where she slept; that one day in the beginning of August, 1825, she brought it down, by Constable's directions, into the parlour; it was then uncorded [there was at this time no question about the will] and opened; and was found to contain some articles of dress, a map, a dressing-box, and three books; that Constable took the books, from one of which the paper in dispute dropped; that he took it up and said, "How particular poor Emanuel was" [a very natural observation for him to have made]; that he gave it to his sister, who apparently read, and afterwards laid it upon the table.

This is the substance of the evidence that applies to the finding of this paper; and it has been asked, Why did not Constable produce it at the time of this alleged discovery? but it was not found till after Steibel and himself had been sworn executors; and he does not seem to have been aware that it was a document of any importance. His legacy under the will was not then contested; he could, therefore, have had no inducement at that time to fabricate such an instrument; and if it be [64] a fabrication, and the finding were precontrived, it was a very cunningly devised method. This, however, is not, to my mind, the legal result of this part of the evidence. It is not at all improbable that he wrote it previous to the quarrel which is spoken to on the Sunday morning; for it is in evidence that he was, on that day, in a state of considerable excitement, and the contents of the paper itself point to an apparent contemplation of the fatal act by which he terminated his existence. The French ladies, at whose house the deceased was lodging, describe his agitation of mind on the day preceding his sudden departure for Paris; that he did not eat his dinner; that he exhibited much restlessness; and on the following morning came down stairs very early, looked pale, and was hurried in his manner; that he borrowed twenty francs of the daughter of the landlady, and then quitted the house. It appears, too, that Constable was surprised at this conduct, and in the course of the same morning went to Paris in search of him—but without success; that he returned to Montmorency, and remained there two or three days, when having defrayed every expence, and repaid the twenty francs borrowed by Emanuel, he went back to Paris, where he discovered what had happened. After this he remained at Paris above a month, during which time Madame le Duc, in whose charge he had left a box at Montmorency, forwarded it to him; and there is nothing in her evidence, nor in the evidence of her daughter, which would justify the conclusion that there were no books in the box at the time it was packed up and sent to Paris.

If this paper, then, was not written by the de-[65]-ceased, when was it fabricated? It is perfectly improbable that it was fabricated at Paris; besides, the case set up on the part of Mr. Emanuel is—that the paper was fabricated, and prepared to meet the question raised on the will; and unless I can induce myself to believe that Killen, the maidservant, has perjured herself, it seems impossible for me to pronounce that it was forged subsequent to the agitation of that question. And looking at the whole history of the transaction, there appears no improbability that the deceased should write this paper, when he intended to commit the act that led to his death: the fair inference is, I think, the other way.

Then it is said it was not likely that Constable should have lent him 35l.; but why should he not have been competent to have advanced this sum? It is not probable that he should have quitted England without any funds of his own; and the deceased would rather, in my opinion, resort occasionally to his friend and guardian, or companion (whichever he might be), than constantly apply to the clerk at Rothschild's: nor is it extraordinary that he should remember the debt arising from this loan, and provide for the payment. The declaration to the surgeon, Mr. King, that he had been scandalized by his bosom friend—made subsequent to that act which, of itself, affords the strongest presumption of a diseased mind, can be but of little weight; and the hurried exclamation of Constable to Madame Delamere, when in a state of great anxiety, only shews that he but too truly foreboded the consequences of the morbid irritability of his friend. Besides, any reference to their dispute by one or the other at that time can [66] have no bearing on the case, if, as I think not improbable, the paper was written previous to the quarrel.

It is unnecessary to enter further into a detail of this case. After the course this suit has taken the Court could hardly pronounce against this paper, but on a conviction that it was a fraudulent and fabricated instrument. At that conclusion I cannot arrive: on the contrary, from a consideration of all the evidence, I believe it to be genuine; and I pronounce for it, accordingly, as a codicil to the last will of the deceased.

The question of costs is, in this instance, a matter of very little importance—they must necessarily fall on the estate.

Lushington then prayed—that, as Emanuel, the residuary legatee, had also a specific legacy, and this question was raised solely for his benefit, should the residue be deficient, the costs incurred by the two executors, Constable and Steibel, in this suit, should first be paid; and that in case the residue was not adequate to the discharge of all the costs, the expences, on the part of the residary legatee, should be borne by himself. But the Court observed that the residuary legatee was a minor; and as the paper was not produced till late, there seemed to be no reason to make any distinction.

The Court pronounced for the validity of the codicil; and decreed the costs of all the parties to be paid out of the estate.

[67] In the Goods of Archibald Bathgate. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 2nd Session, 1827.—Written and verbal instructions being given from which a will was prepared, the execution of which was prevented by unforeseen circumstances and by death: the Court—the widow consenting—will grant probate of the will so prepared (though never seen by nor read over to the deceased) in preference to granting administration with the instructions annexed to the widow;

the deceased's intention being clearly to secure the interests of his children by the interposition of executors.

On motion.

The deceased was master of the ship "Robert;" and died on the 18th of June last, at Montserrat, in the West Indies. He left a widow and four children—minors; and a property of about 1500l. independent of a real estate in Scotland of 25l. per annum. On the 2d of December, 1826, he gave instructions in his own hand-writing to his solicitor from which to prepare a will; and added some verbal directions as to the executors. Before these instructions could be fully carried into effect it became necessary to make some inquiries respecting the real property; and the deceased, who was just going to sail, desired that the will might be sent to meet him at Portsmouth to be executed. The will and also a draft of a disposition of the real property were forwarded to Portsmouth, but the ship did not touch there, and the deceased never returned to this country.

Per Curiam. The question is what paper should be proved—whether the instructions in the hand-writing of the deceased should be annexed to an administration to the widow; or whether probate of the will—written and prepared in his life-time quite ready for execution, which was prevented only by accident—should be granted to the executors. There are many instances where papers not seen by nor read over to the deceased have been pro-[68]-nounced for in this Court;(a)[1] but here the executors do not appear: and though the Court would not refuse to grant an administration to the widow with the instructions annexed, yet, as she only takes a life interest in the property, or even less, for her widowhood, with remainder to the children, if the executors, who are also trustees, would, with the consent of the widow, take probate in common form, it would much more completely carry into effect the intentions of the deceased. The obvious wish of the testator was, by the interposition of executors and trustees, to secure the interests of the children; and the Court is also bound to protect their interests.

Lushington said there was no objection on the part of the widow to the suggestion of the Court; and on a subsequent day the executors proved the will.

MYNN v. ROBINSON AND OTHERS, BY THEIR GUARDIAN. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 2nd Session, 1827.—On affidavit that an attesting witness has been diligently sought and cannot be found, an executor may pray publication: but the other party has a right to a monition against the witness to attend for cross-examination if they can discover him.—Deeds should not be annexed to an allegation; but be deposited in the registry, and the material parts only recited in the plea.

On motion.

This was a cause of proving in solemn form of law the last will and testament of Catherine Mynn, late of Westbourne Green, Middlesex, bearing date the 2d of June, 1827; promoted by John Mynn, the husband, and sole executor, against William R. Robinson, the nephew, and an executor named in a will bearing date the 23rd of November, 1826. On the by-day after Trinity Term, 1827, the adverse proctor declared "he proceeded no further" [69] for W. R. Robinson; and then appeared for Thomas Maltby and alleged him to be the maternal uncle and guardian lawfully assigned to four infants, the younger children of W. R. Robinson; and, as such, contingent legatees in reversion in the will dated the 23d of November.

On an extra-day after Trinity Term last an allegation propounding the will of the 2d of June was debated; when the Court directed the second article annexing a long marriage settlement to be reformed; and said that in this and all future cases it would be sufficient to bring deeds into the registry; to recite in the plea the material parts, and to refer to the deeds as deposited in the archives of the Court.(a)[2]

(a)[1] Vide Sikes v. Snaith, 3 Phill. 355, and the cases cited.

(a)[2] The Court, in order to shew that this mode of pleading was adopted in the Courts of Common Law, read the following passages from Selwyn's Nisi Prius, p. 506-7:—"In framing the declaration it is not necessary to set forth the provisions of the deed in letters and words. It will be sufficient to state the substance and legal effect. Neither is it necessary to set forth all the provisions of the deed; stating such parts as are necessary to entitle the plaintiff to recover, will be sufficient." And

On the caveat-day, in August, this allegation [70] was admitted as reformed: and on this day the drawer of the will and two of the three attesting witnesses having been previously examined; and after reading an affidavit that as soon as the plea propounding the will had been admitted, the third subscribing witness had been diligently sought for, but that he could not be found, and that it was believed he had quitted the kingdom: Burnaby and Dodson prayed publication, and observed that the husband was willing to rest his case on the proofs already adduced.

On the other side, Jenner and Lushington objected that the witness had not been advertised for; and that the affidavit did not enter into a proper detail of the diligence that had been used, nor of the inquiries made for his discovery.

Per Curiam. The Court was, however, of opinion that the affidavit was quite sufficient to account for the non-production of this attesting witness; and that the executor had therefore a right to pray publication and put the opposers to plead in case they should think fit; and if by greater diligence their inquiries were more successful, and they should find the witness, they would be entitled to a monition against him to undergo an examination on interrogatories.

On the by-day, the Court being informed by the counsel for the minors that Robert Hone, the witness in question, was present and ready to be examined, directed him to be produced; when he was sworn by the Judge himself and ordered to be examined instanter.

[71] HILLAM v. WALKER. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 2nd Session, 1827.—The Court having decided that a legatee in a separate paper is not executrix according to the tenor, she cannot oppose the validity of a former will; if she is paid her costs, and if the executor of that will is ready to take probate of the paper by which she is benefited and to pay her full bequest.—When a party is out of the kingdom the Court will direct him to give security for costs.—The principle on which costs are given out of the estate is that the party was led into the suit by the state of the deceased's testamentary papers.

On motion.

Sidney Walker, late a lieutenant in the East India Company's 4th regiment, died on the 16th of March, 1826, on his passage to England, a bachelor, leaving a father, who had been resident at Naples for twenty-five years, during which period he and the deceased had not seen each other. In 1818, while Lieutenant Walker was in England, he became attached to and entered into an engagement of marriage with Miss Hillam; but owing to his pecuniary circumstances the solemnization thereof was deferred, and he returned to India. Previous, however, to such return, in one of his letters to Miss Hillam, dated Manchester, 5th of August, 1821, he enclosed a paper sealed up, with directions that it should not be opened till after his death. This paper was of the following tenor:—

Manchester, 4th August, 1821. Sunday.

It is my wish when I die that you should have 500l. of my property that I get from Mr. Vaughan, and that my relations the Grants in America should have the same sum absolutely and my clothes and if any more comes to me independent of my share of my Grandmother's property left to us independent of my Mother (which is divided or intended by me amongst my Father and Mother Brothers and Sister) you should have a proportion of it equal to the proportion of 500l. [72] to the amount of Mr. Vaughan's property (my share) in expectancy or possession after paying my just debts—to agents in India besides another to the creditors of Mr. James Inglis—of perhaps 100l. or more that is left to you, to your Father and Mother after you, afterwards I hope you will in a note the author remarks: "This rule ought to be strictly adhered to, as well to prevent the extension of the record to an unreasonable length, as to avoid the danger resulting to the party setting forth the deed, from variances and formal objections. In Dundas v. Lord Weymouth, Cowp. 665, the Court said they would animadvert upon any future instance of putting parties to the enormous expence of setting out deeds at length or superfluous parts of them. And in Price v. Fletcher, Cowp. 727, where the plaintiff, in an action for breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment under a lease, had set out the whole lease verbatim, it was referred to the Master to strike out the superfluous matter in the declaration with costs." This you can show if any demur should be made by my relations and tell them, it is intended you should have that proportion of my property as it at present is and you can have it now or interest at 8 per cent. till it is sold—Keep the snuff-box.(a)[1]

This paper was propounded by Miss Hillam, who gave in an allegation in support of it. In the mean time an appearance had been given for Richard Walker, the father and only next of kin. But the Court having directed at the instance of Miss Hillam, on account of his absence from England, that he should give security for costs in the sum of 50l.,(b) the appearance for him was withdrawn; and a fresh one given for his son, Henry Walker—acting as his attorney—and then resident in England. An authentic copy of a will executed in India, and bearing date on the 13th of April, 1817, together with a schedule of debts, dated May 13th of the same year, was brought in by the proctor for Henry Walker, who declared that he opposed [73] Miss Hillam's allegation. From the admission of this allegation in Easter Term an appeal was entered, an inhibition taken out and afterwards relaxed; and the cause remitted; and on this day the proctor for Henry Walker declared that he did not further oppose the paper propounded by Miss Hillam; but intervened for Edward Stanhope Walker, a brother of the deceased, and an executor named in the will of 1817, and prayed probate of that will, and of Miss Hillam's paper as a codicil. This was objected to as it was contended that she was entitled to probate of the letter she had propounded as executrix according to the tenor; and it was stated that she had lately discovered a further paper which confirmed that construction.

Per Curiam. The Court is of opinion that Miss Hillam is not executrix according to the tenor; and is therefore not entitled to probate: but that as the validity of the paper she propounded is now admitted, she is entitled to her full costs out of the estate. It has, however, been suggested that she has now discovered other papers which may give her a greater interest; but if that were not the case, and if she were paid all the benefit given her under the paper already propounded together with her costs, she could have no interest in contending—whether the will now produced be valid—or the deceased be intestate. The case must at all events stand over till the papers referred to by Miss Hillam's counsel are produced; and, moreover, as it appears that the will of 1817 now before the Court was executed in India—in duplicate, and that the deceased brought one part of it with him to England which is not at present forthcoming—and which the law, [74] therefore, presumes he has revoked; there are sufficient grounds for the Court to pause, and to refuse probate till the next of kin has been cited.

[Hilary Term, By-Day, 1828].—Before the allegation propounding the second paper was brought in two codicils, dated the 12th and 14th of May, 1824—were transmitted from India, by which the deceased referred to the will of 1817, and gave Miss Hillam the same benefit as by the paper she had already set up.(a)[2] In consequence she withdrew from the suit; and the Court was now moved to decree her costs out of the estate.

(a)[2] "I have made a will in 1817 previously to going home to England in which I bequeathed &c. . . . I now wish that 500l. or 800l. if the Tottenham property is equal to 5000l. a share, be given out of my property, by my Father, Mother, Brother and Sister to Harriet Hillam of Penton Place, and to her mother Mrs. Hillam of Penton Place in the event of Harriet Hillam's death. This may be a last request, and I trust it may be granted. "S. WALKER."

Signed and written off the island of Cheduba on the evening of the 12th of May, 1824.

country—and which was established as far as it went. Afterwards other papers were sent over from India, under which she [75] had the same interest: she then withdrew. So far, therefore, from having acted vexatiously, she rather has been harassed by the next of kin—who on the eve of the long vacation entered an appeal —which he subsequently abandoned. But I act on the principle which always guides this Court in decreeing costs out of the estate, viz. that the party was led into the contest by the state in which the deceased left his papers. Miss Hillam then is clearly entitled to her costs: and on the whole I see no objection to the costs of all parties being paid out of the estate.

REAY v. COWCHER. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 2nd Session, 1827.—Where the widow in opposition to a will sets up habitual intoxication, weakened capacity and custody, she may also plead insane dislike on the part of her husband to account for their living apart, though the delusion may not be sufficient, per se to invalidate the will.

[See further, 2 Hagg. Ecc. 249.]

On the admission of an allegation.

Peter Cowcher, the deceased in this cause, died on the first of December, 1826, leaving behind him Elizabeth Cowcher, his widow, a son, Robert Cowcher, and a daughter, Mary, the wife of Stephen Salmon. On his death a will dated the 6th of March, 1824—a codicil dated 21st of October, 1826, and another codicil without date were found: the will in two envelopes in a tin box, and the two codicils folded together and locked up (with a third paper) in a private drawer of his writing table.

The will was to the following effect:—

To his wife an annuity of 10l., to his daughter Mary Salmon an annuity of 80l. for her sole use; and [76] after her death, his executrices to appropriate such part of the annuity as they may think fit for the education of her children: to his son Robert Cowcher 80l. per annum—with the same provision for children; and in both cases— if no children—the legacies to become part of his personal estate: To Mrs. Elizabeth Reay his household furniture, linen, plate, china, books, his interest in the lease of a house at Brixton Hill; and also two houses in London: the residue after payment of debts to his executrices in trust to appropriate the balance of their accounts in purchase of government securities, and the principal and interest to his grand-children, share and share alike, at the age of twenty-two years. The testator then appoints Mrs. Elizabeth Reay and her sister Mrs. Jane Reay executrices, and requests them to accept two and a half per cent. on the balance of their annual accounts, with mourning, and a ring to each; and gives them power to grant leases, &c. The will was signed, sealed, and executed in the presence of three witnesses. It was fairly written though there were a few errors of orthography.

The codicils were as follows:—

In addition to the Enclosed, I have to request of my Executrix's—that should any my unforeseen demands be made upon estate—that I—Invest them with full powers to sell to the Best advantage—my leasehold house in Alfred Place to answer my Just Debts that may be claimed on my estate

The will and the two codicils were propounded in an allegation, given in on behalf of Elizabeth Reay, spinster, one of the executrices, which pleaded the factum, &c. of the will and codicils—the capacity of the deceased till immediately before his death, that the papers were all [78] in his hand-writing, that they were found on the day of his death, by Elizabeth Reay and Robert Cowcher, his son, and that they were in the same plight and condition as when found.

These testamentary papers were opposed by Mrs. Cowcher, the widow, who had given in a responsive allegation, consisting of sixteen articles.

The nine first articles and the eleventh pleaded certain circumstances in the conduct of the deceased, and declarations for the purpose of shewing that he had taken an insane dislike to his wife, which at length reached such a height, that in 1820, believing her life in danger she separated from him; and that this dislike extended to his children, and to all persons who communicated with his wife or with them. These articles embraced a period of time from 1799 to 1825.

The tenth pleaded the deceased's cohabitation with Elizabeth Reay from 1820.

The twelfth and thirteenth, habitual intoxication; impaired faculties, health and spirits; controul of Reay; continuance of delusion.

The fourteenth, that the deceased in October, 1826, was prevailed upon by the threats and entreaties of Reay, to write the codicil of that date, that Charles Kenrick Douglas, a friend of Reay's, but unknown to the deceased, was first appointed residuary legatee—that Keay afterwards prevailed upon deceased to substitute her name.

Fifteenth, that during the deceased's illness, his children requesting to be informed of his health, Reay made her sister write, saying that he was improving; that they called, but Reay would not allow any separate communication, she or her sister remaining all the time by the deceased's bed-side, [79] and when he attempted to introduce the subject of his property, interrupted him and would not suffer him to express his wishes.

Sixteenth, that at his death he was possessed of property yielding an annual income of 1200l.

The admission of the allegation was now opposed.

Jenner and Dodson for the executrix.

Lushington contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. It is admitted that this allegation is so far properly drawn, that the objections lie rather to the general substance than to the particular form of the articles. The allegation propounding the papers merely pleaded the factum of the several instruments, the hand-writing and capacity; but did not enter into any history of the deceased's connexions or affairs. The case now set up is of a mixed nature, viz. insanity and dislike, habitual intoxication, weakened capacity, fraud, controul and custody. The nine first articles and also the eleventh, which plead delusion respecting his wife and children, who he fancied were engaged in a conspiracy against him, are said to be irrelevant. To this it is answered that the articles are historical, and intended to account for the fact that the deceased lived separate and apart from his wife, which would probably make its appearance in some later stage of the proceedings; and might be injurious to the widow's case if it were not shewn to arise from an insane delusion: now in this point of view these articles may be of importance; though the facts here pleaded certainly would not alone have been of sufficient [80] weight and stringency to invalidate the will, if he had died as soon as it had been executed; particularly as the will by itself is not inconsistent with the probable disposition of his property.

The remaining part of the case—both as it respects the later history of the deceased's life, and as it respects the nature and appearance of the instruments—is far stronger. The disposition made by the codicils, and the condition of the deceased at the period of their execution, have a more direct and immediate bearing on the question, but the previous history may not be irrelevant, as by accounting for the conduct of both parties it will assist the Court in arriving at the true conclusion. My only doubt is whether it might not be compressed into one or two articles; but as short articles are sometimes more convenient, I shall leave that point to the consideration and discretion of the counsel: and, on the whole, I am of opinion that this allegation contains a case which is fit to go to proof.

Allegation admitted.

IN THE GOODS OF HENRY SAMPSON FRY. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 3rd Session, 1827.—Directing certain persons to pay debts, funeral expences, and expences of probate, is an appointment of such persons executors.

On motion.

The deceased by his last will and testament, executed in the presence of three witnesses, devised his real estates—subject in exoneration of his personal property to the payment of certain bond debts—to his son Joseph James Fry, his daughter Susanna Fry, and his friend Hawley Clutterbuck and their heirs, upon trust to receive the rents and profits, to appropriate a [81] portion thereof, annually in the purchase of stock, to pay his debts, funeral expences, and the expences of proving his will. They were also empowered to sell the estates. He gave his personal property to be equally divided between his said children, and appointed his daughter residuary legatee; but did not name any executor. He bequeathed a legacy of 20l. to Clutterbuck in case he acted as one of his trustees; and directed that he should continue to collect the rents at an allowance of five per cent. upon the net proceeds.

Phillimore moved that probate of this will be granted to Joseph James Fry and Hawley Clutterbuck, as two of the executors according to the tenor. The personal estate, it was understood, did not exceed 450l.

Per Curiam. The Court said that paying debts and funeral expences, and expences of proving a will, was performing the office of executor. The appointment of trustees was for the management and disposal of the real estate, and for no other purpose. There can be no doubt that the parties, for whom probate is now prayed, are executors according to the tenor.

Motion granted.

IN THE GOODS OF ANN JONES. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 3rd Session, 1827.—A party may commence a suit in formâ pauperis.

Per Curiam. Elizabeth Wagner is desirous of instituting a suit to call in probate of the will of Ann Jones; certainly it is more usual not to admit a party in formâ pauperis till after proceedings have been commenced. But, in point of reason and justice, [82] an application of this kind should be granted as well before (a) as after, assistance may be required to extract a citation. I shall, therefore, assign the present applicant, on her taking the usual oath, an advocate and proctor; she will, however, be liable to be dispaupered in case, upon the appearance of the party to be cited, it should be shewn that she is not entitled to this privilege; as in all these cases a party is admitted de bene esse.

JAMESON AND OTHERS v. COOKE AND OTHERS. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 3rd Session, 1827.—To entitle an unfinished paper to proof, it is necessary —1st, to connect it most clearly with the deceased; 2dly, to shew fixed and final intention; 3dly, completion prevented.

On the admission of an allegation.

This was a business of proving in solemn form of law an alleged codicil or addition to the last will and testament of Lydia Ellison, late of the city of York, widow, promoted by Mary Ann Cooke, Edward Ball, Mary Watkinson, and Isabella Warne, four of the five legatees therein named, and four of the parties cited to propound the same, against William Jameson, the surviving executor of the said will, and Isabella Nunn, the other legatee named in the codicil, and also against the Reverend John Steward, two of the next of kin of the deceased.

The allegation, propounding the paper in substance, was as follows:—

That Lydia Ellison died at York on the 29th of April, 1826, leaving a personal estate of about [83] 8000l. That for thirty years she had a great affection for, and intimacy with, Mrs. Cooke and Mrs. Warne; and also had a great regard for Mrs. Watkinson and Mr. Ball. That in September, 1796, she made her will; and, after devising her real estates, gave a legacy of 100l. each to Cooke and Warne, and the proceeds of a sale of her estate at Saffron Walden to them jointly with Mrs. Nunn; that upon the death of the residuary legatee she sold some of her real property, so that her personalty was much increased: and intending to dispose of this, she, on the 3d of August, 1824, wrote the paper propounded; and that in reference thereto, in October, 1825, while on a visit at Ball's, she made to Mrs. Gattie—one of his intimate friends—a testamentary declaration in his favour; that she engaged him and his family to visit her at York the following spring, and then to go to Harrogate; that on a Monday, 24th of April, just previous to their coming, she received an injury by a fall, which her medical attendants did not think dangerous; but in a day or two she became lethargic and insensible, and died on the Saturday; and that, while sensible, she did not consider herself in any danger. That Mr. Weatherby, her confidential solicitor, resided at Newmarket, and that she did not see him after the date of the codicil. That the will was found in a chest of drawers in the deceased's bed-room with the envelope unsealed—and no other paper with it. That on the 23d of September, 1826, Jameson received an anonymous letter by the general post, with the codicil enclosed—stating that it was found in the deceased's house, and was taken away with two sovereigns. That the deceased was pe-[84]-nurious and suspicious—wore a pocket in front of her stays, and in it she declared she kept her private papers, having nobody she could trust; that Jane Cusworth was her only servant, and Ann Shouter was hired to assist in nursing; that, one morning, Shouter was observed with her hand in the drawers, and said she was looking for a night-cap; that, soon after, she urged Cusworth to go down to breakfast, who, on her return, found her with the deceased's keys, and she desired Cusworth to lock up the said pocket, which she did, and delivered the keys to Mrs. Robinson; that, on Saturday, 22d of April, the deceased received four sovereigns and silver in change for a 5l. note; that she had only spent 5s.; but, on searching her pocket after her death, there were only two sovereigns; and her purse could no where be found.

Dodson and Salusbury for the executor.

Addams and Blake for the two next of kin.

Lushington and Haggard in support of the allegation.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a proceeding for the purpose of establishing a paper of a testamentary character, as a codicil to the will of Mrs. Lydia Ellison. It is brought forward by four of the legatees; and it is opposed by the executor named in the will, and by two of the next of kin. An allegation in support of the instrument has now been debated: I have considered the circumstances it sets forth, together with the paper itself: and the paper is so imperfect, and has to encounter such difficulties, that it is quite impossible in my judgment to overcome them, so as to give it effect as a tes-[85]-tamentary instrument; even assuming—what the Court is bound to assume in the present stage of the cause—that every thing pleaded in this allegation is correct, and could be proved. The paper propounded is of this tenor:—

with

~~Mr Weatherby I was Sir~~ I give my house at York ~~to be~~ my money in the funds between Mrs Cooke at Great Baddow Mr Edward Ball Upper Stamford Street London Mrs Watkinson Burwell, Mrs Warn, Mrs Nunn if living ~~and I give at twenty~~

York August 3 1824.

~~Estate at Mildenhall I~~

It is in pencil, not signed, but is written on a scrap of an old letter, dated Hull, 18th February, 1819, and still bearing on it the word "Madam." In the first place, then, it would hardly be possible to prove such a paper genuine. The executor in his affidavit of scripts admits, as was remarked, that it is in the hand-writing of the deceased; but the Court could not safely trust to evidence of hand-writing for the purpose of establishing such a document. It is sent to the executor four or five months after the death of Mrs. Ellison, in an anonymous letter, purporting to come from a person who is supposed to have stolen some money out of the deceased's pocket; and to have taken this paper at the same time. Why she should have taken this paper there is no suggestion; for it is alleged that she left two sovereigns, and, I presume, some other articles. It is just possible to conceive that she fabricated the instrument in order to make her peace. The hand-writing of the letter is as good as that of the [86] paper, and is not unlike it. There is, then, no sufficient finding.

These difficulties relate to the proof of its genuineness; but, in the second place, there are still more conclusive difficulties as to its validity. Even if the paper were admitted to be genuine, and to have been found in the deceased's pocket immediately on her death, still, on the face of it, it would be inoperative, supposing it only to apply to personal property. Beyond all question, it is imperfect and unfinished; by calling it imperfect and unfinished, I mean that it is not reduced to that form in which the deceased purposed to leave it as an operative testamentary paper; nay, it was scarce begun. It was not, at first, intended to be dispositive; it was the inception of a letter, or rather of a draft of a letter, to her attorney, Mr. Weatherby, at Newmarket, while she was living at York. She seems afterwards to have changed her mind; and the paper then goes on as if it were heads for a disposition of part of her personal property —her house at York, and her money in the funds. There is then the commencement of a further bequest, "and I give at twenty;" but this is struck through: then there is a memorandum as to part of her real property, but that also is struck through, "Estate at Mildenhall I." The paper is a crude memorandum respecting some testamentary disposition, set down in pencil, as a passing thought, either on writing to her solicitor, or as heads for some subsequent paper. The presumptions are all strongly against it. The burthen of proof presses heavily on those who would establish it to make out that it does contain that disposition which was manifestly her [87] intention. The affection and regard pleaded for the parties benefited shew that such a disposition was not improbable; but this goes but a little way of itself, though it may assist other circumstances.

It is said, however, that there are two further circumstances: first, the declaration respecting Ball—"He shall not want money long, I have taken care of that;" but to rely on this, and to apply it to such a paper as the present would be dangerous in the extreme. The other circumstance is the accident, and that her death was unexpected: but this paper is dated twenty months before that event, viz. in August, 1824. Now, to support any unfinished paper, there must be shewn continued and final intention to the time of death, and the finishing prevented. To meet this difficulty, it is observed that the deceased never saw Weatherby afterwards; but if she had intended to have made any such alteration in her will (which was executed thirty years before), she might have communicated with him by letter. She had abundant opportunity of taking further steps, if she had made up her testamentary intentions.

I shall, in my opinion, better consult the interest of the parties in rejecting this plea: without doubt the paper is of no validity, unless the rules and principles of this Court are to be overthrown; and it would be attended with some risk of injury to those principles to allow this allegation even to go to proof, when the circumstances, if all quite true, are utterly insufficient to support the paper.

The Court rejected the allegation, but ordered the expences of all parties to be paid out of the estate.

Allegation rejected.

[88] SMITH v. BLAKE. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 3rd Session, 1827.—The Court before granting a prayer to rescind the conclusion, in order to the admission of an allegation, requires an affidavit setting forth facts material as well as "noviter perventa;" and it generally also requires that the allegation pleading those facts shall be tendered at the time of making the prayer.

Dame Elizabeth Blake died on the 23d March, 1827, a widow, leaving Sir Francis Blake, Baronet; Lieutenant-General Robert Dudley Blake; William Blake, and Eleanor Ann Stag, her only children. Her personalty amounted to 17,000l.; and by her will, executed in writing, but without date, she had appointed Hugh Smith, Esq., and the Reverend Hugh Smith, executors. On the 3d of April probate was prayed by the Reverend Hugh Smith; and the grant thereof was opposed by Lieutenant-General Blake, as a legatee named in a former will, dated the 27th of February, 1826. An allegation had been given in on the part of the executor to which three witnesses had been examined; but no interrogatories were addressed to them; and the cause had been set down for sentence on this day, as unopposed, when an application was made to the Court, on an affidavit of General Blake, to rescind the conclusion for the purpose of bringing in an allegation.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is an application of a special nature to prevent the Court from proceeding to the immediate hearing of the cause. The cause having been assigned for sentence, the papers were all laid before me, ready for judgment, as in an unopposed suit.

The question arises on the will of the dowager Lady Blake. It appears that, though she had made a former will, she wrote instructions, and sent them [89] to her confidential friend, Mr. Hugh Smith; and that she afterwards sent him further instructions, both which he transmitted to his solicitor, Mr. Harrison, who embodied them into a will; that at an interview on the 11th of January last, the will so prepared by him was read over, and, after some slight alterations, fully approved by her, except that as to two inferior legacies she entertained some doubts. She, however, kept the paper, saying she could execute it afterwards; and she did execute it. These facts, as well as capacity and volition, are fully proved. On looking over all the papers and letters I do not see the least ground for any suspicion of fraud or imposition; and I should have been much surprised if, when the cause had been brought to me, it had not been marked as unopposed.

On this day, at this late stage, comes General Blake, and prays me to take the extraordinary step of rescinding the conclusion and allowing him to plead; I say the extraordinary step, because, though the Court is perfectly competent to adopt such a course; yet the application is very rarely made, and still more rarely granted: if ever granted, it is only when all proper activity and diligence have been exerted, and on good and sufficient cause shewn by affidavit, setting forth that material facts had newly come to the party's knowledge. I hardly remember a case wherein a prayer of this peculiar nature has been granted without the facts on which such prayer was made being specifically and particularly stated; and without the allegation being absolutely tendered at the same time, so that the Court might see whether it could safely go to proof. Cer-[90]-tainly this has been required and done in many cases. Now, under what circumstances is the present application made? General Blake has been a party through the whole of this suit; but it seems, from some reason or other, his proctor, previous to the month of August, declined to proceed further for him; a few days elapsed before he was informed of this; he then entered into a treaty with one of the legatees for a compromise; but how long that went on I do not know, or how it can affect the present question I do not see. Mr. Smith, the executor, was not party to the compromise; he was bound to go on, and protect the other persons interested under the will; and not merely to acquiesce in the arrangements made between General Blake and one of the legatees.

What, then, is stated in General Blake's affidavit? that he has collected new facts since the 15th of October, but he should have done this when he undertook to oppose the will; it goes on, that he believes them to be very material, but it does not say that he has laid them before his counsel, and that they so consider them (and even this would not be sufficient, as the Court ought to be able to form its own opinion and decide whether the facts are so far material as to justify it in again opening the cause, or of such a nature as to permit that step to be safely taken): nor are the witnesses, proposed to be examined, enumerated. On such an affidavit is the Court now called upon to take this extremely dangerous and extraordinary step—contrary, in my opinion, to justice, and to those forms according to which this Court is bound to proceed. I can see no grounds for delaying my sentence; and I therefore pronounce for the vali-[91]-dity of the will, which the evidence fully supports; and I decree probate thereof to the executor.

The proctor for General Blake—being called upon by the Judge, preparatory to signing the sentence, declined to make any prayer: the Court stated that he might "pray justice" without prejudice to his right of appeal, and that it might be so taken down by the registrar. This was accordingly done; and probate was directed not to go under seal for fifteen days.

IN THE GOODS OF ALEXANDER RUSSELL. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 4th Session, 1827.—An original will, disposing of real estate in Scotland, may (certain conditions being complied with) be delivered out of the registry in order to be proved and recorded at Edinburgh.

On motion.

Alexander Russell, formerly of Edinburgh, but late of London, a surgeon in the East India Company's service, died in May, 1825. In June, 1826, probate was granted by the Prerogative Court of Canterbury to David Colvin, one of the executors named in the last will and testament, or deed of disposition, made by the deceased, and dated at Edinburgh the 2d of January, 1819, with three codicils. All the papers were in his own hand-writing.

The testator died possessed of heritable or real estate, and other property, in North Britain; and by his will, disposed of all his property, both real and personal, to his executors, administrators, and intromitters upon trust. An affidavit now set forth that, for the purpose of recovering such heritable estate, and of carrying the will or deed [92] into effect in North Britain, it was necessary that the original will or deed of disposition should be recorded and filed in the register books of council and session at Edinburgh; and that the same should there remain on record.

Lushington now moved that the will should be delivered out of the registry of this Court, and an authentic copy left therein, on bond being given that the will should be safely deposited in the registry at Edinburgh, and that a certificate thereof should be transmitted to this Court.

The Court, having ascertained that there was no suit depending here respecting the validity of the will, and having directed that the transmission of the certificate should be strictly enforced by the bond, granted the motion.

Motion granted.

COLVIN v. H. M. PROCURATOR-GENERAL. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 4th Session, 1827.—Administration of the goods of an intestate bastard, drowned together with his wife and only child, will be granted to a creditor—the King's proctor having been cited, but not the representatives of the wife, on presumption that the husband survived; and the debt being large and the property small.

On motion.

John Edward Conway, otherwise Eugene Vendernesse, late a captain in the military service of the East India Company, died in the month of September, 1823, intestate, and a bastard. The deceased, who had been recently married, was drowned by the upsetting of a boat, with his wife and child [if any] in the river Ganges, as he was proceeding from Calcutta to join his re-[93]-giment. At the time of his death he was indebted to the house of Colvin and Co., agents at Calcutta, on bond dated 27th of July, 1823, for the payment of 1982l. sterling. The property of the deceased in this country did not exceed 250l. On an affidavit of James Colvin, one of the partners in the house of Colvin and Co., a decree with intimation issued against the King's proctor, and no appearance being given by him, Dodson moved for a grant of administration of the goods (within the province of Canterbury) of the deceased to the said James Colvin, as a creditor, on giving the usual security.

Per Curiam. The Court said that, in strictness, the representatives of the wife ought to have been cited; but as the primâ facie presumption of law was, that the husband survived,(a) and as the property was small, and the debt large, the decree might pass.

Motion granted.

IN THE GOODS OF THE ELECTOR OF HESSE. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 4th Session, 1827.—The Court will grant to the agent of a foreign prince an administration limited to substantiate proceedings in Chancery; but will not extend it to the receipt of a debt, without a power of attorney from the proper authorities.

On motion.

On the by-day of Trinity Term last, Lushington applied for an administration to be granted to Nathan Myer Rothschild, as agent of the present Elector of Hesse, for the recovery and receipt in [94] the Court of Chancery of a debt due to the late Elector from the estate of his late Royal Highness the Duke of York. The application was founded on an affidavit of Mr. Rothschild, which stated that he had received instructions from the present Elector to recover the debt.

The Court granted the administration limited to substantiate proceedings in Chancery; but declined to extend it to the receipt of the debt, without some fuller authority from the Elector of Hesse, or from his Minister of State.

A power of attorney from the Minister of State, executed by the directions of the Elector of Hesse, being now produced, Per Curiam. The Court on motion of counsel revoked the former administration, and decreed a new administration limited to further proceedings in Chancery, and to the receipt of the said debt.

Limited administration granted.

INGRAM v. WYATT. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 1st Session, 1827.—Interrogatories not being ready, and twenty-four hours having elapsed after notice to the adverse proctor of the production of a witness; the witness has not, under all circumstances, a right to be dismissed.

[See further, p. 384, post.]

An allegation in this case had been admitted, on behalf of Henry Wyatt, in May last. Six witnesses were examined by commission, during the long vacation, and a seventh came up to London on Monday, November the 5th, from a distance of 160 miles, to be examined on the same articles. On that day, at half-past three o'clock, notice that this witness would be ready to undergo his cross-examination in twenty-four hours was served on [95] the adverse proctor, who now stated that he had immediately procured instructions, and prepared a draft of some interrogatories, but was unable to get them settled, by counsel, till after the witness was repeated to his examination-in-chief on Tuesday night; which being done, he immediately left town, refusing to remain to be cross-examined.

The Court was of opinion that, under the circumstances, further time ought to have been allowed for preparing and administering the interrogatories; and said it would grant a monition against the witness to attend and undergo his cross-examination, and should condemn the party, whose witness he was, in the costs of reproducing him, unless a satisfactory affidavit was brought in to explain why he was not examined on the commission, and why he left town before he was cross-examined.

The proctor for Mr. Wyatt stated that the witness had not been produced under the commission, because his residence could not be discovered; and that even now he did not know where he was to be found, nor how his attendance could be enforced.

The Court said that such being the case, and the grant of a monition therefore of no avail, its present impression was that, unless the witness was again brought up before the second session at the expence of the party who originally produced him, his deposition should be sealed up in the registry, and not be used at the hearing; for it would be no injustice to the party to reject the evidence if the other side were precluded from the benefit of cross-examination. Perhaps the address might be learnt from the examiner; or the [96] registrar might be authorized to look into the deposition for that purpose.

The Court extended the term probatory to the second session, in order that the witness William Lewes might in the meantime be produced for cross-examination; and if not produced the Court directed that his deposition should be sealed up.

2nd Session.—Under suspicious circumstances, the deposition of a witness—not cross-examined—may be sealed up; but on a subsequent satisfactory explanation may be delivered out subject to all objections at the hearing.

On this day a declaration of the proctor himself and also an affidavit of Henry Wyatt, his party, were brought in; and the Judge was prayed to rescind the order, or assignation, of the last court-day.

Jenner in support of the application.

Lushington contrà.

Per Curiam. The Court no doubt has the power of rescinding its former order, if, on a different representation of the facts, it should appear that justice would not be done by carrying it into effect: but, on the view that the Court had of the circumstances on the last session, it was perfectly justified in making that order. I must premise that no imputation lies on the proctor—no person is more correct in his practice, nor is there any one that stands higher in his profession—but the facts were such as created suspicion. The allegation was admitted in May last: a commission for the examination of witnesses had been extracted in the long vacation, and under it six witnesses were examined to certain articles: on the fifth of November only notice was given to the adverse proctor that another witness was to be produced that [97] day; and at the expiration of thirty hours he was repeated and could not be prevailed on to stay till interrogatories were prepared. The general rule is that twenty-four hours' notice shall be given for the preparation of interrogatories; but it does not follow that, on special occasions, the time may not be extended or abridged.(a) In the present instance the hurried departure of the witness—coupled with previous circumstances—had the appearance of a contrivance that he should come up and be examined, and his deposition be forced on the Court, without its effect being weakened by the answers extracted by interrogatories. Till the party had exonerated himself from such suspicion—strengthened, at the time, by the fact that the proctor did not even then know the residence of the witness, and not only could not find him, but had no means of ascertaining where he was—the Court deemed it right to make the order now prayed to be rescinded. I thought, on the facts then before me, it would be extremely dangerous that such a deposition should be read, unless the party would reproduce the witness for cross-examination; and therefore ordered the evidence to be sealed up. Now, the affidavit of the party—for it is unnecessary to recur to the proctor's statement after what I have [98] said—is, that he is in no degree acquainted with the residence or address of William Lewes:—

"He took no measures whatever, either directly or indirectly, to delay, prevent, or hinder the said William Lewes from being examined on the interrogatories of the adverse party in this cause; that he has had no communication with him, either by person or by letter, relative thereto; that at the time of the examination of the said William Lewes upon his allegation he, the appearer, was at his residence in the county of Warwick; that he had no knowledge of the said witness having been examined and repeated to his deposition until he received a letter from his proctor desiring him to come to London immediately, to assist in endeavouring to discover where the said William Lewes is, for the purpose of procuring his attendance to be examined upon interrogatories."

The party has thus exonerated himself from the suspicion of contrivance; yet I cannot help agreeing with the counsel's observation, that under the circumstances it would have been proper and expedient (because liberal conduct between the practitioners is always expedient) to have given, if possible, earlier notice to the adverse proctor, that the witness was expected, in order that he might be prepared with interrogatories for a particular and full cross-examination. Yet I am willing to admit that there is considerable weight in the excuse now offered, viz. that it might have been dangerous to the witness' security if it were known that he intended to come to, or remain in, London. Delicacy to him may be a sufficient excuse. Of that the proctor must himself judge—I impute no blame; but, if it were not for these reasons, I should have thought an antecedent notice requisite. On [99] the other hand, what has been the conduct of the adverse proctor? As the allegation had been admitted long before—as, already, several witnesses had been examined—and of course interrogatories addressed to them, I can see no reason why some general interrogatories might not have been administered at the expiration of twenty-four hours; and notice have been given to the examiner, and to Wyatt's proctor, that an extension of time for drawing up further and special interrogatories would be asked. It was not necessary that he should wait till such special interrogatories were ready, before even the common form interrogatories were addressed to the witness. The Court can only add that it could have wished that, on one side, it had been practical to give earlier notice, and, on the other side, that some of the interrogatories already settled had been administered, and further time then prayed.

But what is the Court at present to do? Neither the proctor for Mrs. Ingram nor Wyatt's proctor now know where to find the witness: the name even of the friend at the Horse Guards,(a)[2] through [100] whom inquiry may be made for him, is not given.

(a)[1] Oughton, tit. 80, §§ 9, 10, 11, and the notes to those sections.

It was stated by an examiner, in reply to a question from the Court, that though a witness was not repeated till after he had been examined on interrogatories, yet he signed his deposition as soon as his examination-in-chief was finished, and was not again allowed to see it. The Court said that course was quite satisfactory; and it would also be desirable, if any material alterations were made at the request of the witness, it should appear, from the papers, that such was the case.

(a)[2] It appeared, from the proctor's statement, that on the 12th of October, 1827, a letter from the brother of William Lewes communicated that William Lewes was travelling he knew not where; but that a letter addressed to a friend at the Horse Guard would reach him. To a letter thus forwarded, an answer arrived on the 20th, dates

How then could the compulsory process be served? As some steps have been taken for the purpose of producing this witness; and as he may possibly attend before the next Court; as the facts, also, which have been disclosed have removed all suspicion of contrivance from the party—I shall so far rescind my former order as to direct the deposition to be delivered out, and to be used subject—at the hearing—to all observations on its admissibility as evidence. I shall also direct publication to pass on the next court-day, with liberty to cross-examine this witness, William Lewes, if he shall in the meantime appear according to the notice which I learn from the statement has been forwarded to him. If he is so cross-examined, his deposition will of course be admitted; if he shall not appear, it will be for the Court to decide whether the deposition shall be read at all; and, if read, the Court—having all these circumstances now disclosed to its view—will be able to form a fair estimate to what degree of credit and weight his evidence may be entitled.

4th Session.—After publication, the Court will not allow witnesses to be re-examined in the ordinary mode—on a suggestion that the examiner, from a misconstruction of the plea, has improperly rejected evidence: but, if essential to justice, it may direct a vivâ voce re-examination in open Court.

On the fourth session (publication having passed on the preceding session) the Court was moved to rescind the conclusion of the cause, for the purpose of permitting the re-examination of Joseph Snow and Edward Townsend Higgins, two witnesses already examined on certain additional articles to an allegation given in, on the part of Mrs. Barbara Ingram, and admitted on the 14th of July, 1827.

[101] Per Curiam. This is an application on behalf of Mrs. Ingram to rescind the conclusion of the cause, and to allow two witnesses to be re-examined, on the suggestion that the examiner had misconstrued the allegation. It is not necessary to call upon the examiner to make any statement, as the facts appear on the face of the proceedings. An application that a witness, after publication, shall be re-examined, stands on very different grounds from a similar application before publication, and is open to far stronger objections. The Court would require very stringent matter before it set up such a precedent; for under any circumstances, and in any mode, it would be a most dangerous experiment, leading to subornation and improper extortion of evidence; more particularly in a suit that has already been depending nearly three years, that has run to great length both in plea and proof; and where the parties in the country appear to be in such a state of hostility as to vie in protracting the cause to the utmost possible limit.

It is said that the examiner has misunderstood the allegation. It pleads in substance:—

That since the accession of John Clopton, the deceased, to his brother's property in May, 1818, and prior to the execution of the will,(a) Henry Wyatt—the party in the cause—was in the autumn of 1818, and in the following winter, and also at various times in 1819 and in 1820, in the habit of conversing with different persons on the subject of his first acquaintance with the deceased, and of the [102] finding him upon the death of his brother, Edward Clopton; and often described his then state and condition; that at such times Henry Wyatt—in the presence of Joseph Snow and Edward Townsend Higgins—stated, that on going to London with his father to inform John Clopton of the death of his brother Edward, and of his accession to the Clopton estates; he—the said John Clopton—was then found in a garret in extreme filth; and that he was made fit to attend his brother's funeral by being dressed in a suit of clothes and a wig which had been worn by his late brother.

After further pleading that Wyatt's father (who wrote the instructions for the will) had, during the same years, and in the presence of Higgins, made similar admissions as to the state and condition of the deceased; the article concludes:—

the 16th, but without a post-mark, in which the witness promised to attend, ten days' notice being given him by the same means. His attendance was desired on November 5th, and on that day between 12 and 1 o'clock he arrived, and wished to leave London the same evening, but was detained. The proctor also, immediately after the last Court, had written to him through his friend at the Horse Guards, urging his attendance; and to Wyatt to assist in discovering him.

(a) The will propounded was dated on the 21st of August, 1821; and a codicil, also propounded, bore date the 3d of August, 1822.

"That they, the said Henry and Richard Wyatt, in the course of such their aforesaid conversations, gave such representations of the general conduct, habits, and manner of the said deceased, as left no doubt in the minds of the persons to whom they were so given, that the said John Clopton was a person of weak and imbecile mind, and was so considered and treated by the said Henry Wyatt himself, and by his father."

In strict interpretation, the words taken separately have been rightly construed, though from the context it would appear that probably they were not intended to be thus limited: but the pleading should have been so constructed as to be unequivocal; which might have been effected by adding a few words. The ambiguity, I have no doubt, would have been avoided if the proctor had not, at the time of bringing in his allegation, been required—[103] under the special circumstances of the case, immediately—in Court, to insert in his plea the names of the witnesses in whose presence it was intended to prove that the conversation passed. This slight and formal error might thus easily have arisen. But, perhaps, considering the whole article together, the true meaning, even now, is not that which has been attributed to it; and if the construction of an article be doubtful—an examiner would act more prudently in taking the evidence down, and leaving it to the Court to reject it afterwards—if extra-articulate.

I cannot, however, see what possible advantage can arise from a re-examination to declarations made eight years ago. Higgins says he cannot at this distance of time remember what passed:—

"To the best of his recollection, and as he has no doubt, he never heard Henry Wyatt say any thing about the deceased in this cause in the presence of Joseph Snow: he remembers that on some occasions, when Richard Wyatt was dining with the deponent, he spoke of the deceased; but, after all due consideration and reflection, he is unable to call to mind, with any accuracy or certainty, what Richard Wyatt so said. He has no recollection at all of any particular time when Richard Wyatt said any thing to him on the subject of the deceased, and his recollection of what Richard Wyatt may have said, and did say, to him at any time is so very imperfect and indistinct that he cannot undertake to depose thereto, either to particular expressions or the general nature and effect thereof."

There could, then, be no use in again examining him; and it has been remarked that, from his own [104] observation, he has spoken strongly in support of sanity: on the 15th interrogatory he says, "he did consider and treat the deceased as a person competent to do acts of business, and to enter into legal engagements affecting his property;" and the question is not—in what state the deceased was at the time of his brother's death, but at the time of making his will.

Snow admits conversations were held:—

"While on a visit to Henry Wyatt in the early part of the year 1820, the said Henry Wyatt did occasionally, when sitting with the deponent after dinner, speak to him on the subject of his first acquaintance with John Clopton, and of the state in which he found him after the death of his brother Edward; but Edward Townsend Higgins was not present on any such occasion."

It is not probable that Wyatt would make declarations asserting his own fraud and the deceased's incapacity; and the party's answers to this allegation have been brought in. To re-examine, then, to recollections of conversations taking place in the ordinary intercourse of society—and passing eight years ago, would be quite nugatory. It is scarcely possible to suppose that it could bring out material evidence: with the mass of depositions already before it, it is not to be expected that such matter could have any influence on the decision of the Court. At all events, the present application is of so very extraordinary and dangerous a nature that it certainly would not be consistent with due precaution to grant it in its present shape. The case, however, I presume, is just ready for hearing, though I know not whether it is intended to give in an exceptive allegation. [105] Should, therefore, the Court—against whom the cause is never concluded (a)—find at the hearing that the facts are so very nicely balanced that its decision may turn upon such evidence of loose declarations made after dinner, it will not be precluded from admitting them if necessary and essential to justice. But in that case I should, probably, adopt a course, not very usual, but not altogether unprecedented, of issuing a monition to the witness to appear and undergo a vivâ voce examination in open Court, when his answers might be taken down by the registrar. That would be the only safe way, and which the Court is fully competent to adopt.

At present I reject the motion, reserving the question as to the costs of making it to the final hearing, when I shall see the whole case.

Motion refused.

KENNY v. JACKSON. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 4th Session, 1827.—An inventory and account may be demanded of an executor by a residuary legatee who has given a release.

On motion.

Ann Whitehead, after bequeathing by her will and codicil certain legacies, amongst others, to Barnard and Mary Kenny, directed the residue of her effects to be divided between Barnard and Mary Kenny, and appointed the Reverend Thomas Jackson and Algernon Wallington executors.

On the 22d of March, 1822, this will and codicil were proved under 16,000l. in the Prerogative Court by Mr. Jackson, the other executor having [106] renounced. A citation had since been served at the instance of Barnard Kenny, one of the residuary legatees, upon Mr. Jackson, for an inventory and account; who prayed to be dismissed on exhibiting a release, signed by the two Kennys, as well for their legacies as for the residue. The release was dated on the 11th of December, 1823, at which time it was stated Barnard Kenny was a minor. The amount of the residue did not appear.

Lushington in support of the motion.

Dodson contrà.

Per Curiam. It is, I consider, a matter of duty for an executor to deliver an inventory and account when properly called upon for that purpose; and, in order to exonerate himself from all liability, it is always most prudent to exhibit it before a final settlement. This Court will not enter into the question how this release was obtained, nor whether it is valid. It cannot judge of nor notice such instruments. Barnard Kenny, when he executed the release, was certainly a very young man—even if he had attained his majority, and having now, as one of the residuary legatees, demanded an inventory and account, they must be produced without delay; they may, perhaps, be the means of discovering an unfair settlement; while, on the other hand, if the executor has been vexatiously cited in this matter, he may be able to obtain relief in another Court; but in this Court the release cannot avail him—it is no bar to the present claim.

Inventory and account ordered.

[107] COLVIN v. FRASER. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 4th Session, 1827. —A next of kin, contesting a will propounded by an executor, may take out a decree citing all persons interested under the will "to see proceedings."

On motion.

John Farquhar, late of Fonthill Abbey, died on the 6th of July, 1826; and, on the 15th of December following, letters of administration were granted to John Farquhar Fraser, his nephew, and one of the next of kin, on the suggestion that the deceased had died intestate. That administration had since been called in upon a decree to shew cause "why a probate of the will and codicil of the deceased, or of an authenticated copy thereof, under seal of the Supreme Court of Judicature at Fort William in Bengal, should not be granted to David Colvin, one of the executors therein named." The will and codicil were respectively dated on the 7th of March, 1814.

Phillimore and Lushington for the next of kin, now moved the Court to direct decrees (by letters of request, if necessary) to see proceedings, to be issued against the several surviving executors and all parties interested under the said will and codicil.

Dodson for the executor, submitted that the course proposed to be pursued was novel, and would be attended with great expence and delay from the very numerous legatees whom it would be necessary to serve in Scotland; and that it would lead to no beneficial result, inasmuch as all the parties under the will would be bound by the acts of the surviving executor.

[108] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is an application at the instance of a next of kin—himself called upon to see a will and codicil propounded—for a decree against all persons interested under the papers, either as legatees or otherwise, to "see proceedings," as it is technically expressed. Certainly, in the usual course of practice, such decrees issue only against the next of kin of a testator, and at the promotion of the executor, or of the person propounding a will. But in the case of Calder v. Calder, which occurred here in 1792, the party obtained a decree against all persons in general to appear and propound a will—that case arose upon a change of circumstances in the testator, occasioned by his marriage and the birth of a child. The application, then, is not unprecedented; and the present case is under very special circumstances. A will which was executed in the East Indies, so far back as the year 1814, is now attempted to be set up, and the ground of opposition is, as I understand, that it has been revoked. And although it is true that the act of the executor—being the appointee of the deceased—would, to a certain extent, bind all persons interested under the will; yet some party might, perhaps, at a future time allege collusion. It is, therefore, highly expedient, in a case of this nature, to pursue the course which is proposed; particularly as the grant of the decree cannot occasion any prejudice to the adverse party; for the inconvenience, if any, will fall upon the next of kin who make the application.

The Court directs the decree to issue; and re-[109]-commends that, as some of the legatees may happen to be dead, care should be taken to cite their representatives: the decree should be framed in the largest terms—against all persons in general.

Motion granted.

BURROWS v. BURROWS. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 4th Session, 1827.—

Instructions for a will containing the fixed and final intentions of the deceased are valid if the formal execution is prevented by death: and, if there is no evidence of insanity at the time of giving the instructions, the commission of suicide, three days afterwards, will not invalidate the paper by raising an inference of previous derangement.

Bentley Burrows died on the second of April, 1827, leaving behind him a widow, the party in this cause, a mother, three brothers, two sisters, and eight nephews and nieces, the children of a deceased brother and sister. His property was of the value of 2860l.

The widow propounded as his last will an unexecuted paper in the form of instructions; which was opposed by Thomas Bentley, one of the brothers, who prayed the Court to pronounce that the deceased was dead intestate.

Addams and Salusbury contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. Two points have arisen in the course of the argument. The first, whether this unexecuted paper is sufficiently sustained by circumstances to be the last intention of the deceased. The second, whether its validity is not affected by his insanity. In respect to the first point, it is a principle well known here that if unexecuted instructions are proved to embody the fixed and final intention, which instructions the deceased was prevented reducing into a more regular shape only "by the act of God," or by some unexpected circumstance, that [110] then they will have the same force as a complete and formal will.

On Friday, the 30th of March, 1827, the deceased went to his solicitor, Mr. Scott (whom he had before employed), for the purpose of giving instructions; this evidences the animus testandi, and that it originated with the deceased himself: he gave those instructions fully, except as to the names of the executors; his primary object was to bequeath every thing to his wife for her life; on that point he manifested no hesitation, but he doubted about the mode of dividing the remaining interest among his large family. Mr. Scott, on the first article of the allegation, thus relates what passed:—

"On returning to his offices about 11 or 12 o'clock in the forenoon of Friday, the 30th of March, he found the deceased waiting there to see him; that, after some conversation, the deceased said he wished to know his, the deponent's, charge for making a will. The deponent replied that it depended on the trouble taken, and that it might be very little or it might be much. The deceased then observed, 'Well, then, we'll say no more about that. I wish to make my will,' or to that effect; and then proceeded to give him instructions, making observations thereon as he proceeded: the deponent thinks that the deceased first remarked 'that he had deferred making his will for some time, but was then determined to do it.'"

This, then, was no hasty thought, but a premeditated and decided purpose.

"That he had so many nephews and nieces that it puzzled him how to leave his property so as to satisfy all parties."

It does not necessarily follow, I think, from this [111] that he intended to leave something to each of them—that itself might produce dissatisfaction, nor can any inference be deduced from it that he might not intentionally omit his brother Thomas or the children of his brother William; for Algar, to the third interrogatory, answers:—

"The respondent never heard the deceased express any regard or affection for his brother Thomas or for any of the children of his deceased brother William. She never saw any of them in company with the deceased at his house, but has often seen his other relations there."

Trigg's evidence, on this interrogatory, is to the same effect.

"The respondent never heard the deceased express, at any time, any particular regard or affection for any of his brothers or sisters, or for any of their children. He never saw the deceased in company with any of them, except his brother David and Thomas Carter, and to them he behaved in a very friendly manner."

But, even supposing these omissions to have proceeded from want of recollection, that would not be of sufficient importance to render these instructions a nullity.

Scott proceeds with his account:—

"The deponent proposed that the deceased should tell him what his property was, and begin with the freehold. The deceased assented; but observed, at the same time, that his wife was to have all for life. He then proceeded to take down the devise for life of the freehold property to the deceased's wife, and, on inquiring of the deceased to whom the freehold was to go at his wife's death, the deceased mentioned the names of several of his brothers and sisters."

[112] The deceased then minutely and regularly described the particulars and what disposition he wished to be made of the leasehold property, then of the funded, and then of the residue.

At length the instructions were concluded; they were read over and approved by the deceased, who directed that a draft should be prepared: no doubt, therefore, can exist that they were final, as far as respected the disposition of his property, and that they only wanted the names of the executors to render them complete. The same day, Triggs, an intimate friend, called upon and sat with him the whole evening, and in the course of conversation the deceased observed to him:—

"He had been giving instructions that day to Mr. Scott, his solicitor, about his will, and asked the favor of deponent to be his executor; he told him he would. The next morning he received a message from the deceased that he wished to see him again, who then described to him the instructions he had given to Mr. Scott, and requested the deponent to look over the deeds relating to his property, which he produced from an iron chest; and deponent looked them over, and found them correct."

This witness does not suggest that any change of intention was expressed on the part of the deceased during this interview; he only seems to have doubted whether his property was correctly described, and, being convinced of that fact, he was satisfied.

The draft was directed to be ready on Monday, the 2d of April. About four o'clock in the morning of that day, that is, before the time appointed for the deceased again to go to his solicitor, he died; and thereby was prevented from carrying [113] his intentions into effect. These facts, then, are sufficient to render the instructions valid, and entitle them to be considered as his will. After they had been read over and approved, and the draft ordered, there is no reason to presume a change of intention; the act was in progress, the formal execution alone prevented. As an unexecuted paper, therefore, it is sufficiently supported, unless its validity is affected by extrinsic circumstances.

This leads me to the second point—whether its validity is affected by insanity on the part of the deceased—that is, whether he was incompetent to do a testamentary act, as it is admitted that he died by his own hand. Now sanity must be presumed till the contrary is shewn. Before actual derangement takes place, its approach is generally notified by agitation and nervous excitement. Algar, a young girl, to whom I have already referred, gives the following evidence :—

"Deponent thought the deceased not quite so well in his mind shortly before Mr. Triggs came on the Saturday morning, but he appeared to have recovered again by the time Mr. Triggs had arrived. About eight o'clock that morning the deceased was walking about the room apparently agitated, and talking wildly ; but he came down stairs shortly afterwards to breakfast, and then appeared more composed. He was silent at the latter time. Except, as just deposed, the deceased, at both the times of Mr. Triggs calling upon him, well knew and understood what he said and did, and what was said to him."

It would be going too far to say that this is proof of actual derangement—even for the short time that this agitation continued—and this, too, [114] was subsequent to the giving of the instructions. On Friday and Saturday he conversed with his friend Triggs : he repeated, as I have before said, the instructions ; he asked him to be his executor ; and Triggs saw no appearance of insanity, for he thus deposes to the third article :—

"Deponent went to the deceased about nine o'clock on Saturday morning, the 31st of March, and remained with him on that occasion about an hour and a half or two hours : that upon both occasions of his seeing and conversing with the deceased he, the deceased, was of sound mind, memory, and understanding. He conversed quite rationally and sensibly, as much so as he ever did in his life, and perfectly knew and understood what he said and did, and what was said to him. He was as collected as ever the deponent saw him in all his life."

Mr. Scott, the solicitor, speaks to the deceased's capacity, at the time of taking these instructions, in his deposition on the second article :—

"The deponent considers the deceased to have been of sound mind, memory, and understanding during the transaction. There was nothing in his manner or deportment which led the deponent to doubt his competency to give the instructions for his will which he did give. His manner was rather hurried and somewhat agitated ; or, rather, what is more generally termed, flurried, which the deponent attributed to the occasion, and to his being, what is termed, a nervous man. Sometimes, when about to answer the deponent's inquiries, he appeared a little embarrassed. There was, however, nothing irrational in his conversation or deportment ; but he discoursed rationally and sen-[115]-sibly, and appeared to the deponent well to know and understand what he said and did, and what was said to him. The deponent considers him to have been fully capable of giving instructions for, and of making and executing, his will."

On the evidence then to which I have referred, and with no attempt to shew any thing to the contrary, it is impossible to hold that this act should be invalidated on account of insanity ; and I, therefore, pronounce for these instructions as containing the will of the deceased.

An application for costs out of the estate was not objected to, and was granted.

HUBLE v. CLARK, FORMERLY HORNER. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 4th Session, 1827.—When a testamentary paper is asserted to have existed since the death of the alleged testatrix, and to have been subsequently destroyed ; these allegations must be proved by the clearest and most stringent evidence.

The nature of the case set up in this suit is sufficiently explained in the following affidavit of Mrs. Clark, the party in the cause :—

"That she was a niece of the deceased, and resided in her house and attended upon her ; that a few days after her death, but previous to her funeral, Huble, the deceased's son, came to the house, and went into her bed-room, where he remained a considerable time ; that on coming out of the room he informed the appearer that the deceased had told him 'that she had placed in a drawer or box in her bed-room a paper or papers containing bequests or legacies of certain articles to her, the appearer, and another niece, to a nephew, and also to a sister of the deceased ; that he had searched in the room, and could not find either the paper or some money of which his mother had informed [116] him.' That she, being much surprised at this communication, and anxious to find the paper, immediately after Huble had left the house requested Mrs. Prior, who also resided in the house, to make a further search in the same room; and that they found in a box (where the deceased kept her dresses) under the bed a paper in her own hand-writing, in which she gave to her sister, Elizabeth White, 100l.; to her, the appearer, and Maria Brown, another niece, 60l. each; and to her nephew, Samuel Horner, 40l.; that the paper was wrapped up together with four separate rolls of notes of 10l. each respectively, corresponding to the bequests, and amounting in all to 260l.; that she, the appearer, replaced the whole in the box in the same state in which she had found them. That, in a day or two, Huble again made a further search in the bed-room, after which she asked him 'if he had found what he was looking for'—when he replied, 'Not exactly, but I dare say it will be all right;' and shortly afterwards he went away, apparently satisfied. That after the funeral, Huble, the appearer, and others of the relations of the deceased, met together, and Huble then informed them of his having found the testamentary paper with the several bequests, but stated the amounts respectively to be considerably under what she well knew to be the actual sums, in consequence whereof she immediately disclosed that, together with Mrs. Prior, she had previously found and perused the paper, and examined the bank-notes, as before set forth, and then enumerated the bequests in contradiction to Huble's statement; that Fawcett, his solicitor, was present, and admitted Huble was in possession of the tes-[117]-tamentary paper, and, taking a card from his pocket, read therefrom the several bequests agreeably to the statement made by Huble, whereupon she demanded of Fawcett the production of the paper, who replied that he had left the same at home, but that it should be produced; that she has never since seen it; but believes it now remains in the hands, custody, possession, power, or control of Huble or of Fawcett."

This affidavit was sworn on the 23d of November, 1826; and on the same day (being the 3d Session of Michaelmas Term) it was brought into the registry, and the Court, on the application of a proctor on behalf of Mrs. Clark, decreed a monition against Huble and Fawcett, to bring in the paper; who, in their respective affidavits, made oath "that no paper or testamentary disposition of the party deceased had, at any time whatever, come to the possession or knowledge of either of them." Dodson contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a case of no very common occurrence. A testamentary schedule has been propounded—which has not been produced, but is alleged to have been in existence at the time of the deceased's [118] death. It has been propounded on behalf, and as contained in the affidavit, of Mrs. Clark—a legatee under it, and a niece of Sarah Huble—the party deceased; whose son and only child, William Huble, has opposed it. She died on the 22d of September, 1825; but no steps were taken to institute this suit till Michaelmas Term, 1826.

The first article of Mrs. Clark's allegation thus states the history of the deceased. That she was a widow, leaving an only child, who would solely have been entitled to her estate if she had died intestate.

The second article thus proceeds, "That Sarah Huble, having an intention to bequeath certain legacies to her sister, Elizabeth White, to her two nieces, Elizabeth Horner and Maria Brown, and to her nephew, Samuel Horner, wrote on a slip of paper, 'Sister White 100l., Elizabeth Horner 60l., Maria Brown 60l., Samuel Horner 40l.'; and she wrapped the same in paper with four rolls of Bank of England notes, of the value of ten pounds each respectively, corresponding in their amounts to the four legacies, and making in the whole the sum of 260l.; and deposited them, so wrapped up, in a box (under her bed) in which she kept her dresses."

If this allegation be proved, such a paper, accompanied by the bank-notes, would be of testamentary validity. But it would require the most stringent evidence to establish a paper which is not forthcoming, which is not supposed to have been lost, nor suggested to have been destroyed by accident, but of which Mrs. Clark directly charges a fraudulent suppression by the son. Unfortunately, on one side or on the other, there must have been [119] fraud and falsehood; but at all events, when a party imputes such iniquitous conduct, he must be prepared to support his case by clear and indisputable evidence. Three witnesses have been examined on either plea, and the answers of both parties have been taken, but have not been read. It is most material, however, to inquire what has been asserted, what admitted, what denied, and what proved.

(a) By-day, M. T. In the case of Colvin v. Fraser, on an objection to an affidavit of Harry Phillips "that no testamentary paper of the deceased (Mr. Farquhar) had, at any time, come to his hands or possession, or now is under his power or control;"

The Court pronounced the affidavit insufficient, as it did not proceed to state that no such paper had come "to his knowledge."

The third article of Mrs. Clark's plea goes on to allege—"That Elizabeth Horner lived in the same house with the deceased, and attended upon her for some time previous to her death; that after the deceased's death, but prior to her funeral, Huble went into the deceased's bed-room, where he remained a considerable time; and, on coming out, informed Elizabeth Horner that the deceased had stated to him that she had placed in a drawer, or box, in the bed-room papers containing certain legacies for her and for another niece and nephew, and also for a sister of the deceased; but that he had searched in the room, and could not find either the paper, or the money, which his mother had informed him of, and he then left the house."

Of this most important declaration of Huble there is no proof whatever: only one witness has been examined to the article, Mrs. Prior, the mistress of the house where the deceased lodged; and she thus concludes her deposition on this article—

"That she knows not what conversation took place between Huble and his cousin, the said Elizabeth Clark."

She, therefore, does not prove the declaration. The answers have not been read; the Court then presumes that they deny it; and Huble's allegation positively contradicts the fact.

[120] The fourth and fifth articles plead the finding and hand-writing. The fourth is to this effect—"That Horner, being much surprised at Huble's communication to her, proceeded with Mrs. Prior, who resided in the house, to the deceased's bed-room; that after searching some time they found the testamentary paper, with the bank notes [as described in the second article]; that they perused the paper, and counted the notes, and replaced them in the box in the same state in which they were found."

Now this is a very material part of the case; and, on these articles, again, Mrs. Prior is the only witness. She is far advanced in life, being seventy-six years of age; her eye-sight is bad; on looking at the signature to her deposition it appears as if she could hardly see to write her own name, for it is scarcely legible. She admits, in answer to the eighth interrogatory, that there had been some differences between her and Huble about the rent and some articles of furniture; that though she was not angry with him, there had certainly been some differences of opinion—not amounting to a quarrel. She deposes very minutely and circumstantially—though the particulars to which she speaks had passed a year and a half before her examination. She had also made a voluntary affidavit in this cause—perhaps, under circumstances, rendering this not an improper step,(a) yet it might have left some impressions on her mind which it would be difficult for her to shake off. However, in my view of the case, there is no absolute necessity to impute to her any [121] falsehood; because, supposing all that she says to be true, it furnishes no proof that the paper is genuine; nor does she connect it fully with the deceased.

The parties in the cause, the sister and nieces, were in undisturbed possession of the deceased's apartments, keys, and repositories for some days before the son's return on the Saturday evening, from York. It appears that, on his arrival, he made a search in his mother's drawers, and not finding what he expected, he was either disappointed or dissatisfied. Fawcett, Huble's solicitor, thus answers to the sixth interrogatory: "That Huble informed respondent of his having searched in a drawer of the bureau in the deceased's bed-chamber, where she usually kept her money, and of his having found about fifteen pounds therein, and he expressed great dissatisfaction at only finding such sum, as he said that, upon leaving town four or five days before his mother's death, he had asked her to lend him five pounds, and that she had sent him for her bag to the bureau, and he had there seen a roll of ten pounds and five pounds, bank notes, which he thought, from their appearance, exceeded 100l. in value: that, on a further search, he had found a further sum of money in a box under her bed, of the amount, to the best of respondent's recollection, of 200l. or thereabouts."

---

(a) The affidavit, sworn before a surrogate of this Court, was taken, under the advice of counsel, on account of the age and extreme bodily infirmity of Mrs. Prior.

It is not impossible that the money might have been previously subducted by those who had the keys; and, on the expression of this dissatisfaction, have been restored to the box with some scraps of paper, which were both written and placed there by other hands than the deceased's, and for this [122] there was abundant opportunity. What was the course of events? No sooner was the son's back turned, than the parties called up Mrs. Prior to be present at the search; and the object of their inquiry was discovered under the bed in a box in which were the deceased's best clothes and some of her nieces' clothes also. And to the hand-writing, this old woman, of low education, who had never seen the deceased write, who can scarcely write legibly herself, and who never had the paper in her own hand, is the only witness. She grounds her opinion on the similarity of the hand-writing of this paper to the washing bills written by the deceased, which she had seen; and she also assigns another reason—that the sum mentioned in the paper corresponded with the amount of the money found in bank notes; but this latter coincidence would have equally appeared if the paper had been supposititious.

If the case rested here, and there had been nothing further to verify the existence and the authenticity of this alleged instrument, I should have felt it my duty to have pronounced that there was a failure in proof. Upon such evidence alone of hand-writing and finding, the Court could not, with any safety, conclude that a document of this nature, and proceeding from the deceased, had ever existed since her death. But still it may be supported by other evidence; and, if it could be shewn, as alleged, that either the son, or his solicitor, had distinctly admitted that there had been such a paper, or any paper in the hand-writing of the deceased, the whole character of the case would be changed. For then, a paper being admitted to have existed, and being traced [123] to the hands of the son, if he did not produce, but suppressed, it, under a pretence that it was lost or mislaid, the Court would presume every thing against him as to the contents. It would listen to no suggestion of a smaller sum, but would adhere to the highest amount, as spoken to in the deposition of Mrs. Prior.

But how does the evidence stand? It is alleged in the sixth article—

"That in a day or two after the search made by Huble in the deceased's bed-room (but before the funeral), he made, or pretended to make, a further search for the paper and money which she had informed him of; that, on his coming from the room, Horner asked him whether he had found what he was looking for, to which he replied, 'Not exactly, but I dare say it will be all right;' and he shortly afterwards went away, apparently satisfied. It then expressly pleads 'that at such time Huble found the said testamentary paper with the bank notes, took possession of the whole, and carried them away.'"

First, there is not one single witness examined on this article; and, secondly, as the answers have not been read, I presume they deny it. The story itself is not very consistent with probability: as the son had been before disappointed when he returned, why did they not announce that the money and paper were discovered? If even they had felt conscious of some indelicacy in examining the deceased's box during his absence, the successful issue of their search would have been, in some degree, their justification. Finding this considerable sum, and a paper pointing out how it was to be disposed of, they would surely [124] have communicated it to Huble. If the whole of this story had been true, that, without doubt, would have been the most natural course, and thus all the difficulty would have been removed, and their legacies secure. But they do nothing of the kind: they suffer Huble to make another search by himself; he does not tell them the result, and they allow him to go away without any acknowledgment of having themselves found the money or the paper; and without requiring or giving any explanation. This surely is quite unaccountable, and adds to the incredibility of the story.

The other circumstances make the case still more suspicious. It is pleaded in the seventh article: "That immediately after the funeral, Huble, Horner, and other relations, and Fawcett, the solicitor, met at the deceased's house; that Huble then distinctly communicated to them the fact of his having found the testamentary paper containing the several bequests, but which he, at the same time, stated to be, to Elizabeth White 80l., to Elizabeth Horner and Maria Brown 40l. each, and to Samuel Horner 20l.; whereupon Elizabeth Horner immediately disclosed to Huble the fact of her having, together with Mrs. Prior, searched for, and found and perused, the said paper, and examined the bank notes wrapped up therewith, and stated the actual amount of the several bequests, in contradiction to Huble; that Fawcett then distinctly admitted that the paper was in his possession, and taking a card from his pocket read therefrom the said several bequests, corresponding, in amount, to those mentioned by Huble; that Elizabeth Horner then demanded the [125] paper of Fawcett, who replied that he had left the same at home, but that it should be produced."

Upon this article, again, there is not a tittle of proof—not a single witness has been adduced to speak to it—the answers have not been read. But there is not only an absence of proof respecting these admissions, but they are absolutely disproved. Fawcett and two other persons, Phillips, a relation, and Rudland, who were present at the funeral, and remained to dinner, negative the article. The two latter deny that any such conversation passed in their hearing; and Fawcett, who is vouched as distinctly admitting the existence of the paper, does distinctly, upon oath, deny not only the admission, but the fact that any such paper was ever produced to him; or that Huble ever acknowledged to him its existence. Mrs. Prior's answer to the eighth interrogatory also proves that Mrs. Clark complained, as soon as the funeral was over, that Huble had declared that there was not a scrap of paper left by his mother. This shews, from the mouth of an adverse witness, that whenever the assertion was made, there was also a most clear and positive disavowal on his part. So stands the evidence in respect of what is pleaded to have passed after the funeral.

The eighth article goes on to plead further admissions of Fawcett, on several subsequent occasions, as to the existence of the paper, and that it had been in his possession; and that on one occasion he read from a memorandum the amount of the legacies, but making the amounts respectively considerably less than those actually [126] bequeathed by the deceased; that he said he was authorized by Huble to offer payment of those sums respectively to the legatees, which they refused; and it being stated that they would not be satisfied with less than the full amount of the bequests intended for them, Fawcett remarked, "Then there is one hundred pounds at issue," or expressed himself to that effect. To these, two witnesses are produced, Stead and Black, who, impressed by their friends, the two nieces, with an idea that the paper gave higher sums, called on Fawcett in order to remonstrate against the smaller; but neither witness ventures to assert that Fawcett distinctly admitted that there was any paper—it is highly improbable that he should have made such an acknowledgment, and they might easily have misapprehended the extent of what he said. He swears, positively, that no such paper was ever referred to; but he admits that the deceased had left her son instructions to give these persons something; but trusted the amount to his discretion; and that the son wrote their names down with blanks for the sums; and, afterwards, on consultation with the witness, as to what would be reasonable, he agreed to give the sister 80l., and the nephews and two nieces 20l. each; that the witness copied these sums on a card—and that is the only paper, and the only sums, which ever existed.

The whole evidence beyond the hand-writing, and finding, bears strongly against the paper: not only is it not proved, but the charge of suppression and the alleged admissions are, to a great extent, disproved, and are most solemnly denied. I am bound, therefore, to pronounce that [127] Mrs. Clark has failed in proof of the testamentary schedule.

The question of costs still remains behind—perhaps where a party undertakes to propound such a paper and fails, and still more when she charges fraudulent suppression, on the part of a son, it would usually be a case for costs. I shall, however, abstain from giving them in the present instance—considering the near connexion of the parties; and that the deceased certainly intended to give these relations something, though she left the amount to her son's discretion. He probably, by withholding his purposed bounty, has the power in his own hands of protecting himself against the expences of this suit; but I am by no means convinced that strict justice would not require that Mrs. Clark should be condemned in costs.

Administration decreed to the son.

MEEK AND DONALD v. CURTIS. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, By-Day, 1827.—A next of kin declaring "he proceeds no further" in contesting a will; the Court will dismiss, and not condemn, him in costs, because it is pleaded "that he attempted to suborn an attesting witness:" nor allow affidavits in proof of the attempt.

On motion.

Charles Curtis died on the 7th of October, 1827. His will, duly executed, was opposed by John Curtis, the deceased's brother and next of kin, who, on the fourth session of this term, declared that he would proceed no further. The present application was to condemn him in the costs incurred by his opposition, on the grounds pleaded in the fourth article of the allegation propounding the will: viz. "That John Curtis, in [128] order to invalidate the last will of the deceased, hired or employed to prevail upon or induce (whose name is subscribed as a witness to the said will) to swear and depose in this cause contrary to the truth and fact; that he offered him 100l. if he would swear the deceased was of unsound mind at the time of executing his will; and that he subsequently renewed his endeavours; and that finding his efforts to suborn him ineffectual, he, the said John Curtis, did, on the 12th of November, attend at the house of the said witness—when he recognized and repeated such promises; and offered to the witness, as a further inducement, a sum of 150l., in addition to the 100l. already proposed, if he would swear in manner hereinbefore pleaded."

Lushington in support of the motion, prayed costs against the next of kin.

Dodson contrà, that he might be dismissed, each party paying his own costs: the charge imputed in the allegation is not proved.

Per Curiam. How can the Court assume the guilt of this person? The charge, as far as this Court is, at present, cognizant of it, rests solely in plea; for no evidence has been taken upon it: it is a very heavy accusation, and may be a fit subject for a prosecution, should the executors incline to resort to another tribunal. It does not necessarily follow that the party withdraws his opposition on any apprehension arising from this charge—there may be other grounds to induce him to retire from the cause. If, indeed, the plea had been established by proof, then he would have become liable to the costs; on the whole, the Court recommends the [129] executors to take probate, and go to another jurisdiction.

The proctor for the executors then applied to be heard, on this question of costs, by act on petition with affidavits; but the Court, after observing that such a mode of proof was unsatisfactory, rejected the application.

Hilary Term, 1st Session.—A married woman, living apart from her husband, being joined in the probate of a will (authorising her "to act as executrix, in all respects, without her husband") but not having intermeddled: the Court, on the bank refusing to transfer stock without the husband, will revoke such probate, and grant it to the remaining executors.

On the 22d of December probate of this will, the subject of the previous question, was taken by Richard Meek, Samuel Donald, and Elizabeth Benland (wife of Benjamin Benland), the executors; but, on an application being made by them, at the Bank of England, to have some stock, standing in the deceased's name in their books, transferred, the bank required Benjamin Benland to join in the transfer, notwithstanding the will bequeathed to Mrs. Benland the property "for her sole use and benefit, independent of her husband;" and a clause authorized her "to act as an executrix, in all respects, without her husband." Under these circumstances, an affidavit, as sworn by the executors, was now exhibited, stating these facts; and further, that Mrs. Benland had been separated from her husband for six years; that she had not intermeddled in the deceased's effects; that no suit, either in law or equity, had been commenced against or by the executors, in respect to the said estate; and that it was necessary, for duly carrying into effect the testator's will, that a transfer of his stock should be made.

Upon these facts, the Court, on motion of coun-[130]-sel, revoked the probate already granted; and decreed a new probate to Richard Meek and Samuel Donald, with a power reserved to Mrs. Benland.

MANLY v. LAKIN. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, By-Day, 1827.—Letters containing final testamentary intentions are valid as a will, the deceased considering no further act necessary; nor will they be invalidated by the deceased not having subsequently disposed (as she then purposed) of a small part of her property.

On the admission of an allegation.

Mary Manly, the deceased in this cause, died on the 27th of July, 1827, leaving two letters respectively marked A and B, which were propounded, as together containing her will, by her brother James Manly; and opposed by Sarah Lakin (formerly Mason), and by her three brothers, the children of a deceased sister, the only other persons entitled in distribution to her personal estate. The substance of the allegation, in support of these papers, sufficiently appears from what fell from the Court.

Lushington and Addams for Mr. Manly.

Jenner and Haggard for Mrs. Lakin.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The papers propounded are, under the circumstances of the case, entitled to be considered as the will of the deceased. The deceased had formerly been a governess in the family of Mr. Gosling; and at the time of her death filled the same situation in Mrs. Carr's family, who resided at Dunston Hill, near Durham. She appears to have saved about 1200l., which was invested in India [131] bonds, and managed for her by Mr. William Ellis Gosling. On January 11th, 1827, being then at Dunston, she wrote to Mr. William Ellis Gosling, and after stating that she wished to transfer her money into some other stock, and mentioning the bad state of her health, she went on—

"I will trouble you again respecting the disposal of my little property, if you will permit me, as I feel more likely to die, than to live."

In consequence of this letter Mr. W. E. Gosling wrote advising her to make her will, and offered his assistance "in submitting it to a professional man, to ascertain that it was properly drawn up, and in taking care of it for her." In reply, she caused to be written, by one of the Misses Carr, the papers propounded. Paper A was as follows:—

"Dunston Hill, Jan. 22d.

"My Dear Mr. William,—I am very much obliged to you for suggesting that it would be better for me to leave the formula of the will to you, as, no doubt, you will do right, and I should do wrong. I have five nephews and nieces, to whom I wish to leave a hundred pound a-piece, if there is enough. Their names are Mary, Rosa, Frederick, Georgina, and James; a hundred pound in money amongst my other friends, with the disposal of which I will trouble Mrs. Sandoz, and the residue to my brother. I will not trouble you with regard to my personal property, as I dare say Mrs. Sandoz, or her daughter, will have the goodness to do that for me.

"I am very thankful that you will undertake to [132] do it for me, for I feel that I am quite unequal to do it at present.—I am, &c. "MARY MANLY."

By the second (marked B), addressed to Mrs. Sandoz, after giving to the two Misses Gosling five guineas each to purchase a ring or a seal, she says, "I will leave a memorandum for what is to be done with the residue of the 100l., and also with my goods and chattels, if either you or your daughter will have the goodness to take charge of them."

The first she signed herself, the latter she was too exhausted to sign. Here, then, is a full disposition of her property among her brother's children, for whom also she marks her affection in the letter to Mrs. Sandoz. The question is, whether she abandoned this disposition or adhered to it; and considered it final and operative. Nothing further was done either by herself or by Mr. Gosling, and, I think, the true construction of her conduct is, that she imagined nothing further necessary: she leaves the formula to him, but she had declared her wishes, and she had signed them; and, not receiving any subsequent communication from Mr. Gosling, she would conclude that she had done all that was essential, and that he had ascertained the letter would have legal effect. She, however, did intend to give some directions relative to the division of a sum of 100l. among her friends; but that was to have been a separate act, the non-performance of which—whether arising from ill health—from indecision—or from change of purpose in [133] that respect—cannot invalidate or affect paper A; nor paper B, as far as it goes. Here is particular affection pleaded for the children of her brother James; and no intercourse with Mrs. Lakin, nor the Masons. The paper itself sufficiently shews regard, and testamentary intentions—on this point it does not require extrinsic support.

The Court is, then, satisfied that she intended to make this disposition, that that intention continued till death, and that she considered these papers operative. I, therefore, admit the allegation; and, if the facts pleaded are proved, shall have no hesitation in pronouncing for the validity of these papers as her last will.

This allegation being fully proved, the Court, in Hilary Term, 1828, decreed administration, with the papers annexed, to James Manly, and gave the costs of all parties out of the estate.

MARSH v. TYRRELL AND HARDING. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, By-Day, 1827.—Where fraud is charged, the Court allows a greater latitude of pleading than in ordinary cases; but, even then, remote facts must not be as minutely stated as those which bear directly on the point at issue.

[See further, 2 Hagg. Ecc. 84.]

On the admission of an allegation.

This was a suit respecting several testamentary papers of a married woman, executed under certain powers reserved to her by deeds entered into before her marriage. The deceased, Sophia Harding, died, at the age of sixty-one years, on the 8th of May, 1827. A will, dated March 9th, 1827, and a codicil, April 21st of the same year, were propounded by Edward Tyrrell, one of the executors; and a previous will and codicil, both [134] dated February 28, 1818, were propounded by Arthur Cuthbert Marsh, one of the executors thereof. John Harding, the husband, who was appointed an executor under the will and codicil of 1827, appeared by a separate proctor, and prayed the Court to pronounce for an intestacy.

An allegation had been given in, on behalf of Tyrrell, reciting extracts of an indenture bearing date March 8, 1816, between Sophia Harding, then Smyth, the deceased, of the first part, William Marsh, Arthur Cuthbert Marsh, and Richard Creed of the second part, by which it was provided that certain monies and stocks should be invested in the names of the three latter persons, and should so stand upon trust to pay over the interest to the use of Sophia Harding, then Smyth, independent of any future husband, with a power of disposal by will, attested by two witnesses; and, as to one sum of 10,000l., by a deed of gift also.

The plea then exhibited a copy of the power, and alleged that, in pursuance of this power, she gave instructions for, and afterwards executed by mark, the will of March, 1827; and also the codicil of April, 1827; and her capacity at both times.

The question now arose on the admissibility of an allegation brought in on the part of Arthur Cuthbert Marsh.

Addams in support of the allegation.

Lushington and Nicholl contrà, were of counsel for Mr. Tyrrell.

Phillimore for Mr. Harding.

[135] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This allegation is certainly of very great length, consisting of thirty-five articles, and occupying above seventy pages; there are, in addition, twenty-eight exhibits, and reference is made to other instruments. It is a consideration not to be over-looked that, if an allegation of this extent be essential in reply to a condidit, answers of an equal length, and entering into much explanation, will be requisite—and from two parties appearing by separate proctors, and the quantity of the depositions will, necessarily, be almost incalculable. Thus great expence will be incurred; but the mischief will not rest there: for, as fraud is charged, it may be expected that every passage, capable of proof, will be contradicted, and that, even where no direct contradiction is offered, the effect of the charges will be attempted to be taken off, by giving a different colouring to the circumstances. This may run to a still greater bulk, and lead to further responsive pleading, and to exceptive allegations. Yet if justice, the primary object, requires this detail for the purpose of detecting and obviating fraud, it must be gone into; but the extreme length of a cause may, of itself, tend to defeat justice, since the enormous expence may prevent its arrival at a due and proper conclusion. My duty, therefore, is not to allow a minute examination of distant and remote facts, which only bear, by inference, on the point at issue; while, in respect to those which bear directly on, and are more nearly connected with, it, greater latitude must be permitted.

What, then, is the substantial issue? The suit arises upon the will of a married woman, and it is [136] agreed on both sides that she had the power to make a will, under the deeds of settlement in 1816 and 1817; for, though the husband may not admit them to be valid, he cannot call them into question in this Court. The will of 1827 is attested, as required by the power, and is, therefore, to be considered just as if she were sole. The executor sets up this instrument, and if its factum be proved—if it be the will of a capable and free testatrix's—there is an end of the case. The factum of that will is, then, the true issue: except legacies to three servants, it gives to the husband every thing over which she had a power of disposal. There is also a short codicil, merely leaving rings to three friends. Both instruments are attested by three witnesses, and were propounded in a mere condidit, pleading the deed of settlement, execution, and capacity.

The present allegation is for the purpose of impeaching that will and codicil, and of shewing fraud, circumvention, importunity, and conspiracy. The history and circumstances, as laid, are certainly strong; and hold out a suspicious appearance against the husband. To establish such a case, and to detect and defeat the fraud, may require considerable detail; for to obtain a will of this nature would probably be a clandestine transaction, to which a few persons joined in the conspiracy, would alone be privy, and which could only be unravelled by entering into a detail of circumstances shewing the improbability, inconsistency, and ultimately the falsehood of the adverse case.

The party opposing the will is the executor of a will made nine years previously. The several deeds of settlement were entered into in 1816 and [137] 1817: the marriage took place in June, 1817: the will, in favour of Marsh, was executed in 1818; and its factum is not impeached. There is no trace of any intermediate testamentary act, which, operating as a revocation, would disprove uniform adherence to that will. It may be, therefore, very important to ascertain the reasons of that will, as they may shew the improbability of such a sweeping benefit to the husband.

After these preliminary remarks I shall proceed to examine summarily the present allegation.

The first article enters into a detail of her property, the advantage of which I cannot see, as the instruments shew its amount and nature.

The second article certainly carries back the history very far; but, as the case considerably depends on adherence to the disposition of 1818, it may be necessary to trace back her life in order to discover why she should have selected this particular branch of the Marsh family for the objects of her testamentary bounty; more particularly as, after Marsh had undergone misfortunes, she persisted in her previous intentions: it may be, indeed, that his difficulties were an additional reason for the continuance of the disposition.

The third and fourth articles contain very long recitals—they are useless, and should be omitted, as the deeds themselves are before the Court.

The succeeding articles, to the tenth inclusive, are not objected to as inadmissible, but as only requiring to be reformed and compressed.

The eleventh and twelfth articles are material and admissible: for it is a fact in this case that, by the will of 1818, a legacy of 500l. was left to each of three servants; which legacies are re-[138]-duced, by the will of 1827, to 300l. each: it is, therefore, important to shew a continuance of her confidence in, and affection for, these servants.

The thirteenth pleads general treatment, and is admissible.

The latter part of the fourteenth article, and the exhibits in the fifteenth, have been objected to; and I agree in the objections taken against them. The letters cannot be read as proofs of importunity and ill treatment on the part of the husband, for it is quite clear that the deceased was not privy to the parts containing complaints against him; but had those complaints been written from her dictation, they would have been evidence on the same grounds that her declarations would be received. The letters may, perhaps, on revision, be found admissible as proofs of other circumstances, for if written, even in part only, by her direction, they shew confidence in this servant, who is a legatee of a larger amount in the former than in the latter will.

I shall not advert to the remainder of this allegation more particularly than to remark that it is asserted the deceased was reduced to a most unresisting state; that, in that state, this will, exclusively in favour of the husband, was obtained from her; and that other conduct of a very suspicious nature was resorted to by him, and by some of the persons connected with this will.

The thirty-fourth article, when considered with reference to these circumstances, may be important. I shall not specify any other article, but recommend to the counsel a general and careful revision of the whole.

Allegation reformed.

[139] IN THE GOODS OF JOSEPH HALL. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 14th Dec., 1827.—An action at common law being brought, in the archbishop's name, by the administrator de bonis non against the executors of the original administrator for the balance of the intestate's effects, the Court will direct the bond, given by the original administrator, to be attended with, on security being given to indemnify the archbishop against costs.

On motion.

Joseph Hall died intestate in May, 1820, leaving one brother and sister, and a nephew and niece, the only persons entitled in distribution to his personal estate.

In the month of June letters of administration, under seal of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, were granted to John Hall, the brother; he died in 1824, without having made a distribution, and leaving a considerable sum of the intestate's effects in his banker's hands. By his will he appointed his widow and Joseph Hodgkinson executors: they took probate. In March, 1825, the nephew and niece took administration de bonis non to Joseph Hall, and, as his legal representatives, made repeated applications to the executors of John Hall for the balance of the intestate's estate, which they admitted was in their possession, but refused to pay. An action had, therefore, been brought against them, in the Court of King's Bench, by the administrators.

Lushington—on affidavits that his parties were legally advised they could not proceed to trial, unless the administration bond, a breach of which was assigned, was produced; and stating that the action was brought solely against the executors of the original administrator, and not against the sureties; and that his parties were willing to give security as against costs—moved the Court to direct the administration bond to be [140] attended with in the Court of King's Bench, and produced at the hearing of the cause described The Archbishop of Canterbury v. Hodgkinson and Hall.

Per Curiam. The Court granted the motion; but thought it fit that the archbishop should be indemnified against costs, as the action was brought in his name.

Motion granted.

CUNDY v. MEDLEY. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 14th Dec., 1827.—Papers, on the face of them, unfinished, with no circumstances to account for such their state, are presumed to be abandoned, and, consequently, are not entitled to probate.

On the admission of an allegation.

Two papers were propounded as together containing the last will of John Medley. The first began:—

"This is the last will and testament of me John Medley of London which I now make and date the twenty second day of October eighteen hundred and twenty four:" and, after enumerating his property, giving several legacies, and bequeathing the residue, it concluded—"this is my last will and testament dated as above the twenty second day of October eighteen hundred and twenty four. I appoint my Executors"

The second was in the following words:—

"Exors Mr A John Cundy of the house of Capel Cuerton and Cundy Stockbrokers Royal Exchange London to whom I give and bequeath one hundred pounds"

The allegation pleaded that John Medley died [141] on the 12th of August, 1827, a bachelor, leaving behind him two unmarried sisters, a married sister, and several nephews and nieces who would have been entitled in distribution if he had died intestate; and that his personalty amounted to 17,000l.: that he was a man of retired habits, reserved about his affairs, and kept up little intercourse with any person: that he had no occupation, that he employed Capel, Cuerton, and Cundy as his stockbrokers and bankers, and reposed great trust and confidence in them: that in 1820 the house where he lodged was burnt down: that 250l. in bank notes, belonging to him, were destroyed: that Capel, Cuerton, and Cundy, having ascertained the numbers, and given security, obtained payment of the amount at the bank: that in October, 1824, the deceased wrote No. 1, and some time afterwards No. 2—intending them together to operate as his will; and by No. 2 appointed Mr. Cundy executor: that both papers were in the deceased's hand-writing: that they were found in a pocket-book deposited in a trunk in his bedroom, wherein he kept other papers of moment.

This allegation was given on the part of Mr. Cundy, and opposed by two of the deceased's sisters, Ann and Priscilla Medley, who prayed that the Court would decree to them administration of the goods of their late brother, John Medley, as dead intestate.

Dodson and Addams in support of the allegation.

Lushington and Nicholl in objection to its admission.

[142] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. It would be contrary to all the principles maintained in this Court to allow the present allegation to go to proof. The paper No. 1 is, on the face of it, unfinished: it is not subscribed—it concludes, "I appoint my executors," and there breaks off abruptly: it is written on the back of an old passport from the French Minister: the deceased evidently intended to do something more to it: at the utmost it is a draft for a will, and an unfinished draft, for he purposed to appoint executors.

No. 2 is a little scrap of paper, and there is nothing intrinsic, or extrinsic, to fix the date; but, whether it was written before or after No. 1, still both papers, taken together, are unfinished; they are mere memoranda preparatory to a more formal will: for, though in respect to the disposition of his property he had made considerable progress, yet it is clear that he intended to appoint more than one executor, the word executors being in the plural both in No. 1 and No. 2. The deceased lived nearly three years after the only date, applying to either papers, that can be ascertained; there is nothing pleaded to account for their unfinished state, or to repel the legal presumption of abandonment; and I shall, therefore, reject this allegation, pronounce that the deceased is dead intestate, and decree administration to the two sisters who have applied for it. Mr. Cundy must, however, have his expences out of the estate, as it was proper that these papers should be brought before the Court, more especially as there were minors interested under them.

Allegation rejected.

[143] IN THE GOODS OF WILLIAM APPELBEE. Prerogative Court, Caveat-Day, 8th January, 1828.—An executor having, in pencil, altered a will (by the direction of the testator who approved of it when so altered) and then cancelled it, only in order that another might be drawn up—the preparation of which will was prevented by the death of the deceased: probate of the cancelled will (in its original state) will be granted, on a proxy of consent being given by all persons interested.

[Referred to, Dixon v. Solicitor to the Treasury, [1905] P. 44.]

On motion.

William Appelbee died on the 7th of November, 1827, leaving behind him Mary Ann Arnald, widow, his natural and lawful sister, and only next of kin; and Sarah (wife of Charles Bassage), his lawful niece—the only persons entitled in distribution in case he had died intestate. The deceased duly executed his will on the 14th of April, 1823. In 1825 he delivered this will (the exhibit A) to Mr. Jackson, the sole executor, and requested him to make certain alterations in it. Mr. Jackson drew his pencil through the signature at the bottom of the will, and made some alterations with the same material: the deceased expressed his approbation of them, and said that he would make a copy, and execute the same in the presence of witnesses.

On the 29th of September, 1827, the deceased mentioned to his solicitor that he had made his will in his own hand-writing, and promised to shew it to him; and on the first of November he told an intimate friend—whose opinion he had asked respecting the papers marked B—that he would write his will again; and, on the evening of the same day, the deceased mentioned to his sister that he proposed to re-copy his will. On the 6th the deceased brought the papers (B) from his bed-room into the parlour, and said to his sister, "That he had intended to reduce them to a [144] smaller compass, but found himself too weak to do so; and added, that if he did not get better, he would have his will written for him on the morrow." On the following day the deceased died: "B" was found in a closet of his bed-room; and "A" was found (with the signature of the deceased, and the names of the witnesses struck through) in a box with leases and documents of importance.

These circumstances were fully substantiated by affidavit, and Mrs. Arnald and Mrs. Bassage and her husband had executed a proxy, consenting "to probate of the said will of the deceased, bearing date the 14th of April, 1823, or letters of administration with the said will, or the said testamentary memoranda annexed, of all and singular the goods, chattels, and credits of the deceased, being granted in such manner and form, and to such person, as the Court may direct."

Lushington moved for a decree.

Per Curiam. The paper B is, in substance, the same as the will of 1823, marked with the letter A; but it also contains a great deal of matter extraneous, and not of testamentary import. There can be no advantage in annexing it to the will. The signature of "A" being struck through, is to be regarded as preparatory to the deceased making a new will—which he did not do; this must be considered, then, as only a conditional cancellation, and, consequently, not a revocation.(a)[1] The [145] Court, therefore, as the consent of all parties interested has been given, thinks it would best consult the intentions of the deceased, by decreeing probate of "A" singly, as it originally stood before the signature was touched.

Motion granted.

IN THE GOODS OF ANNA MARIA ORMOND. Prerogative Court, Caveat-Day, 8th January, 1828.—The Court will grant administration, with papers, annexed to a person, as attorney of an executor according to the tenor, without requiring a regular power of attorney; such person being clearly authorized to act, by letter, from that executor—the executor of the residuary legatee (who was also executor, but did not take probate) having consented.

On motion.

Anna Maria Ormond died at Surat, in the East Indies, on 11th May, 1826—a widow. By her will, duly executed, she appointed her mother, Mrs. Bloxam, sole executrix and residuary legatee. This will was left in England. The deceased subsequently wrote, in India, three papers of a testamentary import; and probate of these was granted at Bombay to Richard Moore, as executor, according to the tenor. He collected the property in India, and transmitted it to England to Mr. Bloxam, the deceased's brother, with a letter (dated Surat, May 4, 1827), containing this passage—"I felt gratified on hearing from you, as it enables me to entreat your good offices to act in the will of your lamented sister, and to conclude my executorship."

Lushington on these circumstances, and after stating that Mrs. Bloxam, the mother of the deceased, survived her daughter, but died without taking probate; and that Mr. Isherwood, the executor named in the will of Mrs. Bloxam, consented to the present application, moved that letters [146] of administration (with the will as contained in four paper writings annexed) of the goods of Mrs. Ormond be granted to Charles John Bloxam, as the lawful attorney, and for the use and benefit of Captain Moore.

Per Curiam. There is no occasion in the present instance for the Court to require a regular power of attorney: (a)[2] the letter to Mr. Bloxam so manifestly authorizes him to act in the arrangement of the deceased's property, that its handwriting being proved, and the consent of Mrs. Bloxam's executor being regularly given, the administration may pass. But the securities must justify.

Motion granted.

HOBY v. HOBY AND HOBY.(b) Prerogative Court, Caveat-Day, 8th January, 1828.—Supervening insanity is sufficient to account for the non-execution of a paper, written shortly before, and consistent with the intentions and affections of the deceased; nor will it so reflect back on previous eccentricity as to invalidate such a paper.

Hilary Term, 1828.

(b) The cause was argued, on the by-day after Michaelmas Term, by Phillimore on behalf of the executor; and by Lushington and Dodson for an intestacy.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The deceased, James Hoby, died at Walham Green, Chelsea, on the 14th of March, 1826, a [147] bachelor, leaving two brothers, the only persons, entitled in distribution to his property, which amounted in value to 4000l. He had formerly kept the Fountain Tavern, in Catherine Street, Strand; and a paper, all in his own hand-writing, not signed nor attested, is propounded, as his will, by his cousin James Hoby, the executor named therein; and it is opposed by the deceased's brother Thomas Hoby. The grounds of opposition being not merely that the paper is unexecuted, but also that the deceased was not of sound mind; it is necessary for the Court to consider both these points.

The contents and form of the instrument may bear upon each of them. It is in these words:—

"Walham Green, 17th of Aug. 1825.

"I James Hoby of Walham Green Middlesex being of sound mind and body and fully revokeing all former wills heretofore made do declare this my last will and testament when it pleases God to call me I wish to be buried in a plain and decent way at East Barnet near my D^r^ Parents and I nominate and appoint my D^r^ Cousin in Skinner St Fringe Manufacturer my executor (Mr. James Hoby) to have possession of all my effects and property and to pay and dispose of what is given as legacies and bequests to those hereinafter named to his sister Mrs. Wright of Hereford (my) cousin I bequeath one hundred pounds and the print of our Saviour on the Cross now in the dining room To Mr. James Cranston Jun^r^ of the King's Acre Hereford all my books to Mrs. Edwards my cousin of Bunshill I give and bequeath one hundred [148] pounds—to my unfortunate brother Tom I give one hundred pounds—to my poor Cousin Sarah Clarkson 20l.—to the old Friend Mr Salkeld 20l.—to Mr Warren resident here for his kindness and attention one hundred pounds—and after the payment of these legacies I give and bequeath all the remainder of my property to my D^r^ Cousin and Executor to have and hold the same for himself and family hopeing he will take care to pay these legacies and bequests—not being at this time involved in any debts I leave my cousin and executor Mr James Hoby to sell or dispose of such part of the property as he chuses or retain it excepting the bequests made in the will—Also the Lease at Walham Green I hope it is clearly understo*n* that the linen wine household and every other articles on the Excepting has been bequeathed is to become my Cousin Mr James Hoby's together with money at my Bankers—

"I have here unto set my hand and signature

n "

These are the very words of the will. There is the commencement of a letter, but there is no subscription. The date, and also the few last lines, are in darker ink than the body of the will, and were written, apparently, at a different time from the remainder, except, perhaps, some corrections which are in the darker coloured ink, and some letters which seem as if they had been amended or retouched. This instrument, then, is a complete disposition: it leaves some legacies; it appoints an executor, and bequeaths the residue: [149] it is rationally expressed, and, though it passes over the deceased's brothers, it disposes of the property among his family, giving, however, the bulk of it to his cousin James Hoby.

The evidence applying to the deceased's affections proves too clearly, even to require citing, that he was wholly estranged from his brothers, and greatly attached to this cousin—and that these feelings were not the offspring of any sudden and recent impression, but may be traced back as far as the account of his life extends. The Worralls speak to declarations of this import, while he lived at Ealing in 1815: nay, Brundrett says that, at the time of his first employment as the deceased's confidential solicitor, viz. fifteen or sixteen years before his death, "he was in the habit of speaking of his brothers in the strongest terms, as disapproving their characters and conduct."

There is clear proof, then, that he felt hostility towards his brothers; that he entertained a most unfavourable opinion of them, and declared they should never have any of his property: while, on the other hand, the whole res gesta shews his entire confidence in his cousin James—with him he lived on terms of the most friendly intercourse—to him he resorted for advice or assistance in any difficulty, and he alone, during the long illness subsequent to the will, had the care and custody of the deceased.

That his affections, long settled and fixed, were entirely in concurrence with the disposition of his property under this will, is a material fact, as shewing—first, that it was not an hasty and transient purpose, which he was likely to abandon, and to which it was not probable he would adhere: [150] secondly, that it was not an intention arising out of any delusion of mind, and insane dislike, against his brothers: but, thirdly, that, on the contrary, the act itself was quite in unison with the sound mind of the deceased, and bears no marks of any perversion of understanding; nor is any change of former intentions. It does not grow out of, nor in any manner vibrate in concert with, the subject on which, more particularly, the insanity shewed itself when that calamity did actually visit him. These considerations go strongly to sustain the whole case in both its branches.

The deceased was a person of great singularity of character; he was odd and eccentric—vain and boastful; had collected china and books, prints and plate in his house, which he was proud of displaying: he was not weary of telling their history again and again—decies repetita placebit. He was fond of his garden, his flowers, and his green-house plants; he liked to exhibit them, and to boast of their great value, and, as amateurs frequently are, he was a little suspicious that they were stolen by his job-gardener. He was also irritable, and liable to excitement—passionate and violent. It is not then extraordinary that a person of this temperament should finally become actually insane; and it has been justly argued that this subsequent insanity reflects back on these eccentricities a semblance of an insane tendency and character, but it will not convert them into proofs of actual insanity already existing; they may be either symptoms of ultimate derangement or collateral accompaniments of existing disease, if other acts decidedly insane could be shewn, but not insanity per se.

[151] In such an individual it is not quarrelling with the coachman for stopping too long at an inn; nor dabbing the mess of fish in his face for neglecting to take care of it; nor violently kicking his dog, nor boasting that half Fulham belonged to him, that can prove actual insanity; they are oddities; they are eccentricities; they are even symptoms of approaching derangement; but they do not establish derangement itself. And it is to be observed that most of these acts are imputed to him at a time when the principal of the brother's own witnesses—the Kings—admit that his mind was sound. King first attributes insanity to him on Sunday, the 14th of August; for he says that the deceased was odd, but he never considered him decidedly insane till the 14th of August.

Now King was intimately acquainted with him, for six or seven years lived near him, had borrowed 300l. of him, on bond, in June or July; yet various of the acts, from which it is attempted to describe him as insane, happened long before that period. On the other hand, a dozen witnesses, long acquainted with him, and of different descriptions—his medical attendant, his confidential solicitor, his neighbours, his inmates, and his servants—all swear they never considered him of unsound mind till the 21st of August, four days after the date of the will.

It thus becomes important to enquire into the state of the deceased on the 14th of August, and during the intermediate period, till the 21st. On the evening of Sunday, the 14th of August, he fancied he had been robbed of his plate by Warren. This Warren was a sort of protegé of the deceased; he had been brought up as a cabinet-[152]-maker, which was his father's trade. The deceased had lent him money to go into business at Bath; he there failed. He afterwards, in London, with the assistance of the deceased, set up in business again; and having been there equally unsuccessful, he had for some time resided with the deceased as a companion. He is a legatee of 100l. in the will, and the deceased, as he states, also gave him on the 17th of August a draft for 100l. and a bond from King for 300l. Warren's explanation of the transaction of Sunday, the 14th of August, is that the plate was usually kept in a chest within a cupboard in his bed-room; that he had that morning taken it out to clean; that he and the deceased had some angry words; that he put the plate away, and went to town, saying he did not know whether he should return. During Warren's absence it appears from the brother's witness, Nutt (the details of whose evidence are far too loose to be relied on), that the deceased, who had been examining his treasures of different kinds, became very enraged, thinking, and having worked himself up into the belief, that he had been robbed of part of his plate, went to his neighbour King, in great agitation, and told him that Warren had robbed him; that he would go to town to his cousin, James Hoby, immediately, and obtain a warrant to arrest Warren, who had said "that he did not know whether he should return;" and he thought, perhaps, he might go off with his property. He also made the same complaint and charges to others of his neighbours, and certainly was exceedingly agitated. It was at this time, between eight and nine o'clock in the evening: King very kindly undertook to go, and went, for him to James Hoby. [153] However, before King came back Warren had returned, shewed the deceased where the plate was, explained his error, and the deceased was quite satisfied; and upon King's reaching the house he finds them together in a friendly manner; the matter being perfectly cleared up.

Now, that a person of this frame of mind, supposing himself to have been robbed by an almost adopted son, should be agitated, and should be nearly, if not quite, worked up into madness, is not extraordinary. That, after he became decidedly insane, this notion, so vividly imprinted on his imagination, should return, is also not extraordinary; but I am by no means satisfied that the character of actual insanity, or that any thing beyond high excitement and irritation, manifested itself, even on this Sunday, the 14th of August. The excitement, undoubtedly, was extreme; it might amount to actual delirium—Ira furor brevis est—as long as it lasted the mind might be unsound, but when the mistake was discovered the mind was restored, and reason resumed its place.

King deposes that the deceased, both then and the next day, said "his head had been so bad he really did not know what he was doing when he came to him." And this declaration has been relied on as proving derangement—derangement by the deceased's own admission. If so, it also proves recovery—the removal of delirium; for one of the strongest proofs of re-established faculties is the consciousness and admission of the party himself that he had been disordered. The return and continuance of this derangement during the ensuing week has been deposed to, and much dependence is placed on it. To Nutt, as I have before [154] said, I cannot trust; nor to the Kings' accuracy, in respect to time; but their veracity I have no reason to doubt. They mention no circumstance enabling them to fix the events, as occurring, rather between the 14th and 21st than after the 21st; they frequently saw the deceased subsequent to the 21st; they might easily confound what passed on the later occasions with what they suppose to have happened at a previous period. King swears that a letter from the deceased was brought to him early on Monday morning by Warren; he repeats it positively; yet when the letter is shewn him he admits "that it must have been brought to his house by some other person after Warren had left him." I believe it to have been an honest mistake; but if he could fall into such a mistake, both as to the person and as to the time of day, how much more easy was it for him to have been in error as to whether these circumstances happened in the week before the 21st, or in the week after? I am the more disposed to think that they must have happened at the latter time; because the facts correspond with what then took place, but not with what is established, by unsuspicious proofs, to have been the condition of the deceased during the foregoing week. On this part of the case, it is not, I think, shewn that decided insanity existed between the 14th and the 21st; at the utmost, reason was fluctuating; and it appears doubtful, whether, on Sunday, the 14th, while the impression that he had been robbed remained upon his mind—whether, even then, he was worked up to a state of delirium.

I proceed, then, to the evidence immediately referring to other acts in that week; and, more [155] especially, to the instrument propounded. This, as I have said, was manifestly written at two different times. The bulk and body of the will, comprising the complete disposition of his property, was first written in paler ink—the date, August 17th, 1825, and a small addition at the end, in a darker ink, and one or two slight corrections were made, and a few of the letters retouched with that darker ink: so that the body—that is, the important part—may have been written long before the 17th of August. On that day the uncle of the deceased (the father of the executor) visited the deceased, and found him in his bed-room, sitting at a writing table with his papers about him. The deceased said "he had been busy making his will," and asked him to go down and order luncheon, and he would come down to him presently. The uncle staid to dinner. After dinner, he says:—

"He and the deceased being alone together, the deceased, pointing to a picture which was then hanging up in the room, observed that he had left the picture, and also 100l. to Elizabeth, meaning Elizabeth Wright, deponent's eldest daughter; that he had also left a legacy of 20l. to his friend Salkeld, and 20l. or 10l. to Mrs. Clarkson, a cousin of the deceased; that he had left his books to a Mr. Cranstoun. He then said that he would not tell deponent more of his will; who, in a joking way, said that he did not wish to know, as he had no occasion for anything from him. The deceased then added that he had left the greatest part of his property to those he liked best; and he recollects him to have said that he had left a young man, of the name of Warren, 100l."

[156] Here is a direct reference to, and recognition of, this will; for he declares that he had left the greatest part of his property to those he liked best, and the whole history demonstrates, that his cousin had long been the person he liked best. Nutt thinks, but is not positive, that this happened on the 16th: it is not very material whether it happened the day before, or the afternoon of the day on the morning of which he wrote his will: if on the 16th, then it was preparatory to the act of the following day—if on the 17th, at dinner time, then it was after the transaction with Caird and Rouse, who were there between eleven and twelve o'clock. At all events, this conversation furnishes strong evidence in support of the act, as shewing decided intention, and perfect capacity.

It is fully proved that his opposite neighbour, Caird, a baker, was requested to come in order to attest his will, and that Mr. Rouse, the deceased's apothecary, happening to be at Caird's house at the time, upon Nutt, the messenger, telling the deceased, he sent a second time, begging Mr. Rouse to accompany Caird. They both went over, and found the deceased in his dining-room, at a writing-table, with papers before him: he said "he was very ill, and had been making his will, being assured that he could not live long." He read the will to them, and tendered a pen to Rouse that he might witness it; and undoubtedly it is no proof of derangement of mind in such a person that he was not aware of the regular form of executing a will. Mr. Rouse (thinking the deceased bilious, and out of spirits), feeling his pulse, said he was in no danger, rallied him, and told him he was no worse than he had been before, and [157] in order to avoid depressing his spirits, prevailed upon him to postpone the formal execution.

On the ninth interrogatory he says: "He advised the deceased to postpone the execution of his will, because he considered that his mind wanted rousing; that he was already too much depressed and out of spirits, and the execution of so solemn an instrument was likely to make him worse; respondent did not perceive that the deceased's mind was in a confused state or that he was unfit to make a will; his memory was perfect, and his understanding correct."

Caird fully confirms Rouse's opinion, so that this alone prevented the execution—there was not any hesitation on the part of the deceased: it was not deferred from his doubting or deliberating, but because his medical attendant dissuaded and diverted him from it.

Both these witnesses were well acquainted with the deceased; Caird had been his opposite neighbour for five years, with whom he used often to gossip, as he expresses it; Rouse, his apothecary, for some length of time. They knew his general mind, and habits, and deportment: if he had been at this time in a state of insanity and derangement they must have discovered it. This evidence, then, bears strongly on both points—fixed intention, and soundness of mind. I might perhaps rest the case here; but where there is any suggestion of insanity it is proper to look at all confirmatory circumstances.

On the following day, the 18th of August, the deceased was worse, and Dr. Latham was called in. His disorder was not one of the head—not paralysis nor apoplexy—not brain fever—it was [158] diarrhea. Dr. Latham, it appears, was not then consulted for the first time—he had often attended him before. He says:—

"On the 18th of August, 1825, he visited the deceased, who thought himself dying; that deponent laughed at him, knowing the deceased was not in danger; that on the 19th or 20th, when he again saw him, he was much better; that on the 21st he found him in a state of great nervous irritation and excitement, which were partly allayed; but on the 1st of September he considered that the case should be treated as one which might end in confirmed insanity." He further says, "That on the 18th, and on the intermediate days between that and the 21st, he is quite certain that nothing occurred in the manner and conversation of the deceased which gave him any reason to believe that the deceased was not of perfect capacity; he conducted himself and conversed as a person of sound mind; and at no time previous to the 21st had he any cause for believing that the deceased was not of sound mind, memory, and understanding." And to the thirty-eighth interrogatory the same witness answers, "That on the days previous to the 21st of August, the deceased was, as respondent verily believes, and of his belief he swears positively, of sound and perfect mind, and was capable, as he believes, of any act requiring calm and cool consideration."

It may not be unfit to remark that the character of the deceased's derangement, when it does actually take place, is rather delirium than delusion—rather high excitement than false impression. In delirium, intervals of coolness and actual lucidity are much more common than when a per-[159]-manent delusion has seized the mind; though, when excitement returns, some circumstance that had before made a strong impression may, not improbably, revert, and attend the delirium: such appeared to have been the case with respect to the deceased's notion that he had been robbed, and by Warren; but that is not an impression in any degree connected with the disposition contained in this instrument, nor shewing itself in these testamentary transactions.

It was observed that there was an inconsistency in the legacy to Warren "for his kindness and attention," and these repeated charges of robbery. In the first place, this argument assumes that the Kings are correct in fixing the date of those declarations between the 14th and 21st of August: in the next place, it assumes that the body of the will was written on the 17th, which might have been written long before the 14th; but, in the last place, what sort of inconsistency does it shew? Inconsistency with the existence of insanity!—it shews that when he wrote this will he had not on his mind the false idea that Warren had robbed him; it, therefore, proves rather the absence than the presence of disorder. His whole conduct to Warren is natural enough, supposing him sane—he had, through error, and under excitement, made false charges against him on the 14th—he was convinced they were unfounded—Warren was hurt, and felt injured by them—on the next morning, the 15th, the deceased made him a present of a diamond ring—a sense of his injustice rendered that act not unnatural—on the 17th, being about to execute this will, by which he had bequeathed [160] him 100*l.* only, he gave him a draft for another 100*l.* and King's bond for 300*l.* borrowed in the previous June or July. Whether the will was written before, and he made these gifts, not choosing to alter the will, or whether he preferred that they should not appear in his will—even if written on that day—yet they do not bear the character of an insane act, much less of still thinking that Warren had robbed him. His property was worth about 4000*l.*: the amount of these presents, particularly after their long connexion, and these unfounded charges, might not be irrational nor extravagant; nor does he irrationally give him either articles bequeathed specifically by will, nor even all his property ejusdem generis; for there are other bonds actually left sealed up, and the envelope thus indorsed, "To be opened by my dear cousin and executor Mr. James Hoby." This is not an unimportant act—it is an act of sanity, and not only so, but is strong to prove adherence. Whether written before the 17th, on the 17th, or after the 17th, it still has effect—if before, it shews that the will was written before, and evidences a long and deliberate intention while sane; if on the 17th, it confirms the sanity on that day—if after, it proves adherence to this will—in either case it tends to support the will. Adherence, however, is very sufficiently established, and abandonment of, and departure from, intention, are in the last degree improbable.

On the 18th the deceased wrote to his cousin, requesting he would bring down Brundrett, as he was extremely ill—"in a dangerous way." Warren, who carried the letter, told the cousin that the deceased had alarmed himself; that the medical [161] gentlemen thought that there was no danger, and that in a day or two he would be able to go to Brundrett (that no danger was apprehended is confirmed by the testimony of Latham and Rouse): Brundrett, the solicitor, was, therefore, not brought down; but on that or the following day his cousin went to see the deceased, and dined with him; the will was produced; this cousin urged him to alter it in favour of his brothers—the deceased refused, and said "he would go to Brundrett the next day and have his will made out as it was; after the behaviour of his brothers to him he would do no more than he had done."

Here, again, is firm adherence to the will and sound mind.

The next day the deceased was no better; the diarrhea continued; and on the 21st he became delirious and insane, and so he remained till his death, though with intervals of calmness. The completion of the act was thus prevented, but the testamentary intention existed as long as capacity existed.

It has been asked—why was not the will executed in the intervals of the disorder?

In the first place, the intervals were hardly of that duration that it was proper or likely that such an act should be proposed. In the next place, the deceased was not in possession of the will; for when actual derangement seized him, all his papers were sealed up and sent to Mr. Brundrett, his confidential solicitor, under the authority of James Hoby, who, by the instrument itself as well as by the sealed envelope, was declared his executor.

Upon the whole, I am of opinion that this instru-[162]-ment contains the sane testamentary intentions of the deceased, and for these reasons—

First. That it is founded upon the conduct and declarations of the deceased for years before his death; and this constitutes an important foundation of the act:

Secondly. That the deceased was of sound mind when he wrote; and on the 17th, when he would have executed this paper; for no part of the contents connect themselves with the particular subject of the deceased's insanity—viz. his being robbed:

And, lastly. That the unfinished state of the instrument is sufficiently accounted for and the adherence to it sufficiently proved.

I therefore pronounce for the paper.

As to costs: Thomas Hoby, as one of the next of kin, was justified, from the unfinished state of the paper, in putting the executor on proof of it: I shall then give no costs against him; nor shall I allow his costs out of the estate, because he has set up insanity and abandonment and has failed to prove them; besides, he has a legacy of 100l. under this instrument: nor shall I give them to the other brother who has intervened, as the appearance of two parties in the same interest by different proctors is not to be encouraged. I shall leave them to the liberality of the executor.

Probate decreed.

[163] BRAY v. BRAY. Arches Court, Hilary Term, 2nd Session, 1828.—In a suit for separation by reason of cruelty brought by the wife, an acquittal of her witnesses (for a conspiracy in counselling her to institute this suit) upon an indictment laid by the husband and his evidence thereon, in which he admitted and repeated certain accusations originally alleged in the libel as acts of cruelty, may be pleaded as a continuation and admission on oath of that cruelty.

[Discussed, Russell v. Russell, [1897] A. C. 395.]

On the admission of additional articles.

This was a cause of divorce, by reason of cruelty, originally promoted in the Consistory Court of London by Saba Eliza Bray against the Reverend Bidlake Bray; and came up to this Court by appeal from the admission of the libel. On the by-day of Michaelmas Term, 1827, the decree was affirmed and the cause retained.

The present question was the admissibility of certain additional articles, pleading, first, that in February, 1827, an indictment was preferred, on the prosecution of Mr. Bray, against Elizabeth Malkin, the mother of Mrs. Bray; William Hammersley, her uncle (indicted by the name of William Spode); George Vance, her medical attendant; and Robert Shank Atcheson, her solicitor, for conspiring to separate Mr. and Mrs. Bray; and "for counselling Saba Eliza Bray to promote against the said Bidlake Bray a certain cause of divorce or separation by reason of cruelty;" that the grand jury, on the evidence of Mr. Bray and of another witness, returned a true bill; that the indictment was heard before Lord Tenterden [164] and a special jury on the 2d of November last, when Mr. Bray and many others were examined for the prosecution; that no witnesses were examined for the defence, but the evidence of Mrs. Bray, whose examination, taken in private, lasted four hours, was read; and the Lord Chief Justice then declining to receive any further evidence, the jury thereupon acquitted the defendants.

The second article exhibited, in supply of proof, a copy of the bill of indictment.

The third in substance pleaded: "That in the examination of Bidlake Bray on the trial of the said indictment, he did admit and confess that he had declared both before and after the birth of the child of which his said wife, Saba Eliza Bray, was delivered, that he believed it to be the child of her uncle; that he had also asked the said Saba Eliza Bray, his wife, if she knew the meaning of incest, and that he had intended to convey to his said wife a reproach of incest with her uncle, William Hammersley, by his manner and insinuations; and the said Bidlake Bray did, in like manner, on the said occasion, admit that he had, both before and after the birth of the said child, declared that he thought she, the said Saba Eliza Bray, did not come a virgin to his bed."

Phillimore and Addams in objection. These articles are inadmissible; they can furnish no useful information; the libel consists of no fewer than 37 articles; they embrace a long period of time, and are very detailed as to acts of cruelty; and two and twenty witnesses have been examined upon them. The Court has never gone so far in admitting evidence of "res inter alios acta;" the [165] verdict at common law against a paramour is allowed to be pleaded in divorce causes, to shew there is no collusion; but even that till latterly was not admitted without much opposition.(a)[1] Another objection is that we shall be compelled to plead the grounds of the verdict and go into a voluminous statement of Mrs. Bray's evidence. In Brisco v. Brisco the wife was charged with adultery; and the Court of Delegates (b) would not allow the proceedings in Winnington v. Winnington (c) to be invoked, in which Winnington was proved guilty of adultery with Lady Brisco.

Dr. Jenner. No. Winnington was proved guilty of adultery with a person supposed to be Lady Brisco.

Per Curiam. The reason is clear: that was another cause to which neither husband nor wife was party.

Argument resumed.

We remember no instance of the introduction of the proceedings in detail as well as of the verdict. Besides, how is this indictment cruelty? It is a proof, as far as it goes, of his attachment to his wife. Again, as to the declarations, it is not pleaded that they were made to Mrs. Bray in person; but, further, these very declarations have already been pleaded in the libel.

Jenner and Lushington contrà. There is a great deal in this case not easy to prove, except from the declarations of the husband [166] made at the time or immediately subsequent; therefore the Court will not easily be induced to reject clear evidence of such declarations. As to the objection "res inter alios acta" in Verelst v. Verelst, the cross-examination at common law was invoked to discredit a witness; (a)[2] here, too, Bray was the party prosecuting, and was examined as a witness. Are not the repetitions of the accusations evidence of cruelty; and can the Court on account of the length of the plea exclude the admissions on oath of the husband that he has made such accusations? It is established that the indictment was unfounded and only brought to put an end to this suit: this is material for the Court to know.

Both on principle and precedent these articles are admissible, especially when the original declarations were made in the absence of witnesses, and the whole passed merely between husband and wife.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The Court would be very unwilling to load unnecessarily the cause with additional matter; but it cannot take upon itself to reject that which bears directly upon the point at issue. Looking, then, at the history contained in the original libel, it is impossible to say that the articles now offered to the Court do not connect themselves with the principal case. The husband accused his wife of the most abominable intercourse that [167] can possibly be conceived—no less than incest with one of her nearest connections: and the indicting her material witnesses for a conspiracy, in order, if he could convict them, to affect their evidence in this suit, must be considered a continuance of that persecution which Mrs. Bray, if the facts stated in the libel are true, has already suffered. The acquittal, therefore, of the parties on that indictment may be important to enable the Court to arrive at a just decision of this case.

The third article is intended to establish not merely a declaration of the husband, but a solemn admission on oath of a part of the charge brought against him, viz. asserting before and after the birth of the child that that child was not his, but the fruit of an incestuous connection between Mrs. Bray and her uncle. Though that may be admitted in the husband's answers to the libel, the wife is not bound to depend on the chance of that admission, coupled with such explanations and qualifications as he may choose to give. It is not, I think, possible to conceive cruelty of a more grievous character (except, perhaps, great personal violence) than the accusation made by this husband against his wife.

As to its being a proceeding in another Court and between other parties, this is surely the last case to which the objection of res inter alios acta can apply, for this is the very act of the party himself—it is his own prosecution, it is an act which he himself has done; and, therefore, he cannot say, "I was not a party to these proceedings, and consequently they ought not to be brought in evidence against me."

Now, in suits for divorce by reason of adultery [168] the action of the husband against the paramour of the wife, if brought in proof against the wife, is res inter alios acta: for the wife is there no party to the action. The case which has been referred to, of Winnington against Winnington, was still more res inter alios acta: for a sentence in that cause could be no evidence in Brisco against Brisco, for neither of the parties in the latter were parties in the former suit.

These additional articles may be very shortly proved; and as it was undertaken that the wife's costs should not be taxed against the husband, de die in diem,(a) but should be reserved to the close of the suit, no objection on that ground can now be raised. If it should turn out that the husband has been guilty of this misconduct towards his wife, he may be liable to costs as between party and party, but the claim to them as between husband and wife is waived for the present.

Under these circumstances I think I am bound to admit the articles, trusting that they will be proved with as little delay as possible.

Additional articles admitted.

[169] PRANKARD v. DEACLE. Arches Court, Hilary Term, 3rd Session, 1828.—Where, on the death of the archdeacon, the proceedings in a criminal suit were moved after the execution of a proxy, but before appearance by the defendant either personally, or by proxy, from the Archidiaconal to the Episcopal Court, and there went on to sentence the original proctor appearing for him but without a new proxy: on appeal—the appellant having been cognizant de facto, of the progress of the suit; and through his proctor in the Court of Appeal, having recognized (by some of the formal documents in the cause) that the proctor in the court below was his lawful proctor, the proceedings are valid; nor is it a fatal objection that the articles were exhibited in the name of the surrogate, and not of the Judge.—Semble, that if no proxy at all were given, the proceedings would not be null unless it were proved that no authority was given de facto to the proctor; and that the principal was ignorant of them. The proxy is only essential to secure the adverse party, and to protect the proctor.—Quære: whether, the Archidiaconal and Episcopal Courts being concurrent, it is any irregularity even in form, on the death of the archdeacon, to invoke the causes in his Court into the Episcopal Court.—Usages of different dioceses, in respect to the exercise of jurisdiction, if not contrary to the general policy of law and to justice, may be said to constitute the law of the particular diocese in that respect.

(a) The principle upon which the costs of the wife are taxed, de die in diem, against the husband is thus stated by Sanchez:—"Quando uxor litem divortii adversus virum intentaret, dubium non est, quin ei alimenta et litis expensæ à viro ministranda sint, ne expensis destituta à causâ cadat." Sanchez, lib. 10, disp. 8, s. 28. Vide also Oughton, tit. 206 and 207.

There is, however, an exception to this rule when the wife has a separate maintenance. Vide Wilson v. Wilson; Davis v. Davis, 2 Consistory Reports, pp. 203, 204.

the parish of Uphill in the said county, and our archdeaconry and jurisdiction, to appear before us, our surrogate, or lawful deputy, or some other competent judge in this behalf, in the Cathedral Church of St. Andrew in Wells aforesaid, and usual place of holding our Consistorial Archidiaconal Court [day and hour], then and there to answer to certain articles of our office to be ministered to him touching and concerning the mere health of his soul, and the correction and reformation of his manners and excesses; and more especially for quarrelling, chiding, and brawling in the parish church of Uphill aforesaid, on the third day of March instant, and for laying violent hands upon the Reverend John Henry Gegg, of the parish of Uphill aforesaid, on the same third day of [170] March in the said parish church, then and there to be exhibited and objected to him at the instance of the Reverend Thomas Deacle, clerk, rector of the rectory of the parish and parish church of Uphill aforesaid, the promoter of our office in this behalf. And further to do and receive as unto law and justice shall appertain, under pain of the law and contempt thereof. Dated at Wells the 8th of March, 1826."

On the 9th of March Mr. Deacle executed a proxy: That, whereas a certain cause or business of office is intended to be commenced in the Consistorial Archidiaconal Court of Wells, promoted by Deacle against Prankard, I, the said Thomas Deacle, have nominated and do hereby nominate Samuel Prat, one of the procurators general of the said Consistorial Archidiaconal Court, to be my true and lawful proctor for me, and in my name to appear before the Reverend Charles Sandiford, clerk, Master of Arts, archdeacon of the said archdeaconry, his surrogate, or lawful deputy, or other competent judge in this behalf, and for me, and in my behalf, to issue, or cause to be issued, the usual citation in the said business to give in articles, to receive the answers of the said Edward Prankard thereto; to produce and examine witnesses thereupon, &c. &c.

On the 14th of March Prat appeared before the Reverend Robert Foster, M.A., surrogate of the archdeacon of Wells, and exhibited this proxy and returned the citation.

On the 24th of March Mr. Prankard, by a proxy duly executed, appointed Thomas Robins, one of the procurators general of the Consistorial Archidiaconal Court of Wells, to be his lawful [171] proctor, and in his name to appear before the archdeacon of Wells in the said Court, his surrogate or lawful deputy, or other competent judge; and in his behalf to receive articles, if any should be offered by Deacle, and to act as proctor until the final determination of the cause, ratifying and confirming whatsoever as his proctor he should lawfully do.

On the 26th of April both proctors (Prat and Robins) appeared before the Reverend Robert Foster, M.A., surrogate of the vicar general of the Lord Bishop of Bath and Wells, and alleged that the Reverend Charles Sandiford, the archdeacon of Wells being dead, the archdeaconry of Wells was void, and prayed; and the Judge, at their petition, decreed the several causes depending in the Consistorial Archidiaconal Court of Wells to be brought into this Court, and proceeded in immediately. They were accordingly brought in by the deputy registrar of the said Consistorial Archidiaconal Court.

On the same day Prat exhibited articles which, on the first session of Trinity Term, viz. the 30th of May, were admitted; and Robins gave a negative issue.

The articles were thus headed:—"In the name of God, Amen. We, Robert Foster, clerk, Master of Arts, surrogate of the Worshipful Richard Beadon, Master of Arts, vicar general and official principal, &c."

In the second and third articles were pleaded the 5 and 6 Edw. VI. c. 4, s. 1 and 2: and the two succeeding articles went on to charge—

"That the said Edward Prankard did upon the 3d of March, 1826, brawl, chide, and quarrel in the [172] parish church of Uphill aforesaid, and did then and there in an angry and passionate manner accuse the said John Henry Gegg of iniquity and injustice when presiding in vestries, and throw your finger close to his face, and say 'this is not my fist;' and did then and there use several other brawling and chiding words and expressions against the said John Henry Gegg. Also that, upon the day and in the church aforesaid he did, in an angry and quarrelsome manner, lay violent hands upon the said John Henry Gegg, by striking him a violent blow on his arm, and by repeatedly pushing his head and shoulder with great violence against the chest and other parts of the body of the said John Henry Gegg."

In the last article it was prayed "That the said Edward Prankard be duly corrected and punished according to the exigency of the law, and be condemned in the costs."

Upon these articles four witnesses were examined; and after informations, the sentence, of which the following extracts are subjoined, was promulged on the 16th of January, 1827:—

"In the name, &c. We, Robert Foster, &c. surrogate, &c. rightly and duly proceeding in a certain cause of office, &c. And the parties lawfully appearing before us in judgment by their proctors respectively, and the proctor of the said Thomas Deacle praying sentence to be given for, and justice to be done to, his party, and the proctor of the said Edward Prankard praying for justice to be done to his party; therefore we, Robert Foster, the surrogate aforesaid, having first maturely deliberated, do pronounce, decree, and declare that the said Edward Prankard did, not only [173] by words quarrel, chide or brawl in the parish church of Uphill on the said 3d day of March last, but did then and there lay violent hands on the said John Henry Gegg; and that the said Edward Prankard hath, by the latter of his said excesses, namely, in having laid violent hands upon the said John Henry Gegg at the time and in the church aforesaid, ipso facto, fallen into and incurred the penalty of excommunication, according to the statute of the fifth and sixth years of the reign of Edward VI. late King of England in that case made and provided; and for and as a person so excommunicated ought to be openly and publicly denounced in the face of the church, and ought to be imprisoned for a time not exceeding six months, according to the statute of the 53d year of the reign of George the Third, late King of England: And we do by these presents decree that the said Edward Prankard be so published and denounced, and that he be imprisoned for the space of fourteen days accordingly: and we do condemn him in the costs of this suit."

From this sentence Prankard appealed to the Court of Arches. The proceedings in that Court are stated in the judgment.

For the appellant, Lushington and Addams. Upon the proof of the articles we offer no objection; but, without referring to the merits of the case, we contend that, on principle, the whole proceedings are irregular and void. A citation issues against Mr. Prankard to appear in the Court of the Archdeacon of Wells: previous to his appearance, but subsequent to his executing a proxy, the archdeacon dies, and all causes then depending [174] before him are removed into the Episcopal Court of Wells by an order of that Court. Articles are there given and the cause proceeds to sentence. There is, however, nothing to shew that Prankard was cognizant of the existence of the suit in that Court: he has no legal summons from it; nor does he give a voluntary appearance in it, and he is not called upon for answers—a decree which, though irregular in these suits, not unfrequently issues from the provincial Courts. Even if a party were shewn to be cognizant in fact, the Court would not conclude him unless he were formally and legally cognizant. In Durant v. Durant (1 Add. 114), where, upon a decree for answers (to an allegation of faculties) personally served on the proctor, the husband was pronounced in contempt for not appearing; this Court held (though it was admitted that the defendant in that case had notice) that the only notice a party was bound to attend to was a service upon himself: "Whatever is to be done personally by the party, absolutely requires in strictness a personal service of the notice or decree for doing it upon the party."

It is clear that, if the proctor had no authority to appear in the Episcopal Court, all acts there done are nullities. This results from the nature of a proxy which is thus restricted by Oughton, "Procurator, generaliter, ad omnia constitutus, nil potest in istis quæ speciale mandatum requirunt; sed factum procuratoris nocet domino in his quæ non excedunt fines mandati" (tit. 48, note 6). Now, upon looking at the proxy given by the appellant [175] to Robins, it will appear that it is confined to the Archidiaconal Court: the whole authority of the proctor was derived from that instrument—he is bound by its terms and cannot exceed its limitations—that is the effect and meaning of a proxy. The invariable practice of exhibiting a new proxy, on an appeal to the Court of Arches, is a strong illustration of this argument.

In this case a concurrency of jurisdiction is not shewn, and it is not to be presumed: there are many archdeacons who enjoy a peculiar jurisdiction; besides, the proofs in a criminal suit should be accurate and precise. Even if it were established that the jurisdictions are concurrent, these proceedings would be null and invalid.

The inconvenience of a different course of practice is quite manifest. Can it be said, for example, that a suit originally instituted in the Court of the Archdeacon of St. Albans could be carried on the death of the archdeacon to the Episcopal Court at Lincoln? And the only difference between such a case and the present arises from the contiguity of the jurisdictions; as it accidentally happens that in this both Courts are held at the same place. The jurisdiction of the King's Bench and Common Pleas is concurrent, yet it cannot be maintained that writs issuing from the former Court are returnable into the latter. Williams v. Bott (1 Hagg. Con. 1), and Thorpe v. Mansell (ibid. 4 (note)), shew the great strictness with which these Courts watch criminal proceedings. In the first case the objection was not taken till after issue had been joined; and in both the objection was of form, [176] and not of essence and substantial justice, and yet it was upheld.

But, further, two objections arise upon the articles themselves: in the first place, they do not set forth the 53 Geo. III. c. 127, the statute under which the sentence would be carried into execution; and, secondly, and principally, they are headed—not in the name of the "Judge," but of the "Surrogate." No instance, we submit, can be adduced of a criminal suit being so instituted. Oughton, in the title—De modo procedendi per accusationem, says: "Si quis crimen commiserit, et de eodem non fuerit præsentatus, vel Episcopus, vel Archidiaconus non processerit contrà eum per Inquisitionem; quælibet tamen persona habet interesse, et Judicis Officium implorare, et voluntariè promovere: et Delinquentem, ad respondendum Articulis, ex Officio Judicis promoto, ministratis, in jus vocare potest, et parti comparenti Articulos (nomine Judicis et ex ejus officio promoto) objicere, et ministrare, et delinquentem accusare" (1 Oughton, tit. 150, § 1, 2). It must then be the office of the Judge that is promoted, and the articles must be given in the name of the "Judge," and not of the "Surrogate."

This objection has been taken in several cases, and always supported. Nicholas v. Ernly (Arches, 1727) was a suit for dilapidations originally brought in the Consistory Court of Sarum, by the patron of the living against the incumbent. Upon the incumbent being dismissed from the suit in the Court below, Nicholas appealed to the Arches; where Dr. Bettesworth (who was at that time the dean), observing that the articles ran in the name of the [177] "Surrogate," said, "he could take no cognizance of them, and sent back the process sealed up." A few years afterwards was the case of Lewis v. Grosvenor (Arches, Hil. Term, 1732)—a suit of defamation by a lady (it was at that time usual to proceed criminally for that offence), which came before the same Judge, on an appeal from Hereford, and was remitted because the articles were in the name of the "Surrogate."

Court. Have you taken any opportunity of examining the sentences to see that these suits were dismissed on that ground?

Argument resumed.

We have not; but the cases are in the handwriting of Dr. Compton; they are copied by him, and it appears that, both in one and in the other, Dr. Bettesworth held the objection fatal and declined entering into the merits.

Jenner and Dodson for the respondent. It is not denied that the cause is of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, nor that the proofs as to the commission of the offence are sufficient. Various objections, however, have been taken in respect to the validity of the proceedings themselves; and we admit they may be taken (as they have now been) at the latest period of the cause, provided the defects complained of materially injure the party and may have been incurable at an earlier period.

First, we apprehend that the appearance of the defendant by his proctor in the Episcopal Court of Wells, and the subsequent proceedings in that Court, and in this, the Court of Appeal (such as bringing up the appeal, suing out an inhibition, giv-[178]-ing a proxy, and exhibiting a libel of appeal, by which the proctor in the Court below is recognized as the lawful proctor of the defendant), have cured the alleged defect of the citation, and removed all the supposed grievances. After such recognitions it cannot be successfully contended by the appellant that he was not cognizant of the progress of the suit in the Court appealed from: and if he were not personally present, it was clear that he was by proxy, and therefore legally present. Williams v. Bott and Thorpe v. Mansell that have been cited, do not apply; nor is Durant's case in point: in that case the husband had no legal personal knowledge of the decree; and the doctrine of this Court has been, since the passing of the 53d Geo. III.

c. 127, that the party should have a clear and positive knowledge (but not in all cases a personal knowledge, if, for instance, wilful absence can be shewn) before the punishment, under that statute, be inflicted upon him. Further, in the absence of any proof to the contrary, it will be presumed that the episcopal and archidiaconal jurisdiction are concurrent: and the invocation of causes, therefore, is not irregular.

Secondly, the use of the surrogate's name has been much pressed as a fatal objection: in reason and principle it does not seem to have been improperly adopted, as he was the Judge de facto.

Thirdly, the 5 and 6 Ed. VI., under which the offence is charged, is set forth in the articles: but the 53d Geo. III. c. 127, § 3, only modifies the punishment; it therefore need not be pleaded, and in the sentence it is noticed. On the whole, we submit that the irregularities, if any, are not of such a character as, at this stage of the cause, to quash the whole proceedings.

[179] In reply it was said that the proxy exhibited in the Court of Appeal has no retrospective effect; that libels of appeal are uniform, and can only fairly be taken as admissions that certain proceedings have been had de facto; and in respect of any presumption as to a concurrency of jurisdiction, or otherwise, a sentence of excommunication surely can never be imposed on mere presumption.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is an appeal from a sentence of the Episcopal Consistorial Court of Wells, in a cause of office instituted against Edward Prankard, for "quarrelling, chiding, and brawling, and laying violent hands upon the Reverend John Henry Gegg, clerk, in the parish church of Uphill, on the 3d of March, 1826." That sentence was delivered on the 16th of January, 1827, declaring that the articles were proved, and imposing the penalties consequent upon the violation of the 5 and 6 Edward VI. c. 4, in some degree altered by the 53 Geo. III. c. 127, § 3. An appeal, however, to the Arches Court of Canterbury was interposed and duly prosecuted, and the case having been argued on a former day, it has now become my duty to pronounce judgment on that appeal.

The transaction, as laid in the articles, took place at a vestry-meeting held in the parish church, and called for the purpose of inspecting the rates and assessments. At this vestry were present the Reverend Mr. Deacle, the rector of the parish; the Reverend Mr. Gegg, who, I apprehend, is the curate; and who has been resident in the parish above twenty years; Hancock, one [180] of the churchwardens; Prankard, the defendant, one of the collectors of the rates, and several other parishioners. Prankard was in possession of the rates, but was unwilling to produce them for inspection, though requested and urged so to do; and it was in the course of this discussion that the brawling and smiting are alleged in the articles to have occurred.

Four witnesses have been examined in support of the charge, and they sufficiently prove it. The first witness is the churchwarden, Mr. Hancock, jun^r^., who thus deposes on the fourth and fifth articles:—

"That, on the 3d of March, 1826, there was a vestry-meeting in the parish church of Uphill, at which he was present, and also Edward Prankard, the defendant, and several other parishioners; that after the notice for the vestry was read Prankard pulled a paper out of his pocket, and said, 'There was the amount of the rates:' on which the Reverend Mr. Gegg asked where the rates were? Prankard, in a loud and angry manner, answered, 'that he would shew the rates in his own hands, but would not let them go out of his hands to any person;' and, shortly afterwards, in an angry and quarrelsome manner, told Gegg that he paid no poor-rates for the house he lived in, and that he (Prankard) was as honest a man as he (Gegg) was; and several times threw his finger close to Gegg's face, upon which Gegg said, 'Don't insult me, you are throwing your fist in my face,' and turned his back towards Prankard, who then said, 'It is not my fist, this is my fist,' clenching his hand, and holding it up before his own face: shortly afterwards Prankard put the rates into Deacle's hands, [181] who delivered them to Gegg, upon which Prankard flew at Gegg, and fell upon him, seizing him by the arm, and endeavouring to get the rates out of his hands, and pinned him against the wall, pushing his head and shoulder against Gegg's breast with great violence, as great as he could, and appeared to be in a very great passion; during which Gegg called out for help two or three times; deponent went to his assistance, and pulled Prankard away by force, who shortly afterwards left the church."

This witness, who was officially present, and attending to the whole proceeding, and who is an indifferent person, is confirmed by the Reverend Mr. Gegg and two other witnesses, so that the unlawful and indecent conduct imputed is fully established. Against these proofs nothing is opposed; the defendant has tendered no allegation, and has not addressed any interrogatories to the witnesses; and, even in argument, it has not been attempted to deny that the case is made out as respects the merits. So far, then, as regards the facts, there is no question nor difficulty.

As little doubt can there be that this is an ecclesiastical offence. The statute of Edward VI. was passed expressly to protect the church and churchyard against being made the scene of these uncharitable and unseemly acts of quarrelling and violence, so ill suited to the place. It is the duty of the Court to enforce the law, which, though of ancient date, is in no degree obsolete nor grown into desuetude; for it has uniformly since been acted upon whenever its violation has been brought to the notice of these Courts. The statute itself has annexed the penalty, viz. for brawling—[182] suspension ab ingressu ecclesiæ: for smiting—excommunication ipso facto; but the subsequent statute, 53 Geo. III., has qualified the punishment of excommunication, and substituted imprisonment, for any time not exceeding six months. It has not, however, given to these Courts the power of carrying into execution, by their own authority, the sentence of imprisonment; but of pronouncing the quantum within the above limit of six months, and of certifying the sentence into Chancery, whence a writ in conformity is to issue. Here, then, the facts being proved, there was a power to have imposed a severer sentence: the Judge, however, has mitigated the penalty by reducing the term to fourteen days. The Court below, therefore, was fully justified on the merits, and no ground of appeal existed; and unless some new objection to the formality of the proceedings be offered, I should pronounce against the appeal, with costs, and remit the cause.

This is the view of the case which the Court is disposed to take upon the merits. Something new, then, must be offered in this Court which was not offered in the Court below. No attempt has been made in this Court by the appellant to palliate the nature of the offence or dispute the sufficiency of the proofs: but, at the very hearing in this, the Court of Appeal, an objection is raised, for the first time, to the form of the proceedings; and it is argued that such an irregularity has found its way into the cause, that the whole is a nullity, and that the party is entitled to a dismissal. This objection is taken, not in respect to any want of jurisdiction on the subject-matter—the offence committed; for that is an objection that may be taken at any time, [183] even after sentence; (a) not upon any informality, by which the substantial justice of the case has been defeated, or which was attended with any injury to the appellant, such as that he had not the full means of defence against the charges; not upon any circumstance which, if irregular, might not have been known and taken advantage of in an earlier stage of the business, either immediately it occurred, or, at all events, before sentence in the Court below, or as a ground of appeal to be stated in the præsertim: but after the party has gone on throughout the whole proceeding in the Court at Wells, of which he was de facto conusant (for it has not been, and cannot be, suggested that he was not conusant), acting by his de facto proctor, who prayed articles, went to sentence, and entered an appeal; after he has proceeded in the Court of Appeal, and regularly appointed a proctor to prosecute the appeal, which proctor brings in the appeal, gives a libel, and goes on to sentence; at the very hearing the objection started is that the defendant was not legally, in point of form, before the Court from which the appeal is brought, the Episcopal Court of Wells.

The proceedings, out of which the objection arises, are contained in the process sent up from the Court of Wells. The first entry in that Court is:—

"Third session, Easter Term, 1826, before Robert Foster, clerk, surrrogate of Richard Beadon, vicar general and official principal of the bishop of Bath and Wells, in the presence of William Parfitt, deputy registrar. Robins and Prat alleged [184] that the archdeacon of Wells was dead, and the archdeaconry vacant, and prayed, and the Judge decreed, the several causes in the Consistorial Archidiaconal Court of Wells to be brought into this Court, and to be proceeded on immediately."

(a) Vide Darby v. Cosens, 1 T. R. 555; and Leman v. Goulty, 3 T. R. 4, as to prohibitions after sentence.

The proceedings were accordingly brought in by the deputy registrar of the Archidiaconal Court. The deputy registrar of both Courts is the same person—Parfitt; and both Courts are held in the same place—the Cathedral Church of Wells. Among the proceedings brought in was the original citation in the suit, described, The Office of the Judge promoted by Deacle v. Prankard (p. 169, supra).

The proxy signed by Deacle is not an immaterial document: it is dated on the 9th of March (p. 170, supra).

On the 14th of March the citation is returned, personally served, and the certificate is continued to the 11th of April, the first session of Easter Term. On that day nothing was done; the archdeacon being dead. These are all the stages of the cause in the Archidiaconal Court of Wells; the remainder of the proceedings were had in the Episcopal Court.

The next instrument is the proxy, dated the 24th of March, from the defendant Prankard to Robins (p. 170, supra).

On the third session of Easter Term, April 26th, Robins appears in the Episcopal Court of Wells for Prankard; exhibits his proxy and prays articles, otherwise his client to be dismissed. The articles are accordingly brought in, and stand upon admission.

[185] On the first session of Trinity Term the articles are admitted; a negative issue is given; and from that time the cause proceeds by the usual steps in the Episcopal Court of Wells, and in this Court: no subsequent irregularity in either Court is suggested.

The first objection taken is that the citation is null, for that, having required an appearance in the Archidiaconal Court, the Episcopal Court had no jurisdiction.

In answer it is said, first, that the citation is not essential to the proceeding if the party appears: the object of it is to bring the party before the Court: if it is irregular he may appear and object—if not served he need not appear at all; but if he appears he waives any objection so far as respects the formality of the citation. In this case he appears by his alleged proctor (whether that proctor was sufficiently authorized I will presently consider), he prays articles, joins issue, goes on to a hearing, appeals, and gives a new proxy in the Court of Appeal. This appearance, if sufficiently authorized, and these steps have then healed any informality in the citation; and bind him to subsequent proceedings.

It is, however, rejoined that the proxy was to appear in the Archidiaconal Court, that there was no authority to appear in the Episcopal Court; and, therefore, that it was no legal appearance. But this is the act of Prankard's own proctor, the person he had intrusted to defend him: and there is no attempt, no affidavit, to shew that the party was ignorant, in fact, of the proceeding; the proctors, the registrar, and the place are the same. If there had been no proxy at [186] all, would that render the proceedings null, unless it could be proved there was no authority de facto, and the principal ignorant that the cause was in progress in the Episcopal Court, and thus had lost the opportunity of defending himself? I know not that such a position has been maintained by any text-writer; and no precedent has been cited. The proxy is not essential, except to secure the adverse party and to protect the proctors; but if the case goes on, and the knowledge of the party is established, I cannot understand that all acts are void. Here, too, there was a proxy, and it has not been, and cannot in common sense be, contended that the authority asserted to be given, and to have been acted on, was not that intended to be given, viz. an authority to defend Prankard from this charge.

But Prankard has, I apprehend, legally recognised that Robins was his proctor in the Episcopal Court; for he has executed a proxy to a proctor of this Court, authorising him to prosecute this appeal, to give in a libel, and to do all other necessary acts, and engaging to ratify and confirm the same.(a) Whatever then has been done here by his proctor is the same as if done by the party.

(a) This proxy was in substance as follows:—

"Whereas there is now depending in the Arches Court of Canterbury a certain cause or business of appeal and complaint of nullity between Edward Prankard, heretofore of the parish of Uphill, in the county of Somerset, in the diocese of Bath and Wells, and province of Canterbury, but since and now of the parish of Wrington, in the same county, diocese and province, the party promoting the said cause or business,

The first act here is the libel of appeal; which, after setting forth that a certain cause of promot-[187]-ing the office of the Worshipful Richard Beadon, M.A., vicar-general, &c., and official principal of the Consistorial Episcopal Court of Wells, at the instance of Deacle against Prankard, was lately depending in the said Court before the Judge aforesaid, thus proceeds in the third article: "That the proctor of the said Edward Prankard believing his party to be very much injured and aggrieved, by and from all and singular the nullities and grievances in the said proceeding, hath rightly and duly appealed."

He had, then, a proctor in the Episcopal Court, and that proctor has duly appealed. The appeal is brought up in supply of proof, and shews who that proctor was.

[188] "In the name of God, Amen. I, Thomas Robins, one of the proctors of the Consistorial Episcopal Court of Wells, the lawful proctor of Edward Prankard, &c., and signed, Thomas Robins."

Here, then, Prankard, by his proctor in this Court, recognizes the fact that his proctor in the Episcopal Court had appealed, and that that proctor was Robins. Surely this removes the objection and estops him from asserting that he was not legally before the Episcopal Court at Wells.

But, secondly, is this—that it was coram non judice—even an objection in form? and is there any irregularity in the proceedings even formally? The general jurisdiction of the diocese is in the bishop, and archdeacons only have that which the bishop chooses to grant out to them. Causes of office, in particular, belong to the bishop, unless specially granted; and there are sufficient grounds to presume, till the contrary is shewn, that, at least, a concurrent jurisdiction was in this case reserved. The archdeacon is termed oculus episcopi, and by general law and primâ facie his duty is to assist the bishop.(a) This presumption is strengthened, in the present instance, by the regularity observed in the mode of invoking the causes; [189] by the style of the Court, "the Consistorial Archidiaconal," by its being held in the same place, by its being frequented by the same proctors, and by its having the of the one part, and the Rev. Thomas Deacle, clerk, rector of the rectory of the parish and parish church of Uphill aforesaid, the party against whom the said cause is promoted, on the other part.

"Now know all men by these presents, that I, the said Edward Prankard, &c. do appoint Edward Toller, the elder, and Edward Toller, the younger, notaries public, &c. to be my true and lawful proctors and proctor for and in my name to appear before the Right Honourable Sir John Nicholl, Knight, &c. and exhibit this my special proxy, and pray and procure the same to be enacted, and in virtue thereof to give a libel, &c. and to receive an allegation or allegations, if any be given, by or on the part and behalf of the said Rev. Thomas Deacle, clerk, &c. and generally to do all and every other act, matter, or thing, that shall or may be necessary or expedient to be done on my behalf in or about the premises until a definitive sentence in writing or final decree shall be had or given in the said cause, &c.; and whatsoever my said proctors or proctor, their or his substitute or substitutes, shall lawfully do or cause to be done herein, I do by virtue of the presents hereby promise to ratify and confirm the same. In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal, the twenty-fifth day of April, in the year of our Lord 1827. "EDWARD PRANKARD."

Signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of us, &c. &c.

(a) The office of the archdeacon is thus described in a letter from Pope Innocent the Third: "Sane consoluit nos tuæ fraternitatis devotio, quid ad officium Archidiaconi debeat pertinere, et in quibus per ipsum cura Episcopalis solicitudinis debeat relevari; et nos prout possumus respondemus:—Archidiaconus (secundum statuta Beati Isidori) imperat Subdiaconis et Levitis; Parochiarum solicitudo, et earum ordinatio ad ipsum pertinet, et audire debet jurgia singulorum. . . . Item in Epistolâ Beati Clementis Papæ Prædecessoris nostri, Oculus Episcopi Archidiaconus appellatur, ut loco Episcopi per Episcopatum prospiciens, quæ corrigenda viderit, corrigat et emendet, nisi adeò fuerint ardua negotia, quod absque majoris suis præsentiâ nequeant terminari." Decret. Greg. lib. 1, tit. 23, c. 7.

And Lindwood says: "Visitationem per modum scrutationis simplicis tanquam Vicarius Episcopi habet Archidiaconus de jure communi, sed in tali scrutatione ut nomine suo correctiones faciat præterquam in levioribus, nisi consuetudo hoc sibi tribuat, jus non habet." Lindwood, De Officio Archidiaconi, p. 49.

same registrar with the Episcopal Court; it is not a foraneous distant jurisdiction. The archdeacon's authority is rather given to relieve than to exclude the bishop; and if he dies, it is for the benefit of the suitors that all proceedings are immediately moved into the Episcopal Court, and that the business goes regularly forward. I can see no impropriety nor inconvenience in such a practice, and no illegality in point of principle; and from what was done without objection taken by the defendant or his proctor, who, as his proctor, appeared and exhibited his proxy in the Episcopal Court, there is sufficient to presume that it is the course and usage of this particular diocese: and it is well known that the different dioceses have their peculiar usages, and those usages, in respect to the exercise of jurisdiction, constitute pretty much the law in the particular case, unless they be contrary to the general policy of the law and to justice.

If, then, there is no irregularity, no nullity, in the Episcopal Court invoking the cause, and becoming a competent jurisdiction, the citation and proxy are both in due form; for the citation runs, "to appear before the archdeacon, his surrogate, [190] or other competent judge," and so also the proxy—"before the archdeacon, his surrogate, or other competent judge." If, by the death of the archdeacon, and the removal of the suits, the chancellor had authority to proceed, he became the competent judge; and Robins, Prankard's proctor, did right in giving an appearance and exhibiting his proxy in the Episcopal Court. It was clearly so understood in that Court, and it appears so to have been understood in the Court of Arches, when the appeal was entered, when the libel of appeal was brought in, and when the new proxy was given: and the objection was only taken at the hearing, it being then clear that there was no possibility of any other defence. I am of opinion, therefore, that though the citation was to appear before the archdeacon, and though the proxy was conformable thereto, the exhibition of that proxy in the Episcopal Court, and an appearance there, after the cause had been invoked, do not, when all the subsequent proceedings are considered, present, at this late stage, an objection which renders the suit from the beginning to the end a mere nullity.

The second objection taken is, that the articles are in the name of the surrogate and not of the Judge, the official principal—"The Reverend Robert Foster, surrogate of Richard Beadon." Now, unless there should be adduced some clear authority holding this to be irregular and illegal, I should deem it to be more correct and proper: for the suit is described as the office of the Judge promoted; the citation is to appear before the Judge or his surrogate, and in this case the office of the Judge is exercised by his surrogate. The whole is done by and before [191] his surrogate; and though it is proper and necessary to insert the name of the Judge whose functions the surrogate is executing, lest the chancellor himself should be unqualified from having no jurisdiction; still the surrogate of the chancellor is the person exercising the office which is promoted—he is, quoad hoc, the Judge.

Unless, then, there can be produced some clear and decided authorities where this has been held a fatal error, I can see no ground to allow the objection. No authority has been quoted from books, nor any dicta of judges, except two cases about a century ago, before Dr. Bettesworth, the then dean of the Arches, of which some slight notes have been referred to in argument—viz. Nicholas v. Ernly in 1727; and Lewis v. Grosvenor in 1732. Both these cases are said to have been dismissed, because the articles were in the name of the surrogate. I have caused a search to be made into the Arches papers, and there is nothing to be collected from those papers to lead me to suppose that the suits were dismissed on the grounds alleged; nor to confirm the statement given in the notes.(a) Lewis v. Grosvenor was a suit for defamation: and

(a) There are two contemporaneous suits, entitled Nicholas v. Ernly: one described as "Causa Appellationis," the other as "Causa Dilapidationis." Nicholas was patron, Ernly was rector of the church: the former suit, as appears from the sentence porrected, was a business of calling in and revoking a faculty for the repairs and alterations of the parsonage. The Court below at Sarum refused so to do; but the Court of Arches reversed that sentence. The other—the "Causa Dilapidationis"—appears to have been an original suit in the Arches, to which Ernly appeared under protest: his protest was allowed, and he was dismissed, but there is nothing to shew that it was a suit of office. Among the papers, however, of the late Dr. Swabey, a note of this case, in though it is not now very usual to make such matters a ground of cri-[192]-minal prosecution, yet formerly, after the twelve months,(a) in which a civil suit could be brought for defamation, had elapsed, it was held that a party could be proceeded against by articles. It seems that this case was quoted by one of the counsel in argument in Austen v. Dugger: it was not noticed in the judgment;(b) but it appears by a note that the counsel, in reply, said "that the judge, whose surrogate gave the articles, was not named at all." This, I admit, would be a good and valid objection, because no jurisdiction is shewn. However, there is so much difficulty [193] in ascertaining what really were the grounds of sentence in either of these causes, that I cannot feel myself in any way bound by them.

The cases decided by my Lord Stowell, which have been quoted, do not come up to the present. In Williams v. Bott (1 Consistory Reports, 1), in the copy of the articles delivered to the defendant, the name of Sir William Wynne was inserted instead of that of Sir William Scott. It was held that the copy was, as respected the defendant, the same as an original, and the objection that the articles were in the name of a person who was not a judge was fatal: Sir William Wynne was not a competent judge—he had no jurisdiction at that time to give articles. I fully concur in that decision, but it does not apply to the present question. So in Thorpe v. Mansell (ibid. 4), the judge, whose office was promoted, was described as "vicar general," and not as "official principal:" now the vicar general is not the proper judge in criminal matters—"in foro contentioso"—the jurisdiction belongs to the official principal. Neither of these cases, to my mind, governs the present.

Upon the whole, I am of opinion that the proceedings are sufficiently regular to compel this Court to affirm the sentence. The case, of itself, is one that calls strongly for the interference of the law for the purpose of maintaining order and decency. I shall, therefore, pronounce against the appeal, and I feel myself bound to condemn the appellant in costs, and to remit the cause. If I have taken a wrong view of the objections, there are two remedies open to the party; either an appeal [194] to a superior tribunal; or an application for a prohibition, if the judge below is moved to issue a significavit, and to enforce his sentence: but, after the best consideration I can give the subject, my judgment is, that for the reasons stated, the sentence just declared is proper.

The Court affirmed the decree, and condemned the appellant in costs.

HAWKES v. HAWKES. Arches Court, Hilary Term, 3rd Session, 1827.—A proxy from a husband in India to institute proceedings in the Court of Exeter against his wife for adultery, held—the wife having changed her residence, before the commencement of the suit, into another diocese—that the Court may proceed, under letters of request from that latter diocese, without a new proxy from the husband.

This was a suit of divorce, by reason of adultery, instituted by the husband against the wife, and which came by letters of request from the Episcopal Consistorial Court the hand-writing of Dr. Audley (at that time at the Bar), has been discovered, and kindly communicated to the editor:—

"Nicholas v. Ernly. Arches, 1726. From Sarum. Appealed from the rejection of articles against a clergyman for dilapidations, promoted by the patron of the living. The articles ran in the name of the surrogate who sat that day. The dean thought this a sufficient reason for the judge below to reject them; and therefore remitted the cause. Dr. Strahan for the appellant, said he saw no reason why the judge who sat might not object articles in his own name, as well as give sentence or sign an excommunication. Note.—The judge below had also rejected the articles because a suit for dilapidations would not lie, but against the executors of an incumbent."

In the case of Lewis v. Grosvenor, from the assignation book, it appears that it was an appeal from a grievance; that a sentence was given pronouncing for the appeal in the grievance; and that the Court retained the cause; and proceeded to a final sentence for the respondent.

(a) Now by the 27th Geo. III. c. 44, § 1, limited to six months.

of Bath and Wells; but it appearing that the proxy which the husband (who was on service in India) had executed was for the commencement of proceedings in the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of Exeter (in whose diocese Mrs. Hawkes was residing at the time instructions for the proxy were transmitted from this country); these facts were now mentioned to the Court, in order to take its opinion on the validity of the present proceedings, when it was stated by the proctor for Major Hawkes that at the period of their commencement Mrs. Hawkes was living within the jurisdiction from whence issued the letters of request.

Per Curiam. Under the circumstances, and on an affidavit that the residence of the wife was changed before this suit was instituted, the Court will hold the proxy sufficient. It may, however, be advisable for the [195] proctor of the husband to send out to India for a fresh authority, which may arrive before I am called upon to sign the sentence; but if it should not, I shall hold that the proxy, which has been exhibited, is valid.

THE OFFICE OF THE JUDGE PROMOTED BY GRIFFITHS v. REED AND HARRY, OTHERWISE HARRIS. Arches Court, Hilary Term, 4th Session, 1828.—In a criminal suit for incest instituted under circumstances indicative of vindictive feelings: sleeping in the same room (conduct which the parties proceeded against had been allowed without objection or complaint to continue for thirteen years), though attended by other facts inducing a strong presumption of guilt, is not sufficient proof of the offence; and the Court, unless most stringent and conclusive evidence be produced, will dismiss the parties; but give no costs.

[Referred to, Rex v. Dibdin, [1910] P. 103.]

This was an appeal from the Episcopal Consistorial Court of Llandaff from an order or decree made on the third day of February, 1825, by the Judge of that Court, whereby he rejected certain articles, and dismissed the defendants from all further observance of justice, in a cause or business of the office of the Judge, promoted by Evan Griffiths against John Reed, of the parish of Wick, in the county of Glamorgan, diocese of Llandaff, and province of Canterbury, and Alice, otherwise Alse Harris, of the same place, spinster, "touching their soul's health, and the reformation of their manners and excesses, and more especially for the crimes of incest, adultery, fornication, and incontinency by them committed."

The parties charged were in the relationship of uncle and niece.

The appeal was not prosecuted till the 21st of January, 1826; and on the by-day of Trinity Term in that year the cause was heard upon the appeal, when, on behalf of the respondents, several objections were made: it was contended that the citation was decreed at the instance of a proctor of the [196] Court from which it issued; that the defendants were cited in one and the same instrument; and that they were articled together; that the articles themselves pleaded, among other irregularities, "notorious suspicion; common fame and report; and great scandal and offence to and among the inhabitants of different parishes [specifying ten by name] and others in the neighbourhood thereof:" and were inadmissible both in form and substance.

The articles were directed to be reformed; and on the fourth session of Michaelmas Term, 1826, they were admitted as reformed. The heading of the articles confined the charge to that of incest; and with a view to substantiate it, the eight first articles pleaded, with great care and minuteness, the genealogy of the defendants, supplying, in some instances, the absence of proper exhibits (owing to the register-books of baptism having been lost or mislaid), by acknowledgments and by general reputation, that the parties in the pedigree were respectively related to each other in the manner set forth.

The ninth articled and objected "that all who commit the respective crimes of incest, adultery, fornication, and incontinency are and ought to be duly and canonically punished according to the exigency of the law."

The tenth—that, notwithstanding the premises pleaded and objected in the several preceding articles, "you the said John Reed, and you the said Alice, otherwise Alse Harry, otherwise Harris,(a) [197] some time in the year 1809 began to live and (a) On the admission of the articles, as reformed, it was objected that the alteration in the name of the defendant Harris (as it stood in the citation and in the articles as originally drawn) from "Harris," singly, to "Harris otherwise Harry," was important and substantial, and in criminal pleadings ought not to be allowed.

cohabit together in a criminal and incestuous manner, and continued so to live and cohabit in the dwelling-house of you the said John Reed, in the said parish of Wick, and whilst Elizabeth Reed, wife of you the said John Reed, now deceased, was living and residing in the said house during great part of the said year 1809, and during the whole or greater part of the two following years, to wit, &c. And we do further article, &c., that you were in the constant habit during the said period of sleeping at nights together and lying naked and alone in one and the same bed, and thereby committed the foul crime of incest."

The eleventh, "that in consequence of the criminal and incestuous intercourse carried on between you, and your carnal knowledge of each [198] other's bodies, you the said Alice, &c., became pregnant, and were, on or about the 18th day of December, 1811, delivered of a female bastard child, since deceased, at the house of you the said John Reed, situate in the parish of Wick aforesaid, and in the county of Glamorgan, which said bastard child was begotten on the body of you the said Alice, &c., by you the said John Reed. And we do further, &c., that the said female bastard child being likely to become chargeable to the said parish of Wick, application was made to you the said John Reed as the reputed father thereof, by or on behalf of the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the said parish, to provide for the support of the said bastard child; that in answer to or upon the occasion of the said application you the said John Reed did admit and confess that you were the father of the said bastard child,(a) and that you did as such, and in that character, on or about the 26th of December, 1811, together with Richard Bevan Reed, of the said parish, gentleman, enter into and sign and execute a certain bond to indemnify David John, George Thomas, and John Dunn, the then churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the said parish of Wick, their successors, and the other parishioners and inhabitants of the said parish, of and from all manner of costs and charges for or by reason of the birth, maintenance, and education of the said female bastard child, although at the earnest re-[199]-quest and entreaty of you the said John Reed the name of you the said John Reed, as the reputed father of the said bastard child, was not mentioned or specified in the said bond."

The article concluded by pleading divers admissions, both during the life of the child, and since its death, that they were respectively the father and mother of the child.

The twelfth pleaded the original bond as an exhibit.

The thirteenth, "that from and after the birth of the said child, and until the present time, you have continued and still do continue to live and cohabit together in a criminal and incestuous manner in the said parish; that during the whole or greater part of the aforesaid period, to wit, during the several years (1812 to 1825 inclusive), and the present year 1826, or at least until the citation issued against you in this cause, you have been living in the same house, and in the constant habit of sleeping at nights together in one and the same bed, and have frequently had the carnal use and knowledge of each other's bodies, and thereby committed the foul crime of incest."

The fourteenth, fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth articles pleaded the usual and

Per Curiam. The Court, however, overruled the objection, and observed that it did not consider the variation material; that, in these Courts, those irregularities only were fatal which might lead to some substantial injustice; that this variation would be productive of no uncertainty nor inconvenience, and the form had been adopted merely to connect the female defendant with the certificate of the entry of her father's marriage, where it appeared that his designation was "Harry;" that in that county "Harry" and "Harris" were the same name, for it had become usual, with the present generation, to add the final "s," thus "David" became "Davis," "Jenkin" "Jenkins," "John" "Jones;" that if advantages were taken of such slight informalities in County Courts, it would be hardly possible to succeed in criminal suits; that it was important to public morals that such a scandal, if it existed, should be suppressed; and therefore admitted the articles, reserving to the party any advantage from want of proof of identity.

(a) This averment was negatived by the evidence of George Thomas and John Dunn, the two parish officers. Thomas deposed that "Reed did not then or ever to the deponent acknowledge that he was the father of such child;" and the evidence of Dunn was to the same effect.

formal averments, and the articles concluded by praying that the defendants "might be duly and canonically punished and corrected according to the exigency of the law, and be condemned in the costs of the complainant."

To these articles a responsive allegation was given on the part of the defendants, and admitted without opposition. The substance of this plea may be gathered from the judgment of the Court.

Twelve witnesses were examined in support of [200] the articles and exhibits, and thirteen upon the allegation; and the argument principally turned upon the credit due to the testimony of Ann Lewis, the only witness, examined by the promovent, who spoke directly to acts of criminal familiarity; and whether the Court could act on the evidence of a single witness, though corroborated by circumstances of strong suspicion.

Lushington and Addams contended that the exception taken to Lewis was to her character, and not to her evidence; and that after interrogatories had been administered the ancient doctrine of these Courts was, that the witness was not open to exception. Her evidence also was probable in itself, and consistent with the admitted facts in the cause; though it was true, therefore, that she was a single witness, yet her evidence being corroborated, was sufficient to make out the charge: this had been decided in the case of Wheatley v. Fowler, on an appeal from Norwich, where the appellant (the original defendant) had been articled against for adultery, and found guilty on the evidence of a particeps criminis in conjunction with some corroborating circumstances. In the Arches the judgment of the Court below was sustained, and these concurrent sentences were afterwards affirmed, with 100l. costs, by the High Court of Delegates.(a)[1]

Jenner and Haggard for the respondents, argued that in a criminal suit the asserter of the charge was bound to establish it; and that, more especially in a case of this description, where the proofs should be strict and full in proportion to the enormity of the accusation, and the penal consequences [201] it involved. Here the proof of the charge rested on the sole testimony of a witness who had discredited herself, and whose character and evidence were completely destroyed.

In respect to the case of Wheatley v. Fowler, it appeared that Wheatley, a Methodist preacher at Norwich, was articled against by Fowler for adultery and fornication with Fowler's daughter, Mary Mason (before her marriage), and for other excesses; that Mason having been previously prosecuted, had, upon the confession of the crime, been enjoined penance;(a)[2] and that this was alleged and admitted when she was produced on a compulsory, in support of the articles; and that interrogatories were addressed to her. The corroborating circumstances, too, in that case were: that on two several occasions Wheatley acknowledged to Paul and Keymer, two of the elders of his congregation, and who were examined on the articles, that the charges were well founded. He had also been seen in most indecent postures with three other women; and displaying his own person, and theirs, in a most offensive manner.(b)

In that case, then, the witness, previous to her examination, had been restored to credit, and that in confirmation of her evidence there was fortissima probatio—the confession of the party himself.

[202] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The full argument, which the Court has heard, has brought the true point of this case into so narrow a compass that it is unnecessary to state either the proceedings, or the evidence at any length. It is a suit for incest brought against the two defendants, Reed and Harris, who stand towards each other in the relation of uncle and niece: the relationship is fully established; it is not indeed denied that Alice Harris is the daughter of Reed's sister; and the only question then is, whether the incestuous intercourse is proved.

It has been justly observed that the charge, if true, is highly criminal and scandalous; that it would subject the party to a severe punishment—to excommunica-

(a)[1] Wheatley v. Fowler, Delegates, 1758.

(a)[2] The Court of Arches rejected, with 50l. costs, an allegation exceptive to the credit of Mary Mason, in which it was alleged "that she had not performed any public or private penance for the crime of pretended adultery which she had confessed to have committed."

(b) The defendant was enjoined a solemn and public penance, to be performed in a linen cloth with a paper writing, denoting his crimes, fixed on his breast, in the usual manner.

tion, which, by a late act (53 Geo. III. c. 127, s. 3), is commuted for "such imprisonment, not exceeding six months, as the Court, pronouncing or declaring a person excommunicate, shall direct;" and that, therefore, the proof of the charge must be clear and full.

The incestuous connection is alleged to have commenced in 1809, and to have continued till the promotion of the present suit. During a part of the time Reed's wife was living, and in the same house, so that there was adultery aggravating the incest; that circumstance increases the demand for proof by diminishing the probability of the fact. It may seem strange that if this infamous connection had been so long subsisting—for fifteen years—no person in the neighbourhood should sooner have attempted to abate the scandalous and [203] offensive nuisance; and that the suit should remain to be at last brought by an attorney, living at four or five miles distance, between whom and the uncle there had been various litigations on other subjects. It may happen that the uncle, though a gentleman of some property, may be more immediately surrounded by persons of lower degree not very ready to take up such a matter—for instance, his tenants or farmers—that he may have little or no intercourse except with his inferiors, who, even if their notions of decency were outraged, might not choose to engage in litigation with him. The suit certainly does not appear to have been brought at last free and clear from a suspicion of other motives than a wounded sense of moral feeling. These considerations, in several views, do not diminish the necessity of strict proof.

That any act of criminal intercourse was ever seen is not suggested; no indecent familiarity; no personal liberty; nothing which, in proceedings of a different nature, is termed a proximate act is alleged; but it is fully proved that for fifteen years Reed and Harris slept in the same room, in which however there were two beds.

There is indeed one witness, and one witness only, who deposes that they slept constantly in one and the same bed, and that she had seen them in bed together; that witness is a woman of the name of Ann Lewis, who deposes that about ten years ago (about 1817) she went to live in Reed's service as maid of all work; she lived there about seven years, and that during the whole period Reed and Harris slept in one and the same bed together every night. She adds particular reasons [204] for believing criminal acts, and states "that she has frequently seen them in bed together."

If this witness is believed, her evidence, slightly corroborated by circumstances, would afford a sufficient proof of the crime: but her credit and character have been excepted to in plea; and two witnesses have been examined who, "having heard her give evidence at Cardiff on the inquiry [an inquiry arising out of a dispute between Reed and Griffiths, the parties in this suit], do not hesitate to depose that Ann Lewis is a person not to be believed on her oath." In that cause Griffiths failed, and Reed recovered against him damages to the amount of 150l. Now this goes far to remove the testimony of Ann Lewis out of the case.

I may also mention that this witness, it appears, after she had quitted Reed's service, became servant to Griffiths: but this is not all; she positively asserts that they slept constantly and openly together, "the same as if they had been husband and wife;" she does not even mention that there was a second bed in the room; but there are other witnesses produced, two by Griffiths himself, who had been Reed's servants, Leyson and Hopkins, deposing that they, Reed and Harris, "slept in separate beds, and that they never had any reason to believe that they slept in the same bed."

These witnesses were not in Reed's service at the same time with Ann Lewis; but there is a witness produced by the defendants, Mary Evan, who was Reed's servant for six months, and who was there a considerable time with Ann Lewis; for she states that Ann Lewis, not being able to get a place, was allowed, from charity, to remain at Reed's [205] during the winter, and Evan's testimony is that there were two beds—that each was slept in, and "she has no doubt that Reed slept in one, and Harris in the other, and she has no reason to believe or suspect that they were ever criminally connected."

It is difficult to reconcile Ann Lewis and Mary Evan—which tells the truth, or what degree of credit is due to either, need not be decided: the burden of proof lies on the promovent, and it may be difficult to place great confidence in many of the witnesses; but looking to all the preceding circumstances respecting Ann Lewis' credit, and to the whole tone and tenor of her deposition, I am of opinion she is a witness to be laid very much, if not altogether, out of the case.

Is there, then, other evidence upon which the Court can convict the defendants? There are facts which cannot be denied exciting suspicion—violent suspicion—of the crime charged. The very circumstance of their sleeping in the same room, even in separate beds, is scandalously indecent, unless under the pressure of absolute necessity from extreme illness or abject poverty. The latter excuse cannot be set up. Reed is stated to be a man of property; his house had several rooms in it with beds in them; but what is the defence and explanation?

In 1809 Reed had a violent paralytic attack, was extremely ill, probably in some danger for a time, and in a senseless state: his wife suffered something of a similar attack about the same time: she, therefore, could not attend him; on the contrary, she required the maid-servant to attend her. In this distress the niece was sent for [206] to assist in waiting upon her uncle, the defendant, and Mrs. Reed was very glad of her arrival.

Thus far there arises no suspicion, and there might be no impropriety so long as the violence of the paralytic attack continued unabated: though, considering that the niece was a spinster of thirty-three years of age, and that the uncle was only about sixty, perhaps a married woman of the village of more advanced age might have been a person more proper and decent to attend him as nurse, to sleep in his room, and to do all offices required for him; but it might be pushing refinement and delicacy too far to impute any suspicion to this commencement of her sleeping in his room.

But the violence of this particular attack, which (so long as it continued undiminished) extinguished suspicion, was soon got over: he recovered; he never had a second attack; he was restored so far as to be able to walk about the village with a stick; to ride on horseback, being assisted on and off; to ride to market, sometimes attended, sometimes alone: he could go to Cardiff to be present at the writ of inquiry, nay, he seems to have gone to the assizes at Hereford, a distance of sixty or seventy miles. Whether he had any person on these occasions to sleep in his room does not appear, but it is in no degree made out that his bodily infirmities were such as to justify the indecency of having a young female to sleep constantly in his room. If he required any assistance in the night, either to administer medicines (which is not proved) or for any other purpose, the unseemly indelicacy might have been avoided by the female sleeping in some other [207] room, and by having a bell put up, instead of his knocking or poking with his stick; for if Alice Harris were hard of hearing, the other servants were not. The mere fact then of her sleeping in the same room, though in another bed—she about thirty-three, he about sixty—is, of itself, not only indecorous but suspicious; but this suspicion becomes extremely violent when some other admitted facts are adverted to.

On the 18th of December, 1811, Alice Harris was delivered of a female child, who died in infancy: she removed into another room—the best room—only for the purpose of lying in; and as soon as her confinement was over she returned to sleep in Reed's room: during her absence no other person slept in his room, the necessity was not sufficiently urgent to require any person, as far as appears by the evidence of Leyson. The parish officers were on the alert to get the child sworn in order that the parish might not be burdened with the maintenance of it: Reed prevented this, and a joint bond, from his son and himself, was given to the parish. This bond was at first objected to because the father of the child was not named; but upon its being re-executed and attested by a neighbouring attorney-at-law, the bond was accepted.

There is no evidence that at that time Reed acknowledged himself expressly to be the father of the child, nor that he or Alice Harris has since so acknowledged, except the testimony of Ann Lewis, to whom I cannot venture to give any credit on that circumstance: but these facts lead to a violent suspicion that Reed was the father, and that suspicion is much strengthened by no other father [208] being assigned to this moment. It is suggested that there might be reasons for not disclosing the father; and that young Reed, the son, might be the person. No satisfactory reason can be advanced sufficient to counterbalance the odium and scandal of allowing the suspicion to remain that this child was the fruit of an incestuous connection between the uncle and niece. If young Reed were the father there is no incest; he was only her cousin; but neither the facts nor the conduct of the parties support such an explanation: there is no proof that the son was living at home; there is no proof of any resentment shewn towards either the son or the niece on account of this child; on the contrary, the father and son join in the bond; the niece remains in the house; she is allowed to be confined in the best bed-room, and as soon as she recovers she returns to sleep in the bed-room of her uncle; and even now, when prosecuted for incest, no other father of the child is set up or suggested, though it would have been a complete defence to the strongest circumstance in the charge.

If the parish officers had been as alert in supporting the moral character and public decency of their parish (of which the churchwardens are to a certain degree the guardians) as they were in protecting the parish against the maintenance of the child; and if they had at that time brought a suit, recenti facto, to put an end to this scandal and nuisance; and in defence there had been no other father assigned, the circumstances might have gone far to establish the actual incestuous connection. But when neither parish officers nor respectable neighbours come forward; when the matter is allowed to rest for thirteen years, and is at last taken [209] up under the feelings and occurrences that attended the commencement of the present suit; (a)[1] when all the witnesses who where servants in the house, with the single exception of Ann Lewis, swear they never saw any indecency, nor any thing to lead them to suppose that the defendants did not occupy separate beds—when they will not depose even to a belief of a criminal intercourse—it is possible that no act of incest may have taken place; and that this highly suspicious and indecorous course of conduct may have gone on from not entertaining a due feeling of its impropriety; it is possible that the uncle, having no sense of decency nor regard for his own character, nor for that of his niece (whose reputation was already destroyed by the birth of this child), might persevere in setting public opinion, and the scandal of the example, at defiance, rather than forego the convenience of having her to sleep in his room. This is possible; and I can hardly venture on the present evidence to decide that the charge is proved—a decision which would impose upon the Court the duty of pronouncing excommunicated, and through the medium of a significavit of consigning to a prison for a period not exceeding six months, both the niece and this old man, now at the age of seventy-[210]-six years, and under very great bodily infirmities: he is too near the grave for such a step, if an imperative duty does not call upon the Court to take it.

But although I shall dismiss the parties, I shall certainly not dismiss them with costs. Here is a violent presumption proved. The old rule of practice as laid down by Clarke is, that if neither the charge, the "crimen objectum," nor violent suspicion of the charge, "vehementes præsumptiones criminis objecti," be proved, the party accused shall be dismissed with costs, unà cum suis expensis; but if public fame or vehement presumptions are proved, and the defendant be required to produce compurgators (ob quas purgatio indicta fuerit), then the defendant may be condemned in costs. (a)[2]

The "purgatio indicenda" is now a practice become obsolete; and the matter of costs is left much in the discretion of the Court, upon a just consideration of all the circumstances of the case. If this suit had been brought by the parish officers, or by some neighbour apparently from a sense of moral duty, I might have felt myself bound to adopt the latter rule, and to have condemned the defendants in costs; for here is a vehement suspicion proved. But remembering how many years have been allowed to elapse—remembering also the occurrences which manifestly induced the bringing of this suit, I shall arrive nearest at the justice of the case by dismissing the defendants, leaving each party to the payment of their own costs.

(a)[1] It was proved that in an action of trespass brought by Reed against Griffiths and others, and which stood for trial at the Summer Great Sessions for the county of Glamorgan in 1824, the defendants withdrew their plea, and suffered judgment to go by default; and that a writ of inquiry was afterwards executed before the Sheriff and a jury, when the damages were assessed at 150l., besides the costs. It was also proved that in June, 1824, a suit of the same nature as the present had been instituted in the Court of Llandaff, at the promotion of William Rees (at that time servant to Griffiths), against the same defendants; from which they were dismissed.

[211] PARKER v. HICKMOTT AND PARKER. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 1st Session, 1828.—On the testator's death an alteration appearing in a will which, during his lifetime, was in the custody of the writer (one of the executors), who swore such alteration was made with the testator's concurrence, but gave no further explanation, and declined to propound the will so altered, the Court will assign the executors to take out probate of the will in its original state, the residuary legatees on being personally cited to propound the will, or to shew cause, &c., not appearing.

On motion.

John Parker, late of Seven-Oaks, died in the month of May, 1827, leaving a will regularly attested, and dated 11th of December, 1826, whereby he devised his freehold estate to his brother Henry Parker, charged with an annuity of 25l. to his (John Parker's) wife for her life. He also, among other bequests and legacies, gave to his wife a legacy of 1000l. The deceased appointed his brother Henry Parker and William Hickmott executors.

The will was written by Henry Parker, who had the custody of it during the life of his deceased brother. On the will being produced there was a manifest alteration of the widow's legacy, the words one thousand having been erased, and the words six hundred written upon the erasure.

Henry Parker stated in an affidavit that the legacy was reduced by the desire and with the concurrence of the testator; but gave no further explanation.

[212] A caveat having been entered on the part of the widow; the same was warned: but the proctor for the executors having declined to propound the will in its present state, a decree issued at the instance of the widow against the residuary legatees (Henry Parker being one), citing them to propound it in that manner, or to shew cause why the executors should not be assigned to extract a probate of the will as originally written, with the said legacy of 1000l. reinstated.

This decree having been personally served; and no appearance given—

Jenner on behalf of Mrs. Parker, moved the Court accordingly; and that the costs of the widow should be paid out of the estate.

Per Curiam. It is not stated when the erasure was made: but there being no party before the Court who prays probate of this will with the alterations; and a decree with intimation, issued under seal of the Court, having been personally served, I shall allow the probate to pass agreeably to the tenor of the decree; and direct the costs of the widow to be paid out of the estate.

Motion granted.

IN THE GOODS OF JOHN HOWE. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 1st Session, 1828.—When pencil alterations are inferred to be deliberative, probate in common form will be granted of the paper, without such alterations; the only party materially injured by such grant having executed a proxy of consent.

On motion.

John Howe, late of Hoxton, died on the 25th of November, 1825. By his will duly made and [213] executed on the 27th of April, 1824, he appointed John Faulkner and James Hall executors. Ann Elizabeth Buckle, spinster (now the wife of George Passingham), was the residuary legatee.

On the 24th of November, 1827, the testator was attacked with paralysis, and continued insensible till his death on the following day. The will was found by Mr. Faulkner (within a few hours of the deceased's death) locked up in a cupboard with his plate and other articles of value, and with his papers of moment and concern. The will was in an envelope with the seal broken. Upon being opened, several erasures and interlineations made in pencil, and very indistinct, were discovered; and it was presumed they were made by the deceased, who had informed Mr. Faulkner that he contemplated some alterations in his will. These alterations were, with the single exception of an increase of a legacy of 75l. to 100l. to one of his nephews, in favour of the residuary legatee. The property of the deceased was under 2000l.

Addams moved that probate should be granted to the executors without the pencil marks; the residuary legatee having consented and executed a proxy to that effect.

Motion granted.

[214] ARBERY v. ASHE. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 1st Session, 1828.—The Court will not at once reject an allegation propounding a will, which sounds to folly when facts are pleaded, shewing that the deceased, up to his death, conducted himself in the ordinary concerns of life as a sane man.

On the admission of an allegation.

The Reverend Robert Hoadly Ashe, late of Crewkerne in the county of Somerset, died in May, 1826, leaving a widow (since dead) and several children. In June following, letters of administration, as if he were dead intestate, were granted by this Court to Charlotte Hoadly Ashe, spinster, one of his natural and lawful children. In September last a decree was extracted at the suit of Elizabeth Arbery (wife of John Arbery of Weymouth) calling upon Miss Ashe to bring in the letters of administration, and to shew cause why the same should not be revoked; and administration, with a will (as asserted) of the deceased annexed, be granted to her as the universal legatee.

In support of this paper an allegation, consisting of ten articles of the following effect, had been brought in; and its admissibility was now debated.

1. That the deceased died at the age of seventy-five, leaving a widow and Charlotte Hoadly Ashe, spinster, and others his natural, lawful, and only children; that he was rector of Misterton in the county of Somerset, and also perpetual curate of Crewkerne in the said county; and had so been from 1775; that the widow and children of the deceased, save William Hoadly Ashe (one of his [215] said children), quarrelled with the deceased about sixteen years before his death, and during all that period resided separate and apart from him, and to the time of his death were never reconciled to, nor had any communication with, him; that his property amounted to 1500l.; and that the widow and the deceased's children were possessed of property entirely independent of him.

The second pleaded that William Hoadly Ashe resided at Crewkerne with his father (the deceased), who manifested on all occasions the most parental affection for him; that from and after the death of the said W. H. Ashe, who died at Crewkerne on 4th February, 1818, the deceased (Dr. Ashe) often declared, in the presence of divers credible witnesses, "that his family, meaning his wife and children, should never benefit by him; should have none of his property; and that he would rather give it to a stranger:" and he also often declared he intended to bequeath his property to Mrs. Arbery.

The third—after pleading the factum of the will; and that it was in the deceased's own hand-writing—"that the deceased did, on the day of the date thereof, after he had drawn and prepared the will, walk to the Swan Inn in the village of Misterton (at that time and now kept by Mary Rendell, the aunt of the party proponent), where he had been in the habit, for upwards of fourteen years, of visiting and holding his annual audit, and receiving his tithes; that after he had arrived at the inn he took out of his pocket his said will, and then, in the presence of several persons, signed it, and published and declared the same to be his last will and testament." The article then pleaded the [216] attestation, and that the deceased was of sound mind.

The fourth—that after the execution of his will he folded it up in an envelope, which he sealed and addressed to Mrs. Arbery; and then left it in the custody of her cousin, Susan Rendell—and requested it might be given to the said Elizabeth Arbery; which was accordingly done.

The fifth pleaded the great age and blindness of Mrs. Rendell; and that on the day aforesaid the deceased also brought with him a paper-writing, which he said required to be signed by the churchwarden of Misterton, for procuring an allowance for her from the Blind Institution in London, and that the deceased had been in the habit of preparing for her similar papers for many years.

The sixth pleaded the hand-writing of the instrument propounded.

The seventh—"that the deceased, some time after he had so executed his will, whilst conversing with Mrs. Arbery respecting it, expressed himself, in the presence of credible witnesses, as follows:—'I never will make another will, as I am a minister of the gospel; and mind, as soon as I am dead, that you come and take possession of your property.'"

It was also pleaded that the deceased, though somewhat eccentric in his conversation and habits, was at all times, till his death, of sound mind; that for fifteen years preceding, and for some time after, the making his will he invariably performed divine service, preached, administered the holy sacrament, and did all the duties of incumbent of Crewkerne and Misterton, and managed all his own concerns.

[217] The ninth—that neither the party proponent, nor her husband, heard of the death of the testator until some time in June last, when she was informed that letters of administration to his effects had been granted to Charlotte Hoadly Ashe, the other party in this cause, who had possessed herself of his property.

Lushington for the allegation.

Dodson contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The paper propounded in this cause is a most extraordinary one; more especially with reference to the deceased, and considering his condition and station in life. It is in these terms:—

I promise & swear that I will give all my Plate—Watch & Seals—Rings and all that I have in the World—at my decease—
I promise & swear that I will give Elizabeth Arbery—at my Decease—all that I have in this world or ever shall have in wtaver in money or lands—

ROBT. HOADLY = ASHE D.D.

Witness our hands, Elizabeth Cleal, Martha Rendell.
Dec. 14th, 1824.

A paper couched in these strange terms, and written in this strange manner, coming from a person of education raises a great doubt, whether it could have been the offspring of his mind when sound. The custody also of the paper, when sent to Mrs. Arbery, has been careless; for it is in a very torn and shattered state: this shews that [218] she had no great confidence in its validity; and the delay of twenty-one months in producing it leads to the same inference. The whole proves that Mrs. Arbery has a very arduous case to make out, in order to establish that the deceased was of sound mind at the time of the execution; still I do not know that the Court, on the face of the paper, can positively pronounce that he was not so. Mrs. Arbery may, perhaps, do well to consider whether she will not give up the pursuit. It may be of some benefit for her to relinquish this paper: in persisting in this undertaking she will incur a considerable risk of expence, as, if it is shewn that he was insane at any previous time, the appearance of the paper itself may be sufficient to condemn it.

There may, however, be facts accounting for the disposition. It is pleaded that his family had a separate and independent provision—though its nature or amount is not stated; nor does the allegation describe what was the sort of intimacy the deceased kept up with Mrs. Arbery, nor give any reason why she was selected as the object of his bounty. It is also pleaded that he brought this paper to the place where he usually held his audit, and there he executed it: there is nothing extraordinary or unnatural, perhaps, that he should direct it to be delivered to the party benefited. It is also alleged that he subsequently recognized it as his will, and declared he would make no other; and it is further pleaded that after the execution of it he continued to perform divine service in the parish church, and to administer the sacraments.

The whole tenor and shape of the paper very [219] strongly "sounds to folly." Swinburne—in the passage that has been quoted—thus states the law: "If in the testament there be a mixture of wisdom and folly, it is to be presumed that the same was made during the testator's frenzy, insomuch that if there be but one word sounding to folly, it is presumed that the testator was not of sound mind and memory when he made the same."(a) Such is the doctrine of Swinburne; but it applies only to the case of a person who is sometimes sane and sometimes insane; and of whose state when he wrote his will there is no direct proof. I cannot, therefore, on the face of the paper, reject it at once, and pronounce the man insane in opposition to such conduct in life as I have before referred to; but I strongly recommend an arrangement out of Court.

As in cases of married women there should be some security for costs, the husband must, of course, join in the proxy, more especially here where the woman is in a low condition of life, and the property amounts in value to 1500l.

Allegation admitted.

In the Goods of Armine Anne Dyer. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 2nd Session, 1828.—Probate may be granted in common form of a will written entirely in pencil by the deceased, who, a few days before death, declared she wished it to operate, unless altered.

On motion.

The deceased, on the 26th of December, 1827, died at the age of about 80 years, a spinster, [220] possessed of personal property amounting to 3000l. She left four persons entitled in distribution in case of an intestacy.

On the 20th of December, and on a subsequent day, the deceased spoke of her will—described where it would be found—and said that she had appointed her nephew executor; and that she intended the same should operate unless she altered it. Upon her death, a few days afterwards, a will, written in pencil, entirely in the handwriting of the deceased, and dated on the 21st of July, 1823, was found in conformity with her declarations.

Lushington on affidavits of these facts moved that the paper should be admitted to probate.

Per Curiam. By granting this motion the Court will, of course, not preclude any one interested in the property from contesting this paper at a future period; but if the contents of these affidavits are true (and the Court has no reason for doubting them), the paper is clearly valid. The application, however, would have been stronger if it had been accompanied by the consent of those interested under a prior will, and who may be prejudiced by its revocation.

Motion granted.

[221] Stanley v. Bernes. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 2nd Session, 1828.—In an administration, pendente lite, limited to recover certain sums, and granted jointly to the nominees of the two parties in the suit, the Court will not dispense with such administrators entering into a joint bond.

[See further, 1830, 3 Hagg. Ecc. 373.]

On motion.

This was an application to the Court by both parties to grant an administration, pendente lite, jointly to James Campbell, agent of Mr. Bernes, and William Collins, agent of Mr. Stanley, and limited to recover the sum of 14,800l. due to the estate of John Stanley, the deceased; of which 6900l. were due from Mr. Campbell, and 7900l. from Baring Brothers and Company; and also to receive the dividends on certain stock standing in the deceased's name; and the Court was further asked to permit the administrators, instead of entering into a joint administration bond for the property, so limited, to enter into separate bonds, each to the amount only of a moiety of the limited property.

Lushington and Addams, counsel for Mr. Stanley.

Jenner and Phillimore for Mr. Bernes.

Per Curiam. The state of the property renders such an administration necessary. Many of the facts are pleaded to have occurred, and must be enquired into, in a foreign country; and, consequently, much time may elapse before the case is heard. The administration, however, should be limited, not only to recover and to receive the several sums, but also to invest them in the public funds.

The prayer that the administrators may give [222] separate bonds is quite a novel application—I can see no necessity for it, nor would any advantage result, because administrators must always act jointly; they cannot, like executors, act independently. The Court, therefore, can discover no reason for departing from the rule hitherto universally observed. Administrators, pendente lite, are the appointees of the Court, and are not to be merely considered as the nominees, or agents, of the several parties on whose recommendation they are selected.

Limited administration decreed—the usual security being given.

In the Goods of John Herne. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 2nd Session, 1828.—Administration with a paper annexed, wherein were sundry alterations in the body, a blank left for the date, and which appeared, from internal evidence, to have been written more than nine years before death, and was endorsed "outline of the will," cannot be granted, in common form, on the exhibition of a proxy of consent from all interested under an intestacy, there being no evidence to rebut the presumption that the paper was deliberative.

On motion.

John Herne, formerly of Islington, in the county of Middlesex, but late of Woolstone in the county of Warwick, died a bachelor on the 1st of December, 1827, leaving Mary Whiteman, wife of William Whiteman, and Elizabeth Davis, widow, his natural and lawful sisters, and only next of kin, who, with four nephews, the children of a deceased sister, Eleanor Johnson, were the only persons entitled in distribution to his personal estate, of the value of between 4000l. and 5000l.

[223] After his death a paper, of which the following is a copy, was found :—

(Endorsed.)

Outline of the Will of John Herne of Islington in the County of Middlesex 3rd Jan^y 1818.

The search among the deceased's papers, the finding, the hand-writing, the interlineations, signature, endorsement, and that no other testamentary paper could be discovered, were fully set forth in affidavits; and proxies from Mrs. Whiteman and her husband; from Mrs. Davis; and from two of the nephews were exhibited, consenting that administration, with the paper annexed, should be granted, in common form, to Michael and Charles Johnson, the other two nephews.

It also appeared that the sole executor died in the life-time of the deceased.

Nicholl in support of the motion. The body of this paper is dispositive, and any variation from the usual form may be accounted for by the apparent want of education in the writer. A difficulty arises on the face of the paper from the interlineations—the omission of a date in the body of the instrument—and the use of the words "outline of the will" in the endorsement; but the doubt, arising from [225] these circumstances, is rebutted by the care with which the paper was preserved. "Outline of" does not point to the intention of any subsequent act so strongly as either "plan designed for" in Mathews v. Warner; (a)[2] or "what I purpose to be" in Roose v. Moulsdale (1 Addams, 129); it is tantamount to "this is my will expressed summarily :" and though a proxy of consent only dispenses with formal evidence, yet, where the case is nearly in equilibrio, it will be of some avail as shewing the opinion of those best acquainted with the deceased's intentions.

Per Curiam. I cannot, consistently with the rules laid down on former occasions, grant this motion.(c) The rule is this: if an imperfect paper is supported by affidavits stating facts which, if established by plea and proof, would render the paper valid, that then, on a proxy of consent, the Court will grant its probate. In the present instance the affidavits do not furnish sufficient facts. The instrument, on the face of it, is imperfect, and even converted into a deliberative paper by the deceased himself: true it is that it is signed, but when—does not appear—there is a blank left for the date. The inference is that, when he signed it, he intended to do something more, and that his signature was placed there when it was first written. It is now in a different state from what it originally was—it then was in the first person throughout down to the very last para-[226]-graph, it was afterwards changed to the third person, and, on the outside, are these words :—

"Outline of the will of John Herne of Islington in the county of Middlesex, 3d Jan^{y} 1818."

It, therefore, is probable, on the face of it, that when this endorsement was made the paper was intended only to be deliberative; even this is nine years before his death, and, from the erasure of Aaron Herne's name, and the interlineation above, it appears that it was written some time previous to the 20th December, 1817: consequently it is to be inferred that the deceased did not intend it to take effect in its present form. This is the presumption of law in every unfinished paper, and that presumption is always held to be strengthened when the paper, as in the present instance, purports to dispose not only of personal, but also of real, property, as to which it clearly must be inefficient. Some recent recognition would then be necessary to render it operative: if it could be shewn that shortly before his death he had so referred to it as an existing will, that his intention would be carried down to that time, the case would be altered; but there is nothing of the kind later than the date. The affidavits only allege that it is in the hand-writing of the deceased, and was found among a bundle of papers in a box; but that it was not known how long it had remained there.

It would then be too much, on the consent of parties—not aware perhaps of their interests—to allow the administration with this paper annexed [227] to pass the seal. The Court is bound to protect those who may give an unguarded consent. To grant this motion would not only be going further than precedents authorize the Court, but would be a departure from them, and from principle. I therefore reject the motion.

Motion rejected.

ROSS, OTHERWISE RUSS v. CHESTER. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 2nd Session, 1828.—If no suspicion of fraud exists, a will—consistent with previous affection, and declarations, and supported by recognitions and circumstances shewing volition and capacity—is valid, though made in extremis, and though the instructions were conveyed through the party benefited.

[Applied, Fairtlough v. Fairtlough, 1839, Milw. 36. Referred to, Davies v. Gregory, 1873, L. R. 3 P. & D. 32.]

Judgment (a)—Sir John Nicholl. This case arises upon a will made in extremis—almost in articulo mortis; the validity of which must depend on satisfactory proof of volition and capacity. The account given by the witnesses is generally fair, and there is no suspicion of fraud or circumvention. The paper is in the hand-writing of Joseph Searle, one of the attesting witnesses: it is propounded by Mrs. Ross, and opposed by Mrs. Chester, the cousin and sole next of kin of the deceased. The property is very small, amounting only to 250l.; it would have been far better, in such a case, that the parties should have come to a compromise; but there being now no hopes of such a conclusion, it is my duty to decide the question judicially.

The deceased was a widower; and Mrs. Ross was the second wife, and widow of his father. Since the death of the latter the deceased and Mrs. Ross [228] had lived together for nearly forty years; he entertained for her the greatest affection and regard; while, with his cousin Mrs. Chester, it does not appear that he kept up any intercourse whatever. Hence it is probable that, if there was any will, he would leave all his property as a provision and support for the old lady—his mother-in-law; so Mumford says, that it was "the general impression that Mrs. Ross was to have what the deceased possessed." It is in evidence too that he made declarations to that effect.

Kingsbury deposes that the deceased talked "of Mrs. Ross's relations—never of his own—he never mentioned Mrs. Chester; he spoke of Mrs. Ross as the only person belonging to him."

Searle states that "about five or six weeks before his death the deceased, speaking of Mrs. Ross, said, 'The poor old soul must make the best shift she could when he was gone, but she would be left tolerably well.'"

I can only construe this to mean "left tolerably well by him," and to refer to the proposed disposition of his own property: I have still less difficulty in so construing it when I turn to the account given by another witness, Peck, a neighbour and an intimate acquaintance of the deceased for nine or ten years—with whom the deceased used to sit and chat while the witness (a shoemaker) was at work; for he speaks strongly to declarations of intentions.

"He has many times heard the deceased say he should leave whatever he had to the old lady (meaning Mrs. Ross). He did not mention the lease of his house in particular, but the deponent several times asked him whom he meant to give it [229] to, and he always answered, 'To the old lady.' The deponent also spoke to him several times about the propriety of making a will, and the last time he did so was about five weeks before his death, when he asked him 'to whom he meant to give the lease of his house;' and he replied, 'To the old lady, my mother-in-law, Mrs. Ross:' deponent observed, 'That's right, for she'll live longer than you or me perhaps,' and the deceased replied, 'Perhaps she may, Mr. Peck,' and then added 'that she should have it, and he would not leave it to any one else.' The deponent then told him he ought to get a will made, and he said 'he would, and would leave the old lady every thing he had.'"

Mrs. Searle, the wife of the writer of the will, also deposes to similar declarations:—

"Deponent on the said Thursday (the day on which the deceased was taken ill) went in to see him; and he requested her to sit down until Mrs. Ross should return. In the course of conversation the deceased, speaking of his property, said, 'I have got but little, but must leave it all to the old woman; for God knows what will become of her.'"

Nothing can be of greater weight than this affection and these repeated declarations in different parts of his life, when, in no degree, opposed or counteracted by any circumstances of a contrary tendency: they lay a strong foundation for this will, and supply proof of intention, even if capacity, at the time of doing the act, were in any degree doubtful.

I approach, then, the day of his death. His illness, which had been short, had only confined [230] him to his bed for a few days, and was occasioned by a violent cold affecting his breathing and producing asthma—this accounts for his speaking but little: in the morning, Searle, the husband of his nurse, went for his friend Pulteney, as the deceased wanted him very particularly; not being able to see him, he went a second time, and Pulteney could not then come, for he was obliged to attend a vestry: on communicating this to the deceased he exclaimed, "Oh my God! what shall I do! I must resign it to the will of God and Searle;" but he did not say what it was he meant so to resign. This is the result of the evidence of Searle on the second article; and of Mrs. Searle on the fifth interrogatory.

As far as this goes, it is uncertain what he was to leave to "God and Searle;" but it shews that the whole affair originated with the deceased, and that he had an anxiety to do what he sent for Pulteney to do. Coupling, however, all the circumstances together, I cannot but think that the capacity of the deceased on that morning was beyond doubt, and that his object in sending for Pulteney was to effect some testamentary act; more particularly when I advert to what Mumford says. Searle allows that his own account is somewhat imperfect, and gives, as a reason, that he was very ill at the time of his examination, so ill indeed that he was not able to undergo a cross-examination, in which he might perhaps have given a fuller explanation.(a) His account to Mumford, recenti [231] facto, is more intelligible; and to that I shall presently advert.

Here, then, if it be correct, is sufficient to infer that the object of sending for Pulteney was to make his will. Searle did not set about it till some time after; when, the deceased getting worse, Mrs. Ross went up to Searle and desired him to draw "a bit of a will as fast as he could." Paper was procured, and Searle wrote the instrument.

Certainly there is no clear evidence of instructions directly for the act itself; the message was carried by Mrs. Ross to Searle; but there is evidence that the deceased knew what was going forward, and that his wishes accompanied the act—from Peck, to whom I have already referred; for when he called that morning the deceased told him "that Searle was writing his will;" and this is a species of recognition when his testamentary intentions are so clear. It is not material, nor singular, nor unusual, that the witnesses differ as to the hour at which the execution took place. On the second article Peck thus deposes:—

"He went to ask the deceased how he did about nine o'clock in the morning of the day on which he died: the deponent took hold of the deceased's hand and asked him if he knew him: the deceased answered, 'Yes, Peck, I know you very well;' and then said, 'The will's being wrote: Searle, the lodger, is writing it upstairs:' the deponent observed, 'You have driven it off too long;' and the deceased answered, 'It should have been done before; but it was neglected when you talked to me about it before.' Deponent is [232] quite sure that what he has just stated was what the deceased then said to him; and that he was then of very sound mind, memory, and understanding."

Now, unless this is direct perjury and fabrication, here is capacity, conversation, and recognition of the act at that time in progress. After this, very slight evidence of execution will suffice. The paper being written, Mumford, a neighbour, is sent for, and the will is carried to the deceased, but before that takes place Mrs. Kingsbury, coming in accidentally, is told by Mrs. Searle that "Searle was writing the will, leaving the house and all that was in it to Mrs. Ross:" she thus goes on:—

"Mrs. Ross then desired deponent to ask the deceased if he would like any body's name to be put into the will after her death: and deponent, in consequence, leaned over the bed and said to him, 'Mrs. Ross very much wishes to know if you would like to put any body's name in the will besides hers after her death.' [There was no attempt therefore to circumvent the deceased.] He at first made no answer; upon which the deponent repeated her enquiry in the same terms as before; and the deceased then said, 'No, nobody.' This is an intelligible answer: it shews he must have understood the question and the transaction; it is a sort of recognition of the whole act; it shews, also, the fairness of the proceeding: this must have happened before Mumford arrived, and before they proceeded to the execution. The will is brought; it is read over to the deceased; he is asked if he will sign it, and, according to Searle, he answers, 'No, [233] no, I am not dead yet.' If this was the reply, it shews some confusion of mind or misunderstanding of the question; and Mrs. Searle also speaks to the same answer. That, no doubt, was their impression, and so Mrs. Searle seems to have told Mrs. Chester, for she has had conversation with her; but Mumford deposes to another answer which possibly the Searles might not hear. Mumford's account is to this effect:—

"Deponent was sent for, and went to the deceased's house, where he found him in bed. Searle was standing by the bedside with a paper in his hand, and Mrs. Ross and Mrs. Searle were also present; deponent asked Searle what he had got in his hand, and he said a paper he had been writing: deponent asked him how he came to write that paper, and he replied that he had been into the borough, at Ross's request, for a Mr. Pulteney; but who was unable, at that time, to come; that when deponent told this to the deceased he had thereupon said, 'Then, sirs, I must leave it to God and you to do it in the best way you can for the old woman' (meaning Mrs. Ross). Searle further stated that he had written a will for the deceased, which was the paper he had then got in his hand: deponent observed that it would be proper Searle should read the will to the deceased: Searle assented, and accordingly read the will to the deceased audibly and distinctly; observing to him, as if in explanation of its contents, whatever there is, is for Mrs. Ross, upon which the deceased said, 'Yes, yes.'"

(a) Upon the death of this witness a motion was made that his evidence might be received, although he had not been repeated, nor examined on interrogatories, when the Court directed that the consent of the adverse proctor should be stated in acts of Court; and also that the application was made, in this form, on account of the smallness of the property.

This clearly points to a testamentary act—"Yes, yes." This is an express approbation of the contents upon not only a reading over, but a distinct [234] explanation of the disposition. The pen was then put into his hand: Searle says, at first, he could not hold it, but that of his own accord he picked it up, and with the assistance of Searle made his mark. This was not a necessary act—it would have been valid, though he was unable, from bodily infirmity, or from being overtaken by the stroke of death, to sign it, if the Court had been satisfied that he intended and approved the disposition. But here is the signature, such as he could make it; and Mumford and Searle afterwards witnessed it in testimony of his approbation. Mrs. Searle will not swear either that he was capable or that he was totally incapable; but it is clear from the interrogatory that she has had much conversation with Mrs. Chester as to his answer, "No; I am not dead yet," and is so committed to it, that she may feel some difficulty in speaking as strongly as she otherwise might to his capacity. But looking to all the facts and circumstances—to his testamentary declarations "that he should leave all to this old lady;" to his anxiety that morning to see Pulteney; to his exclamation, "Oh my God! what shall I do? I must resign it all to the will of God and Searle" (when he learnt that Pulteney could not come); to his assertion to Peck "that Searle was writing his will;" to his answer to Mrs. Kingsbury, "No, nobody," when she asked "if he would like to put any body's name in the will besides Mrs. Ross';" to his saying "Yes, yes," when the will was read over and explained; to his previous affections, and to general probability—I am convinced, though this act was deferred till late, and was completed almost articulo mortis; yet that it was the mind [235] and intention of the deceased so to dispose of his property, and that it is sufficient for carrying into effect his wishes in relation to his personal estate; I therefore pronounce for the paper.

As to the next of kin being allowed their costs out of the estate, they were certainly justified in entering into the investigation, considering the will was made in articulo mortis—and my only doubt arises from the smallness of the property—but, on the whole, I think they are entitled to their costs.

IN THE GOODS OF THE REVEREND SIR JOHN LIGHTON, BARONET. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 3rd Session, 1828.—A testator having appointed two executors, and provided that on the death of either of them two others should be substituted: on the death of the original executor, who had proved the will, and on a proxy of consent from the other, probate will be granted to one of the substituted executors, it appearing to have been the testator's intentions that the substitution should take place on the death of either of the original executors, whether happening in the testator's life-time or afterwards.

On motion.

The Reverend Sir John Lighton, late of Donoughmore, in the county of Donegal, died on the 4th of April, 1827; the deceased in and by his last will, dated the 17th of March, 1827, appointed executors in the words following:—

"And of this my will I nominate, constitute, and appoint Sir Samuel Hayes, and the Reverend Stewart Hamilton, executors and trustees; and, in case of the death of either of them, I nominate and appoint Edmund Hayes, and my brother Henry Lighton, to act and be executors and trustees in their stead."

[236] On the 10th of June Sir Samuel Hayes proved the will in his Majesty's Court of Prerogative in Ireland, the right of the Reverend Stewart Hamilton, his co-executor, being saved. Upon the death of Sir Samuel Hayes, in the life-time of the Reverend Stewart Hamilton, probate of the said will, under seal of the Prerogative Court of Ireland, was decreed to Edmund (now become Sir Edmund) Hayes, for completing the administration of the deceased's effects in that country, with a power reserved to Henry Lighton, the other substituted executor. This probate was decreed on the 11th of January, 1828.

The deceased died possessed of a policy of insurance on his own life in the Equitable Assurance Office, in England, of the value of about 6300l.; and for the purpose of obtaining payment of it the present application was made for a grant of probate, in this country, of the same will to Sir Edmund Hayes. It was founded on the affidavits of Sir Edmund Hayes, of Mr. Shaw of Dublin (who prepared the will), and of Dr. Abraham Colles (the physician who attended the deceased); that he, the deceased, at the time of executing his will, was in a very dangerous state of health, and contemplated the near approach of his death; and that it was intended by the deceased that the substitution of executors should take effect in the event of the death of either of the first named executors at any time.

A proxy also was exhibited under the hand and seal of the Reverend Stewart Hamilton, by which he waived his title to probate, and consented that it should pass to the substituted executors, jointly or severally.

[237] Jenner—on these documents, and on reference to a case (a) in which the Court had made a grant similar in some of its circumstances—moved that probate be decreed to Sir Edmund Hayes, Baronet, as one of the substituted executors.

Motion granted.

IN THE GOODS OF THE COUNTESS DA CUNHA. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 3rd Session, 1828.—Administration, limited to the receipt of dividends in the English funds, granted to a minor residuary legatee, the wife of a minor, both subjects of, and resident in, Portugal, on a certificate being produced that by the law of Portugal she was entitled.

[Referred to, In the Goods of Earl, 1867, L. R. 1 P. & D. 450.]

On motion.

The sum of 14,911l. 16s., three per cents., was entered in the books of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, in the name of "Her Excellency Donna Maria Gertrudes Quintella, of Lisbon, spinster, now the wife of His Excellency Don Joze Maria Vasques da Cunha, [238] Count da Cunha." This lady dying, by her will, dated 8th September, 1824, appointed her daughter, Donna Maria da Carmo (a minor), residuary legatee. The will was established in Portugal, and a judge administrator assigned; who, in that character, had the entire management and control of the minor's property. On the marriage of the minor to the Count of Vianna, under the licence of the Princess Regent of Portugal, her disabilities as a minor ceased, and the appointment of the judge administrator was revoked. The husband was also a minor; but it appeared that, by the laws of Portugal, by reason of his holding a commission in the army, and of his marriage, he was considered of full age; and was legally authorized to do all acts the same as if he had attained the age of twenty-one. On this account, therefore, a guardian could not be appointed.

To establish these facts, the following documents were laid before the Court, viz. the sentence of the Court at Lisbon confirming the Countess da Cunha's will, and the will therein embodied; the appointment of the judge administrator; an affidavit as to the existence of the stock in the manner described; and a certificate of four Portuguese advocates as to the law of that country on this matter. The certificate was as follows:—

(Translation.)

We, the undersigned advocates in the civil and criminal courts of the capital and city of Lisbon, and in the Supreme Tribunal of the Caza da Supplicacao thereof, do attest that, by the laws and customs of the kingdom of Portugal, it is compe-[239]-tent to his Excellency the Count da Vianna, an inhabitant of the said capital, and to her Excellency Donna Maria, his wife, countess of the same title, to administer the property and effects belonging to them respectively, although neither of them, the said

(a) In The Goods of Milo Bourke, late of Jamaica, Deceased, it appeared that by his will, executed a few hours before his death, he appointed his brother and Mr. Murphy executors: the will also contained this clause:—

"In case of the death or departure from this island of my said brother, I appoint Joseph Fannin, merchant, an executor in his stead."

The brother died, having proved in Jamaica. Mr. Murphy renounced in that island, and declined to take probate in England. On an application by Mr. Fannin (supported by his own affidavit) for probate in this country in common form, and upon stating that he was shortly about to return to Jamaica, the Court was satisfied that his appointment, as a substituted executor, was clearly intended to take effect, either upon Mr. Bourke, the brother, dying or quitting Jamaica in the life-time of the testator, or subsequent to his death, and granted the probate. Michaelmas Term, 1st Session, 1826.

husband and wife, may have yet attained the age of twenty-one years. We do also attest that, pursuant to the same laws, all legal obligations and instruments duly made by the said Count da Vianna are valid in the kingdom of Portugal, notwithstanding he is under twenty-one years of age. We finally attest that, by virtue of the dotal contract, or respective agreement made on the 15th January, 1814, previous to the marriage of the Count da Cunha with Donna Maria Gertrudes Quintella, Countess da Cunha, deceased, the said Countess da Vianna enjoys full right, during her life-time, in conformity to the said laws of Portugal, to administer and receive the interest and dividends on the sum of 14,911l. 16s. three per cent. consolidated annuities, standing in the books of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, in the name of, &c. &c.

Done in Lisbon, 15th January, 1828, and signed by José Manoel Pinheiro de Castro, Joaquim Lourenco Lopes, Francisco Pinto Coelho de Castro, Manoel Felis de Oliveira Pinheiro.

In explanation of this certificate, it had also been ascertained that, by the law of Portugal, the Countess of Vianna, under the dotal contract, was entitled only to the dividends of the stock during her life.

Lushington, upon these documents, now moved for an administration, with the will of the Coun-[240]-tess da Cunha annexed, to be granted to her daughter, limited to the receipt of the dividends.

The Countess of Vianna, being the residuary legatee, is, under the will of her mother, the Countess da Cunha, entitled to the administration: the Courts of Justice in Portugal have put an end to their own authority to administer. Two difficulties, however, arise; the Countess of Vianna is a minor, and a married woman, and her husband is also a minor; and, by our law and practice, a minor cannot take the administration,(a) nor appoint an attorney to take it for her; she must appoint a guardian; but as this, it appears, cannot be done by the laws of Portugal, the case resolves itself into this question—Will the Court enforce the practice as it exists in England, or adopt the Portuguese law?

Under the special circumstances, the Court, perhaps, will not think it necessary to enter upon this consideration, but decree this administration to pass, as no possible danger can arise from a grant so limited.

Per Curiam. From the documents it appears that the Countess da Vianna is entitled to the dividends; and, as no possible inconvenience can arise from this limited grant, the Court allows it to pass.

Motion granted.

[241] IN THE GOODS OF ALEXANDER FERRIER. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 3rd Session, 1828.—The legatee for life of certain property having assigned over his interest to the substituted legatee, an administration with a will annexed, limited to that interest, and granted to the legatee for life, may be revoked, and a new administration, limited to that property, decreed to the substituted legatee, then possessed of the sole entire interest therein.

[Distinguished, In the Goods of Reid, 1886, 11 P. D. 71.]

On motion.

By indenture dated the 9th of November, 1794, made between John Briggs the elder, and Martha Lysaght, widow, the relict of Arthur Lysaght, in contemplation of their marriage, it was agreed that John Pybus, George Westcot, Alexander Ferrier, and Thomas Lane should, of their settlement, be appointed trustees, and that the said John Briggs should assign over to the said trustees whatever sums might become due to the said Martha Briggs from the third part of the net produce of the estate of her former husband, to be by them laid out in government funds, or lent on good security, or employed in the purchase of land, as the said John Briggs should think proper to direct; and it was further agreed that the said trustees should be accountable to John Briggs for the income or produce of the above sums, or lands, during his life, and afterwards to the said Martha, his then intended wife, in case she should survive him; but that, on the decease of both of them, the sums thereby assigned in trust should so remain for the benefit of the child or children of the said intended marriage, and to be divided amongst them, on their coming of age, in such proportions as the last surviving parent might direct in writing, but, in default of such direction, then equally.

[242] The marriage having taken place, an investment was made of the above-mentioned third part in the public funds. Of the marriage, two children only—John and Stephen—attained their full age, who, with their father, survived Martha Briggs. Mr. Ferrier, the last survivor of the trustees, died in May, 1809, without being possessed of any personal estate within the province of Canterbury, except this trust-property: his executors therefore refused to prove within the province of Canterbury, and administration (with will and codicils annexed) of his effects—limited so far only as concerned the interest and dividends then due, or which thereafter might grow due, on the trust stock, during the life of John Briggs—had been granted to him by this Court. A proxy from John Briggs—the administrator—was now exhibited, consenting that this administration should be revoked in order that a grant, limited to this trust stock, might be decreed to his two sons.

On the caveat-day after last Michaelmas Term Daubeny moved the Court to revoke the administration formerly granted to John Briggs, the father, and to decree it, limited to the trust property, to the two sons.

Per Curiam. The Court said there was a difficulty in revoking an administration which was effective as to all the purposes for which it was originally granted; and also expressed a doubt whether it would be justified in taking such a step, as the father might still retain a power of appointment, in respect of this money, between his children, or might possibly have assigned his life interest [243] to a third person. It, therefore, directed the matter to stand over.

On this day Daubeny renewed his motion and brought to the Court's notice the opinion of an eminent Chancery counsel to the effect—that a Court of Equity, had it been applied to during the life-time of the trustee, would have compelled him to transfer the stock to the sons, the father having first assigned over his life interest to them, and released his power of appointment.

Per Curiam. The object of this application is, that the sons should obtain possession of, and control over, the principal during the life-time of the father, these three persons having the only interest in the property; for there is now an affidavit of the elder Mr. Briggs that he has not assigned over his right to any third person. The Court would be inclined to do all that the trustee or his representative could be called upon to do; but there is this awkwardness, that I am asked to revoke an administration good for all the purposes for which it was originally decreed; still I think myself justified, under the circumstances, in directing that, as soon as the father shall have assigned over to the sons his interest under the trust deed, and shall have executed a release of his power of appointment, the former limited administration may be revoked, and that administration limited, as prayed, may pass to the sons.

Motion granted.

[244] MARTIN AND OTHERS v. LAKING AND OLDHAM. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 3rd Session, 1828.—The widow having, after the testator's death, caused his will to be destroyed, probate of the draft of such will granted; and the widow condemned in the whole costs of the suit.

Robert Martin died on the 14th of December, 1826. In Hilary Term, 1827, a proctor appeared for Elizabeth Martin, the lawful widow of the deceased, and alleged her to have been sworn, and to have entered into the usual bond with her sureties, and prayed administration. This was opposed by two of the executors appointed by the deceased to his will, whereof the draft had been propounded, and an allegation given in, stating in substance—

That the personal property amounted in value to 11,000l., and his real estate to 2300l.; that in 1811 he became the father of a female illegitimate child, who was christened by the name of Martin, and was brought up by the deceased in his own house, and educated at his expence, and was, upon all occasions, acknowledged and treated as if she had been his only child; that in 1814 the deceased, having an intention to provide for his illegitimate daughter, executed his will agreeably to a draft which he had previously approved of, and which had been prepared from his own instructions; and that within a fortnight of his death he declared "that his said daughter would have 10,000l. or more;" that in 1826 he married his housekeeper, Elizabeth Rawlings; and shortly before his marriage he gave her 1000l. for her own use, and informed his solicitor that he proposed, by a codicil, to make her a small addition.

[245] The widow, in her answers, admitted that she directed the above-mentioned will to be destroyed, and that she afterwards said the deceased himself had destroyed it, "because she conceived and imagined that the deceased, by his marriage, did, in effect, revoke and make void his will."

Lushington for the executors, prayed the Court to pronounce for the will as contained in the draft, and to condemn the widow in the whole of the costs.

Phillimore contrà, admitted that the proof established that the draft was entitled to probate; but trusted the Court would not condemn the widow in costs, as she had clearly acted under a mistaken view of the law.

Jenner for five of the next of kin cited to see proceedings, prayed for their costs out of the estate.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a case, that does not very often occur, of a will which was in existence at the testator's death, but afterwards destroyed: fortunately the draft was preserved.

The allegation, which is fully proved, states the education of the deceased's illegitimate daughter; that she was brought up in his house, and treated and acknowledged as his lawful child: it then pleads the due execution of his will; and there is no doubt that it was, when executed, conformable with the draft now before the Court. In 1826 the deceased married Elizabeth Rawlings, with whom he had previously cohabited for nine or ten years. Before marriage he had conveyed to her a thousand pounds. The will—exclusively [246] in favour of the child—the widow, shortly after the testator's death, caused to be destroyed, notwithstanding strong remonstrances were made at the time on the impropriety of such a proceeding. By whatever inducement she was tempted to this misconduct, it is clear that the will, having been in existence since the deceased's death, is valid, and consequently that this draft also is valid. I am, therefore, bound to decree probate thereof, and to go the length of condemning the widow in the full costs.

It is a little fortunate for her that, at the time she was guilty of this act of spoliation—one of the grossest frauds that can be committed—the statute, which imposes the penalty of transportation for such offences, had not been enacted: since then a provision, in one of Mr. Peel's bills, has been made by the legislature for the punishment of crimes of this nature.(a) The moral guilt of Mrs. Martin is, however, the same; and I feel no hesitation in condemning her in costs, whether they can be obtained or not. The costs of the next of kin may be paid out of the estate.

[247] PITT, Assignee of Woodham v. WOODHAM. Prerogative Court, Extra-Day, 14th Feb., 1828.—The Court will not, at the instance of the assignee of an insolvent, and on a suggestion that the insolvent had not received his distributive share, call upon the widow and administratrix of the father of the insolvent for an inventory and account, after a long acquiescence of the insolvent and his assignee; and when it is shewn that a valuation and inventory of the deceased's effects were made shortly after his death, and facts are proved from which it may fairly be presumed that the insolvent had received considerably more than his full share.

Act on petition.

This was an application for an inventory and account.

Addams for the widow and administratrix, cited Ritchie v. Rees and Rees (1 Add. 144), and prayed the Court to dismiss his party.

Lushington contrà, for the assignee, observed that in the case cited, the deceased had been dead forty-four years; and though the party was in that instance relieved from the obligation of delivering an inventory, the Court was very anxious at that time, and would always be so, to guard against a relaxation of the rule of law in this respect.

(a) By 7 and 8 Geo. IV. c. 29, s. 22, it is enacted, "That if any person shall, either during the life of the testator or testatrix, or after his or her death, steal, or for any fraudulent purpose destroy or conceal, any will, codicil, or other testamentary instrument, whether the same shall relate to real or personal estate, or to both, every such offender shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable to any of the punishments which the Court may award, as hereinbefore last mentioned [viz. transportation for seven years; fine or imprisonment, or both]; and it shall not in any indictment for such offence be necessary to allege that such will, codicil, or other instrument is the property of any person, or that the same is of any value."

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a suit for an inventory and account against the widow and administratrix of John Woodham. He died intestate in February, 1803, leaving behind him a widow and four children, two sons and two daughters, all minors; Mary Anne, being fifteen years of age; Caroline, thirteen; John, eleven; and Thomas, eight. Thomas consequently became of age in 1816. In 1820 he took the benefit of the Insolvent Act, when he swore to his schedule; and at that time he did not pretend that he had any claim on his father's estate. Pitt was appointed his assignee; and in [248] 1827 cited the administratrix to exhibit an inventory and account, suggesting that Thomas Woodham had not been paid his distributive share: this demand is made twenty-four years after the death of the intestate—eleven years after the insolvent was of age and seven years after his insolvency. Now, to justify the party in making this application, and still more to justify the Court in acceding to it, very strong reasons must be adduced; for the presumption that the intestate's estate has been duly administered is very strong.

The deceased was an oilman, carrying on business in Queen-street, now Museum-street, Bloomsbury. The widow states that the whole of the property at the time of his death was under the value of 900l.; that she took administration under 1000l.; that the debts amounted to 193l., and the funeral expences and mourning to 75l., leaving a net amount of 630l. If this be correct, the widow being entitled to one-third and each of the four children to one-sixth, the share of each of the latter would be 105l.; and if the value of the property had fully amounted to 1000l., each child would have been entitled to about 150l.; and if the goodwill of the business had been valued at that time, I cannot think it would have made the distributive shares exceed 160l.; for this Court cannot go into any consideration beyond what was the value of the property at the deceased's death: but, further, there is nothing to shew that the good-will was not included, as I suppose it was, in the estimate of the effects at 900l. On the other hand, Mrs. Woodham states that to her son Thomas she advanced 358l.; and of this about 300l. before 1809; so that the sum advanced was much more than the principal and [249] interest on his distributive share, calculated at the highest possible amount. Under all the circumstances, at this late period, the Court must, I think, presume that Thomas Woodham received his full distributive share; for it would be exposing parties in this station of life to very harassing demands if they were called upon for an inventory and account after so long an interval, as they cannot be expected to keep very regular vouchers.

In confirmation, however, of the correctness of her representation as to the effects of the deceased and of their value, the widow further states that two persons in the employ of a friend of the deceased attended and took an account of the book-debts, of the stock in trade, &c.; and that a regular inventory and appraisements of these and of the furniture were made by a sworn appraiser, Abbot, who is since dead; that it was upon this inventory and valuation (which cannot now be found) she ascertained the amount of the effects in order to take administration; and she was thus enabled to swear them under 1000l. This statement is corroborated by Mr. Butterworth, a friend of the deceased and of his family, who assisted the widow upon the death of her husband, was several times at her house, accompanied her to Doctors' Commons when she took out administration, and became her surety. He speaks to the making of the inventory and valuation by Abbot, and says that the widow was wholly guided by it, and that he believes that "every part of the deceased's personal estate was included;" and if "goodwill" was to [250] be valued, it must be inferred that it was not omitted.

Here, then, under the circumstances, there is a sufficient constat that the personal effects did not amount to 1000l., as the administration was taken under that sum; and there is good reason to believe and presume that the son Thomas received more than his distributive share. In substance, an inventory and account have been given, and that is all that can now be expected or furnished. Where is any thing to falsify all this or to induce the Court to suspect that there are any omissa, or to call for a more particular and detailed inventory and account? The widow, the eldest son, and one daughter have carried on the intestate's business; the other daughter went out as a governess: these, by their industry and frugality, have supported themselves; have added a little to their property; and laid out, in maintaining and educating this very son Thomas, more money than his distributive share; while he has become an insolvent, and can give no better description of himself at the head of his affidavit than by the unprofitable addition of gentleman. His claim is only on the property which his father left at his death; for this Court has no authority to search into the profits which the widow and other children have acquired since by their own industry, but only to insist that every thing of which the intestate died possessed should be fairly included in the inventory; and I am of opinion that the administratrix has sufficiently shewn that all was accounted for, and that the son has admitted the receipt of all to which he was entitled. True it is [251] that there is no formal release, but there is what is tantamount to it, viz. a long acquiescence of himself and his assignee, and no claim asserted at the time of his insolvency, when he swore to the schedule of his effects.

Upon the whole, therefore, I think there is no reason whatever to order any further explanation: on the contrary, I can see no sufficient ground which justified his calling at all on his mother at this late period—eleven years after he came of age, and seven years after his insolvency—more especially after the affidavit to which she was sworn in April last.(a) If he, an insolvent, and his assignee, choose to institute a proceeding which has much the appearance of a desire to harass, and of a hope possibly to extort something from this old woman—and enter into unnecessary details of subsequent circumstances, which have no real bearing on the question, they must do it at their own peril, and at the risk of costs. I feel that I am bound to dismiss the administratrix, and to condemn the assignee in costs.

[252] IN THE GOODS OF AARON HURRILL. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 4th Session, 1828.—Extrinsic evidence is necessary to make an unfinished paper operative; nor will a proxy of consent from all entitled in distribution, or otherwise, justify the Court in granting probate to such an instrument, unless the affidavits set forth facts which, if proved, in solemn form of law, would sustain a disputed paper.

On motion.

The deceased, on the 29th of December, 1827, died: he left behind him a widow and six children, the only persons who would be entitled to his personal estate in case of an intestacy: on the first of January two of the deceased's sons found, carefully preserved, a paper, all of his own hand-writing, enclosed in an envelope unsealed, and thus endorsed—"The last will and testament of Mr. Aaron Hurrill, dated 1827. Extrix Mrs. Hurrill." The will purported to dispose of all his real and personal property in favour of his wife: it was regularly drawn, and thus concluded, "In witness whereof I have to this my last will set my hand and seal this day of 1827"—but it was neither signed, sealed nor further dated than by the year: there was also a clause of attestation, but it was not attested.

The children executed a proxy of consent that probate might be granted to Mrs. Hurrill. An affidavit was also exhibited as to the paper and envelope being in the hand-writing of the deceased; to the place of finding it; and that he left no other testamentary paper.

Dodson in support of the motion.

[253] Per Curiam. The Court, after stating the facts, said: I cannot, according to established rules, grant probate of this paper in common form: it is manifestly unfinished; and consequently requires some circumstances to repel the legal presumption that the deceased had not finally made up his mind thus to dispose of his property. The affidavits merely go to hand-writing and finding; and are consistent with the paper having been written many months before the deceased's death. The proxy of consent from the six children (who, I presume, from having executed it, are all of age) is not sufficient to induce me to break through the rule that a probate shall not be granted, even with the consent of all persons who would be otherwise entitled, unless the affidavits set forth facts which, if proved in solemn form of law, would sustain a disputed instrument. Now that which is here stated would not, if fully established by plea and proof, enable the Court to grant a probate: the affidavits do not contain facts sufficient to render this a valid document. I feel the less hesitation in arriving at this conclusion, as the children, being all of age, can, if satisfied of the deceased's intention, effect the same object in a different and a more gracious mode, by assigning and conveying to their mother, when administratrix, all their distributive shares, relying on her afterwards to make a proper arrangement: but in conformity with the rules of this Court I cannot grant the present motion; and shall, therefore, decree administration to the widow.

(a) In this affidavit Mrs. Woodham, after specifying various sums, amounting altogether to 358l. 18s. 9d., which she had paid to and for the immediate benefit of her son Thomas since the death of his father; and that she had, in fact, expended considerably more on his behalf, stated that, as her agent, he was indebted to her 44l., being a balance due on the sale of two hogsheads of oil.

Motion refused.

[254] JONES AND JONES v. JONES AND JONES. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 4th Session, 1828.—After publication, on an affidavit that the depositions had not been seen, and that the matter was noviter perventa, exhibits may be pleaded.

On motion.

In this case two wills of William Jones were propounded, one, dated February 21st, 1822, by James Jones, one of the deceased's sons; the other, dated May 12th, 1823, by two of the daughters: and this was an application by James Jones to be allowed to give in an allegation after publication, pleading four letters (two dated shortly before, and two shortly after, the execution of the will of May, 1823) written by Mary Jones, one of the adverse parties, and admitting that the deceased, at the date of those letters, was in a childish state. An affidavit sworn by James Jones was brought to the above effect, and stating that he was for the first time informed of the existence of the letters on the ninth of February instant; publication having passed on the 24th of January.

Lushington in support of the motion.

Jenner contrà.

Per Curiam. This is a special application to be allowed to plead further matter in the principal cause, after publication has passed, and the proctors have declared they gave in no further allegations unless exceptive. An affidavit has been made that the facts are noviter perventa, and that the depositions have not been seen: generally, in applications of [255] this nature, the affidavit is required to state another circumstance as to the nature of the facts, viz. that they are material to the decision of the cause; for then the Court would be able to form some opinion whether the plea might safely go to proof: but as this allegation is merely for the purpose of introducing exhibits, letters written by the adverse party, I think, I am bound to allow it to be brought in.(a)[1] The most summary way of making these letters evidence will be the best: they may possibly be admitted, even without answers, in acts of Court: at all events, in answers explanatory of their meaning, and of the circumstances under which they were written, unless indeed their authenticity and genuineness be denied, and even then evidence of hand-writing alone would be gone into.

As to the effect these exhibits may have in the cause, it is unnecessary at present to enter into that consideration; if they are not material, they will do no injury; if of importance, the Court should be informed of their contents: I, therefore, think them proper to be introduced.

Motion granted.

affections, and former testamentary dispositions; the deceased being, at the time, within ten days of her death, and in a state of extreme weakness and debility; all her confidential friends excluded or absent, and those only about her who are benefited under or engaged in the preparation or execution of the instrument.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. An instrument, as a second codicil to the will of Mrs. Mary Brydges, is propounded in this case by Sarah King, a legatee under it; and is opposed by Sir Harford Jones Brydges, an executor and the residuary legatee appointed by the will.

The validity of the paper must rest principally on the credit given to the attesting witnesses; for, if they can be fully trusted, it is proved to be the act of a capable testatrix. The depositions are not of a very extraordinary length, but so many of the attending circumstances have been noticed in argument, and the credit of the witnesses so much depends upon an accurate view of the evidence, that it may be necessary, notwithstanding the time it may occupy, and the fatigue it may occasion to the Court individually, to refer to and read more of it than the Court is, in ordinary cases, accustomed to do.

The deceased died on the fourth of February, 1826, unmarried, having no nearer relation than a cousin german, or a cousin german once removed: she was at the time of her death more than seventy-two years of age; she resided at Hambrook Grove, near Bristol, and had personal property to [257] the amount of between 50,000l. and 60,000l., besides real estates of some value: she made and executed her will on the nineteenth of March, 1823, by which, after leaving several small legacies, she bequeathed to Sir Harford Jones, on condition that he took the name of Brydges, her Hambrook estate, and also a legacy of 35,000l. stock; to Mr. Wotton, her estates in Hertfordshire and Bedfordshire, and also a house and premises at Ledbury, provided he would not sell them; and she appointed these two persons, together with a Mr. Daniel, her executors; and Sir Harford Jones her residuary legatee. The first codicil to this will, dated on the fifteenth of April, 1825, revokes the devises to Wotton, and his appointment as executor, and gives those estates to Sir Harford Jones, with the same condition respecting his change of name as was contained in the will, and confirms his nomination as her executor and residuary legatee. The disposition by both these papers then has for its principal object her cousin, Sir Harford Jones: he is to have her real estates, he is to have her personal property, he is to take her name, and become the representative of her family.(a)

[258] In respect to character, this old lady is represented by the pleas and evidence to have been penurious, proud of her family, and clever. The disposition of her property by the will accords with this character: as penurious, she gives only a few trifling legacies—with the exception of one of 2000l. stock to her cousin Mary Wotton, and one of 200l. to her executor Mr. Daniel, none of these legacies exceed 100l., and altogether they amount to less than 3000l.: as proud of her family, she selects her cousin, Sir Harford Jones, of whom it is proved she was fond of talking, and she requires him to continue the family name: as clever, she is herself the writer of the will, which is clearly and accurately expressed (and being embodied in technical language, was probably framed upon some precedent), very fairly written, very cautiously executed, and is attested by most respectable witnesses—Mr. Wadham, the lord of the manor; Mr. Harford, a gentleman of fortune in the neighbourhood; and Mr. Day, her then medical attendant. The first codicil, by which she revokes the devises to Mr. Wotton and transfers them to Sir Harford Jones, is marked by the same traits, and bears still stronger proofs of care; for she will not trust to herself to prepare it, but she sends for her old confidential solicitor, Mr. Russell, and the witnesses are nearly of the same description as those to the will, Mr. Wadham, Miss King, and the solicitor, Mr. Russell. These circumstances denote the character of the disposition and her own character; and to this disposition she adheres for nine months, and till within ten days of her death, though she had been ill for some time, and for the last two months had been confined to her bed.

(a) On the 4th Session of Easter Term, 1826, an application was made by counsel to the Court, supported by an affidavit of Sir Harford Jones, that a probate of the will, and of the codicil thereto, dated 15th April, 1825, be granted to him, reserving the question as to the validity of the paper-writing dated the 25th of January, 1826. This motion was opposed also by counsel; but the surrogate (Dr. Arnold) decreed the probate to pass the seal; the sum of 18,000l. three per cent. Consolidated Bank Annuities being first invested in the names of trustees, to abide the issue of the cause, subject also to the revocation of the probate, in case the paper-writing, propounded as a further codicil, should be established.

[259] It does, however, appear that when the first codicil was thus formally prepared and executed, in April, 1825, the deceased had thoughts of writing a further testamentary paper, in order to leave some benefit to the attesting witness, Miss King; but still, at that time, she had not made up her mind to any definite act of liberality towards either Miss King or her own servants.

The codicil propounded is dated on the 25th of January, 1826, ten days before the death of the testatrix; and it gives 10,000l. to Miss King; 1500l. to her manservant, Gay; 1000l. to her apothecary, Hay; 100l. each to a brother and sister of Miss King, and 30l. to each of her servants; and, lest her personalty should not be sufficient to satisfy the legacies, the paper revokes the bequest of 35,000l. to Sir Harford Jones, and reduces it to 20,000l.(a) This disposition appears to me improbable and alarming—more especially when connected with all the history and facts. Looking [260] at the character of the former papers, the smallness of the legacies, the design that Sir Harford Jones should be the representative of the Brydges family, I think her conduct in taking away this large amount, even for any objects, is not very probable nor consistent; but when the objects of her bounty are considered—Miss King, an humble companion of two years and a half standing; Gay, a servant of all work; and Hay, one of her medical attendants for not quite two years—it becomes more extraordinary, and creates suspicion, as much [261] exceeding the most liberal reward that could be expected for their services in their several stations.

(a) This codicil was as follows:—

Whereas I the undersigned Mary Brydges of Hambrook Grove in the parish of Winterbourne in the County of Gloucester Spinster have in and by my last Will and Testament bearing date the nineteenth day of March one thousand eight hundred and twenty three, given and bequeathed unto my Relation Sir Harford Jones of Boultibrook in the County of Radnor, Baronet, the sum of five and thirty thousand Pounds Stock, and also made the said Sir Harford Jones residuary Legatee of my said will—Now therefore, I the said Mary Brydges do hereby revoke and declare to be null and void, the said bequest of thirty five thousand pounds to the said Sir Harford Jones, and instead thereof I hereby give and bequeath unto the said Sir Harford Jones the sum of Twenty thousand pounds—And I hereby Give and Bequeath unto my sincere and worthy friend—Miss Sarah King the sum of Ten Thousand Pound to be paid to her, her Executors, Administrators or Assig^{n} within twelve months after my decease, as and for her and their own monies for ever. And I do also hereby give and bequeath unto the said Sarah King my Gold Watch and Chain, and my little Dog, Fidelé, as a testimony of my gratitude for her very kind and unremitted attention to me during my long illness—I do also hereby Give and Bequeath unto Mr. John King the sum of One hundred pounds, and my Bay Gelding "Gay"—and I also give and bequeath unto Miss Eliza King the sum of One hundred Pounds. I also hereby Give and Bequeath unto Mr. John Hay of Whites Hill in the parish of Winterbourne, Surgeon; the sum of One Thousand Pounds, as an acknowledgment of the very great care, and anxiety he manifested for my recovery—I do also hereby give and bequeath unto my man servant Thomas Gay the sum of Fifteen Hundred Pounds, and also my grey mare "Mary Fox" and my broad wheel Cart, for his long & faithful services to me—To each and every of my other Servants, I hereby give and bequeath the sum of Thirty Pounds, and I do in all other respects confirm my said will (except so far as the same is altered by a former Codicil thereto) and direct this to be taken as a Codicil to my said last Will, and in part thereof, In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal this twenty fifth day of January in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty six—

M. BRYDGES L.S.

Note.—The clause of attestation was much in the usual form.

It was contended that the circumstances render the disposition not improbable; that Miss King was her companion, was particularly kind and attentive to the deceased during her illness; that the deceased was sensible of it and very fond of her; that it was understood the deceased had an intention, when she executed her codicil in April—and that it was admitted to have been her duty—to take care of and provide for her; but, to my judgment, this does not render probable a legacy of 10,000l., nor does it much lessen the suspicion nor the demand for satisfactory proof.

Again, it is said that Gay, though a servant of all work, yet was accustomed to lift the deceased in and out of her carriage, and to assist in moving her in bed; and, by the exertion, met with an accident—a rupture: it is not quite clearly proved that the original injury was so occasioned, nor that it was sustained in the service of, nor was known to, the deceased; but, if it were, the hurt must have been trifling, for he continued to perform the same offices till her death, and after her death he became a volunteer in a troop of yeomanry. The rupture, then, must have been of the slightest kind, and 1500l. is rather an exorbitant compensation on the part of this testatrix.

Hay, whom she had consulted not quite two years, was the village apothecary, residing at hand, her most frequent, but not her principal, medical attendant—not the one in whom she reposed the most confidence: Mr. Baker, a [262] surgeon of Bristol, was the superior; but, living at a distance, he could not visit her frequently, and the expence would have ill accorded with the deceased's penurious habits; to Mr. Hay, however, this paper gives a legacy of 1000l.: the magnitude of this benefit, again, is improbable and suspicious. Besides these bequests, here are legacies to Miss King's brother John, to her sister, and to all the servants; who, of course, by this bounty would be conciliated and silenced.

When, then, in addition to the magnitude of these legacies, it appears that, with the exception of those called in as instruments of preparing and attesting the act, these were the persons, and the only persons, who were around the sick bed of the deceased, and when she was now within ten days of her dissolution—the case becomes so alarming that, if the Court intends to exert a proper vigilance in the investigation, evidence of volition and capacity—incontestable and uncontrovertible as to its truth and effect—must be required. If a fraud were concerted, and the party principally benefited intended to help herself thus liberally, it was expedient to quiet the man-servant and the apothecary, by allowing them largely to participate; and to conciliate, by smaller portions, the other members of the family who had access to the deceased.

The instrument having been made so shortly before the deceased's death, the Court is called upon to enquire what was her condition at that time. Her age was pretty advanced—above seventy-two: she had been ill some months, had been confined to her room for three months, and to her bed for two months; her complaint was [263] visceral, and therefore likely to produce gradual dissolution; from lying in bed she became excoriated and ulcerated (as it is described) from shoulder to hip, so that it was necessary to cover the parts with plaster; the discharge still further weakened her; she was become so extremely feeble that, although from the visceral complaint evacuations could only be procured by artificial means, she was in a state no longer to bear the operation, and the woman employed to administer the remedy was dismissed.

When the capacity is put in issue, on the responsive allegation two witnesses, viz. this woman, Green, and Carpenter, are produced to support the attesting witnesses. Green says:

"She began attending about a month before Christmas; she attended a dozen times at least; three or four times a week; but she cannot take upon herself to fix the time of her last attendance."

If she began a month before Christmas, and attended three or four times a week, she would have completed her dozen attendances by the end of December, and there is nothing that enables her to fix the time late in January, though she loosely talks of continuing her duties till a little more than a week before the death of Mrs. Brydges. Hay's bill charges, from the first of January, visits every day; and, from the sixteenth, dressings and plasters, and visits two or three times a day till her death: Baker, too, attends in January, and every other day from the eleventh to the twenty-first of that month, yet Green never sees Baker there; and Hay she only knows to be there twice by hearing his voice. The in-[264]-ference is that she was dismissed long prior to the time she supposes. To the eleventh interrogatory she answers: "She has no knowledge whatever of a person of the name of Mary Cunningham:" and Cunningham was staying in the house from the 22d to the 26th of January.

Her evidence is more consistent in another particular, with her having ceased to attend the testatrix at a much earlier period: for she says, on the thirteenth interrogatory, "The deceased was, in all respects, as sensible at the last as she was at the first of respondent's attendance on her: she did not perceive any difference."

Considering that Mrs. Brydges was rapidly sinking at the date of the codicil, either this witness must have quitted the house sooner than she now fancies, or else no great reliance can be placed on her testimony.

On the fourteenth of January Miss King wrote to Sir Harford Jones, giving an account of the deceased's state: that letter has been annexed to the sixth interrogatory, and contains the following passages:—

"Knowing it to be your particular wish to be kept advised of the state of your dear cousin's health is the reason of this so soon following my last respects, which I hope meets your approbation. Since I last had this pleasure, I regret to say Mrs. Brydges has continued to grow worse, and my candid opinion is that she is gradually declining, though Mr. Baker, when he saw her yesterday, said he could not see any immediate danger; he has promised to come again in a day or two, when I will write you again, should occasion require it."

[265] According, then, to the result of the evidence of Green, and of this letter, the deceased, towards the middle of January, is gradually sinking—dissolution is approaching; Baker's visits are frequent; but the danger is not immediate.

Carpenter is made to state that, on the twenty-fifth of January, he was called into the deceased's room: that he was told by the deceased herself to fetch James King, to take the old mare; and from his description, Mrs. Brydges would appear to have been quite alert.

This is not a fact pleaded, and it is the only time that Carpenter, an out-door workman, is suggested to have seen her; he has been discharged since the death of Mrs. Brydges, and before his production as a witness: it will be for the consideration of the Court, therefore, whether this story is probable, and how far consistent with Cunningham—whether he is to be credited, or whether this is an after-thought to bolster up the case and the testimony of the subscribing witnesses. These, however, are the only two persons in support of the general capacity.

On the other hand, the facts lead strongly to a contrary deduction. At this advanced age, after this long illness—having been confined to her bed two months—being in extreme bodily debility, ending in gradual dissolution, the deceased must, so shortly before her death, have been labouring under considerable mental infirmity. There are some other facts also inducing the same conclusion: she had a job of work going on in her house—an addition making to it by contract: she liked to enquire how the building was advancing; she was impatient to get it finished; yet the workmen [266] were often stopped; and Witchell, the mason, the principal contractor, who slept in the house, was never called into her room for the purpose of direction or enquiry after November, till he is summoned, at eleven o'clock at night, as a witness to the execution of this codicil. These workmen wanted money very much on account of their job, especially at Christmas time, yet they could get none: the promise was that they should have some as soon as the deceased was well enough to sign a cheque. Brown, their own witness, says on the fifteenth interrogatory:

"That besides the work he performed under Witchell's contract, he, at the same time, had other jobs in hand for the deceased, the payment of which he looked immediately to her for. In respect of his own private demand against the deceased he several times, in the latter end of the year 1825, applied to Thomas Gay, and also to James King, to get his bill paid: and, in respect of the contract work, he very often about the same time applied to Thomas Witchell. Thomas Gay and Sarah King both said that as soon as Mrs. Brydges was well enough to sign a draft on the banker, the money should be paid; and Witchell said that they had told him the same thing: respondent was very much distressed for want of money."

There are some other material facts illustrative of the state of the deceased. In the latter end of December Sir Harford Jones, who was then staying at Bristol, went over to Hambrook Lodge to visit the deceased, but did not get a sight of her; and Miss King, in her answers, admits the fact, stating:

[267] "That she went up stairs twice to the deceased in her chamber, and informed her that Sir Harford Jones was there, and, upon both occasions, she brought down an answer, as the fact was, that the deceased declined seeing him, saying, she was very poorly and unable to bear talking."

Looking, then, upon this to be true, here, at the end of December, the deceased is so poorly, and so little able to bear talking, that she cannot see the person to whom, above all others, she was most attached—whom she was probably most desirous to see, who was the principal object of her bounty, who was to take her name, and become the representative of her family. The fact is undisputed that he did not see her.

Another circumstance respects Mr. Russell, her solicitor, her man of business, to whom she was constantly applying as long as she was able: up to August she used to go over to Bristol two or three times a week to speak to him; he is since dead, but his nephew, who kept his attendance-book, proves that, in November, his uncle was very anxious to see the deceased, that he went over to Hambrook, and, on his return, said "that Miss King would not allow him to see the deceased." This fact is admitted in her answers to the eighth article:

"The respondent admits that the articulate John Russell did, after the commencement of the aforesaid illness of the testatrix, call at her house at Hambrook on several occasions, as she believes, and make enquiries after her health; and he may have made other applications requesting to know when he might see her, and that he was told by [268] the respondent, and otherwise with her knowledge, on reference first had to the testatrix herself, that she, the testatrix, was not in a state, meaning of bodily health, to see any person on ordinary business, such as that usually transacted between persons in the relation to each other of the deceased and the said John Russell, or to attend to any such business."

Now that is the best way Miss King can soften down this occurrence in her answers; and it is certain that Russell, though he frequently went to Hambrook Lodge, never got access to the deceased after she was confined to her bed; and the day after the execution of the codicil Miss King sent a message to Russell "that Mrs. Brydges was much in the same state, and could not be seen."

These facts infer that the deceased was either so ill and weak as to be unfit for the transaction of ordinary business, or to see her dearest friends; or else there was a fraudulent exclusion of those in whom she had confidence—Sir Harford Jones and Mr. Russell, her solicitor: if her state were such as justified their exclusion, she must have been quite unequal to business; otherwise an interview could only have been denied in order to effect some clandestine purpose.

What, then, is the evidence (and a most important piece of evidence it is) of the only respectable witness—whose visits could not be refused—of Baker, her superior medical attendant; he is the single witness having access to the deceased that is left to Sir Harford Jones, for all others were either shut out, or disqualified by the legacies given them: he is disinterested, and there is no [269] reason to doubt his impartiality; and from his profession he is able to form a sound opinion: he states on the fifth article:

"That he attended the deceased of the illness whereof she died, commencing his visits on the 26th day of October, 1825, and visiting her eight times between that day and the end of the following month of November. During the month of December he visited the deceased about once a week; deponent visited her on the 4th of January, 1826, and from the eleventh day of the same month he visited the deceased every other day until the 21st, when, having occasion to leave home, he did not see her again until the 31st of January, after which he visited her daily until her death. When the deponent commenced his said attendance (on the 26th of October) he found the deceased labouring under visceral disease, to which she had been formerly subject: the complaint now attacked her with increased force, and had a very evident effect upon her bodily strength, and also on the faculties of her mind; both of which, from the commencement of the said attack, began to decline. The deponent only saw the deceased out of bed once (and that in the month of November) during her last illness: and from the reports made to him, and his own knowledge of her debility, he does not believe she ever, after that time, left her bed. From the first of deponent's said attendance (in October) the deceased was more or less lethargic; but, towards the end of December, her lethargy had very much increased; so much so, that he almost always, in his after visits to the deceased, found her dozing, and in a state of stupor, out of which he found a difficulty to rouse her. From [270] the month of October even the deceased's lethargy was such that the deponent did not attempt to enter into conversation with her, as on former occasions he had been accustomed to do, but confined himself to the mere questions which related to her complaint: to these questions, and particularly after the month of December, the deponent had great difficulty in obtaining an answer from the deceased; and when she did give an answer she was frequently corrected by Miss King, her attendant; for instance, as to the number of her evacuations, which the deceased frequently forgot: she also forgot how time passed; this did not much surprize deponent, lying, as the deceased constantly did, in bed, with the window shutters closed, or curtains down: the day-light was excluded: on this account, as he believes, candles were sometimes lighted in her bed-room in the day-time. In the course of the month of December the deceased complained there was a man behind her who was pinching her back" [her sufferings in her back are admitted and described by other witnesses]: "deponent tried to talk her out of this idea; but to no purpose: she declared that she had seen the man: on several subsequent occasions she repeated the same thing. The deceased, on account of long confinement to her bed, contracted an ulceration of the back, which discharged violently, and was one of the causes of her death. Deponent is decidedly of opinion, and believes, that the deceased was quite unable to attend to business after the month of December, 1825; he cannot depose that she was incapable of the least degree of mental application; he does not believe that she was capable of trans-[271]-acting business of a serious nature, or which required mental application, at any time, after the month of October, 1825, He considers that the deceased, if she had been roused, might have been capable of giving an order as relating to her household affairs, until a late period of her life, but not capable of business that required an exertion of the mind. He found it impossible to keep the deceased's mind fixed to a point when he had roused her; for, as soon as she had answered one question, she relapsed into her lethargy, and to pursue his enquiries it was necessary again to excite her."

This seems a very fair representation, and this evidence, from an impartial, disinterested witness—competent to form a correct judgment—and supported by the reasonable probability arising from facts—such as her long illness, her extreme debility, and the dissolution which so soon ensued—leaves the condition of the deceased as to capacity in a state extremely doubtful; and it agrees with Miss King's admitted conduct as to Sir Harford Jones and Mr. Russell not seeing the deceased: it certainly is not so conclusive but that unsuspected witnesses—telling a consistent story—might shew that rousing, aided by self-exertion, would render her equal to a slight testamentary act; but coupled with the character of the deceased—the nature and magnitude of the disposition—the persons in whose behalf that disposition is made—it requires that the credit of the attesting witnesses should stand unimpeached, and above all exception.

I cannot but agree with the counsel that if the story to which those witnesses—at least two of them—depose is fully believed, the codicil is [272] valid: the case, however, as stated at the outset, depends upon their credit.

The three witnesses are—James King, the brother of the party; Mary Cunningham, her intimate friend; and Witchell, a mason, who slept in the house. The credit of the two first, and the effect of the circumstances spoken to by the last, are the material enquiries; and I will first consider Witchell's narrative; in point of character he stands unimpeached, but he was present at so small a part of the transaction that his facts are of little weight: his evidence is of the following tenor:—

"During the two last years of the deceased's life he had been constantly employed by her in and about her residence; and by reason thereof he slept in deceased's house. At about eleven o'clock of the night of the 25th day of January, 1826, deponent, being in bed at the deceased's house, was called up by her servant, Thomas Gay, who told him that Mrs. Brydges desired he would come up into her room to witness a codicil to her will: deponent is certain that it so happened on the 25th of January, because on the next day, the 26th, he received from Miss King, who lived with deceased as her companion, 250l. in part payment of his contract" [this has the appearance of a conciliatory act, as Witchell was much in want of money]: "deponent dressed himself as quickly as he could, and went up into deceased's bed-room; besides the deceased, who was in bed 'pillowed up,' he found there his fellow-witnesses, James King, Mary King, and also Miss King, and Thomas Gay. Deponent, on so entering the bed-room, went round to the bed-side where James [273] King was standing, and Mary Cunningham near him. James King, holding a book with a paper on it before the deceased, asked her 'whether what he had written was to her liking.' The deceased answered, 'Perfectly so,' or 'Quite so.' James King then handed a pen to the deceased, and she wrote her name at the foot of the paper held before her as aforesaid. Having signed it, deceased said to Miss King, 'That will do.' When this was done, James King took the paper to a table near the bed-side, and handed the pen to Mary Cunningham, who signed her name, as did also deponent (the pen being in like manner handed to him by James King), as witnesses; and after them James King himself. After the said paper had been so witnessed, James King read over the clause of attestation to deponent. At this time the deceased asked Miss King whether it was not time for her to take her medicine; and deponent left the room and went to bed again. At the time that James King read the clause of attestation to deponent he also told him that the paper so witnessed was a codicil to the deceased's will, whereby his (King's) sister was left ten thousand pounds."

This witness is then called upon to depose as to capacity; and after identifying the codicil, says:

"Mary Brydges, the deceased, was at the time of her approving of and signing her name to the said paper-writing, or codicil, and during the whole time of deponent being present on the evening or night of the 25th day of January, of sound, perfect, and disposing mind, memory, and understanding, and talked and discoursed (what little deponent heard her say on such occasion) rationally and sensibly."

[274] On the 6th interrogatory he answers—"That the deceased kept her room from about September, 1825, until her death; and she generally kept her bed during that period. Respondent was only once in deceased's bed-room between the November preceding and the time of her death, save the time of the execution of the codicil aforesaid. On such single occasion, and also when the codicil was executed, deceased was in bed: he never saw her between November and her death out of her room; or at any other time than the two occasions deposed of. The respondent never saw the deceased in a state of stupor. On the first of said two occasions of his seeing deceased in her bed, which happened, as he believes and best recollects, in the November preceding her death, the deceased sent for him, and gave him directions for raising a wall. On the latter occasion she executed the codicil. At the time she executed the codicil her head hung heavily; but she acted, as it appeared to respondent, entirely of her own accord, without being roused thereto, or shewing unwillingness or irritation."

And on the 7th interrogatory—"He cannot recollect that he saw the deceased on any other than the two occasions deposed of between the end of October, 1825, and her death, and he believes that he did not: on both such occasions the deceased's mental faculties did not appear to him to be, and he believes the same not to have been, weakened, nor her memory impaired. Respondent forming his belief on what passed between himself and the deceased, and on what was done by her on the two occasions deposed of, swears to his positive belief that the deceased was, at such times, in a [275] condition to attend to the business which was then spoken about and transacted; and he knows not, and never heard, and has no reason to believe, that the faculties of the deceased ever failed her so as to unfit her for business."

The whole of this account given by Witchell, and the facts, prove nothing that can, I think, be deemed at all sufficient: what passed might as well apply to a draft as to a codicil: all he hears the deceased say respecting the paper is "Quite so," and "That will do"—all he sees her do is writing a paper on a book; but it seems to me by no means clear that he could see whether there was any signing at all of the codicil, or of any other paper—it is not impossible that an imposition and contrivance were practised on this drowsy person just called from his bed. How are the parties placed, according to James King's own account, on the seventeenth interrogatory? Sarah King is standing close to the deceased, one hand behind the pillow, the other holding the candle—James King is next to her, fronting the deceased, holding the book deskwise (that is sloping up), of course leaning over the bed—Cunningham next to him fronting the deceased—Witchell next to her also fronting the deceased; so that there were four persons standing by the side of the bed, and Witchell was the furthest from the deceased, and must have been near the bottom: it is hardly possible that he could see the actual writing—scarcely the paper—so as to distinguish what it was —whether a codicil or a draft, or whether any thing was in fact written—still less whether the name was previously written, and a mere dry pen put into the deceased's hand. Whether there is [276] room for the Court to suspect any such deception must be decided on a view of the case in all its bearings; but in a clandestine transaction at midnight, where parties are helping themselves, they are exposed to all suspicions: I only say that it is not impossible that no signature was then made; they must remove all doubts: the effect of Witchell's testimony, giving him full credit for honest intentions, goes but a short way towards proving capacity; he was suddenly called up, and was only in the room about five minutes: he speaks to no act of reading over, to no act of sealing, to no desire that any person should attest, to no words of publication—"She said little—her head hung heavily."

It comes, then, to the evidence of the brother, and of the female friend of the person principally benefited; and, under all the circumstances already adverted to, it would be hardly safe to trust to the statement of such biassed witnesses. It is said that it was not improbable the deceased might wish to employ the brother of Miss King to draw up this codicil; and perhaps it would not have been if the alteration had been slight; but if she intended to make an alteration to such an extent—to revoke, so materially, the bequests to Sir Harford Jones—it would have been more consistent with the shrewd and cautious character of the deceased to have had professional assistance—either her own confidential solicitor, Mr. Russell, or, at least, some other attorney. On the other hand, if a fraudulent imposition were intended, professional aid would be carefully excluded: Miss King and these parties would only trust her brother and her friend to prove the im-[277]-portant facts: nor would they venture to have respectable neighbours, nor disinterested persons to attest; they would not place the transaction in the middle of the day, they would choose the hour approaching to midnight, and would call the mason out of bed merely to be present at the signature and nothing more: the persons engaged, and the time chosen, are at least as consistent with fraud as with fairness; and the whole has a most suspicious appearance.

Another circumstance, with respect to time, strikes me as pointing to fraud; the preparation, and execution, took place during the absence of Baker; he had attended the deceased from the 26th of October, 1825, eight times by the end of November—about once a week in December—on the 4th of January; but from the 11th to the 21st of January his visits had been on every second day; and it is to his opinion, and not to Hay's, that Miss King refers in writing to Sir Harford Jones on the 14th of January, in the letter already mentioned. On the 21st of January Baker had occasion to leave home, and did not return till the 31st: this ten days' absence, during which his visits on alternate days were discontinued, could hardly have been unknown to these parties; the time was opportunely selected for obtaining this codicil—the deed was done during the absence of this medical attendant—the only disinterested person who had access to the deceased.

The time chosen, then, added to the other circumstances, tends considerably to increase the suspicion, and to excite the doubts and jealousy, of [278] the Court: nor is that suspicion much diminished by that which has much been relied on, viz. Hay's telling Baker on his return "that Mrs. Brydges had repeatedly enquired for him, that she was desirous of their joint opinion whether she could recover; that he had given his opinion she could not:" and Miss King's declaration "that the deceased had become quite resigned; and repeatedly regretted the respondent's absence."

In the first place, this is at variance with the deceased's unwillingness to see Baker; but, in the next place, the assertions of Hay and Miss King are no proof that such an enquiry was ever made by the deceased. Hay was aware of the codicil before the deceased's death, and it is not likely that his 1000*l.* legacy was concealed from him; whether he was or was not actually a party to the making of the codicil—whether he represented the enquiry to have been made by the deceased herself directly to him, or through Miss King, does not appear: the latter is consistent with the evidence of Baker on the eighteenth interrogatory:—

"When the respondent resumed his attendance on the deceased on the 31st of January Mr. Hay told him, as Miss King did also, that the deceased had repeatedly enquired for him in his absence; and that she was desirous of having respondent's and Mr. Hay's opinion as to the probability of her recovery. Mr. Hay said that he had given it as his opinion that she could not recover; and Miss King said that the deceased had, since that communication, become resigned. He does not recollect that it was said that the deceased was much [279] affected at the report of her danger. Miss King said that deceased had repeatedly regretted respondent's absence."

If a fraud had been effected, Miss King, aware that a codicil was to make its appearance, would be anxious to pave the way for it, and to suggest circumstances that should render it more probable, and be a sort of announcement of the act, such as representations of the deceased's resignation: while, on the other hand, if all had been fair, and the deceased quite capable, why did they not disclose to Baker that a codicil had been made, even though they did not mention the contents? why did they not take the first moment, on the 31st of January, to desire Baker to see the deceased, to satisfy himself that she was capable, and if possible to rouse her, and to remind her of the transaction, and get a recognition that she had done some testamentary act? but they never said a word on the subject till two days before her death, and I therefore do think that those declarations to Baker might be nothing more than a mere colourable preparation for the production of the codicil; they are not inconsistent with the incapacity of the deceased, and the fraudulent procuring of this codicil—they tend but little to remove suspicions.

I approach, then, the other two attesting witnesses, the chief of whom, the writer of the codicil, is James King, the brother of the principal legatee, a young man twenty-six years of age, an accountant or clerk to a merchant at Bristol; his salary is 70l. a year, and he has perquisites that make it amount to 100l.: owing to some family misfortunes, about ten years ago, he went into service for a year and a half, he then became [280] a clerk in a counting-house for several years, and subsequently, after having been at home for some time, he has been for four years in his present employment. There is nothing in this to the discredit—it is rather to the credit of his steadiness and abilities: that his abilities are not inconsiderable may be collected, not only from his success in life, but also from his deposition: he is not stupid, nor ignorant, so as to be incapable of conducting such a transaction, whether the transaction was fair, or whether it was a contrived fraud and conspiracy; but it is one thing to be equal to trump up a plausible story; and another—and far more difficult—to make it probable, and consistent in all its branches, more especially where it is necessary to have colleagues, who are to fit in the different parts to each other, and yet to avoid the appearance of confederacy: they may preconcert some of the main features, but, if the story be not true, detection will unexpectedly peep out in some collateral or incidental points which had not been sufficiently arranged.

By these tests I propose to examine the evidence, and shall begin with the account given by James King, and then proceed to that given by Mary Cunningham. The Court will see what improbabilities, what contradictions, what circumstances of suspicion there are, and whether, on the whole, it can venture to repose full confidence in their testimony. I may first observe that King is not merely a brother giving evidence for a sister, but he is the manager of the suit; he applied to every witness, and was active in procuring their attendance; it is his own act, his own cause; if Miss King fails, it is difficult to say that he [281] may not be responsible for the expences; but, at least, his credit must be strictly examined: he states:

"That having been sent for in the middle of the day of the twenty-fourth of January, he arrived at Hambrook Lodge about seven o'clock in the evening; he took some refreshment, and was then fetched into the deceased's bed-room: his sister, Gay, and the maid-servant were in the room, but the latter soon left it."

He goes on making the deceased in the most perfect mind, not only full of intelligence but of activity and alacrity:

"The deceased, on perceiving deponent, who went up to the bed-side, said to him, 'Mr. King, I have been waiting for you; I am glad you are come, for I have a great deal upon my mind which I must do before my death: you know what I have often promised to your sister, and I cannot think of leaving her to the mercy of Sir Harford Jones after my death: I have sent for you for the purpose of penning down what I wish to do for your sister, Thomas Gay, and those friends who have been so kind and attentive to me during my illness: I am sensible that I cannot recover, and my doctor, Mr. Hay, has told me that I cannot possibly live many days; I, therefore, wish you to sit down, and write what I shall tell you.'"

Now all this is very good, if it be true; but it makes the deceased of a very perfect and alert understanding at this time.

"Deponent, in reply, told the deceased that he was incompetent to perform what she required of him, as he had never done such a thing as to make a will, and he was quite ignorant of the form of [282] words which were (as he believed) necessary to be used in drawing up such an instrument; that if it was her intention to alter, or add to, her will, she had better send for Mr. Russell (meaning deceased's attorney) as a proper person for the purpose."

This, again, is very fair, if it is but true.

"The deceased said in answer that she had a reason for not sending for Mr. Russell; it was because she did not choose all the world to know, before her death, what her intentions were"

She had, however, trusted Mr. Russell to make a codicil for her in April.

"Deponent rejoined, saying, 'he thought it would be illegal for him to do it' (meaning to make deceased's will or codicil): she replied, 'Not so, you are fully competent to write anything I may tell you, and were I to call in a stranger passing in the street to write it, it would be as legal as if done by Mr. Russell.' Deponent then consented, and sat down at a table close to deceased's bed-side, upon which the deceased directed Sarah King (who with Thomas Gay had been present during the aforesaid conversation) to fetch pen, ink, and paper. As soon as the deponent was furnished with the materials for writing, and ready to begin, the deceased, sitting up in bed supported by pillows, without further preface, began to dictate, and dictated, 'I, Mary Brydges, of Hambrook Grove, in the County of Gloucester, spinster, do, in addition to my will'—which the deponent committed to writing."

He was quite ignorant of the law, but he follows her dictation.

"Either at this period, or before the deponent [283] began to write (he cannot now be certain which), the deceased gave Sarah King, his sister, her keys, and desired her to go and fetch 'the codicil, made by Mr. Russell, for your brother's government.' Sarah King accordingly left the room, and in about five minutes returned with the codicil now marked B, dated on the 15th of April, 1825: when Sarah King brought in the said codicil she handed it to the deceased, who thereon desired that it might be given to deponent; this done, the deceased proceeded, saying, 'I must begin with your sister,' and she then dictated the words—'I give and bequeath to my sincere friend, Sarah King, the sum of ten thousand pounds,' which the deponent committed to writing; and, referring to the codicil B, added therefrom the words, 'to be paid to her, her heirs, executors, and administrators:' the deceased went on—'and also my gold watch and chain, and my little dog,' which deponent also wrote down, as he likewise did the further words dictated by the deceased in respect of such legacy to his sister, namely, 'for her long and kind attention,' or to such effect. The deceased then dictated a legacy of one hundred pounds to Eliza King, and to John King one hundred pounds and her bay colt, which deponent reduced into writing. She next dictated a legacy of one thousand pounds to John Hay, calling him, in addition, 'her medical attendant, for his kindness and unremitting attention,' or words to that effect, which deponent wrote down; and deceased, adverting to a circumstance wherein Mr. Hay had assisted her with a loan of money, asked deponent 'whether he recollected it, and further said how attentive Mr. Hay had been in his visits.' The deceased next [284] dictated a legacy of fifteen hundred pounds to Thomas Gay, calling him 'her faithful servant;' which legacy deponent also reduced into writing, as he did the further bequest to him of a grey carriage-mare and a cart: after this the deceased went on to speak in terms of commendation of Thomas Gay—'that she made such bequest in consequence of his long services, and the accident he had met with' (which deponent believes to be a rupture). Deceased then said that she must consider her other servants, and directed him to set them down for thirty pounds a-piece, which he did. The deceased next said 'that she wished to name him, the deponent;' on which he observed 'that he could not be a legal witness to the codicil if she did so.'" He was, therefore, learned in law in that respect.

"The deceased replied 'she was sorry for it;' and observed that that (meaning what she had dictated) was all she had to say. The deponent then said that he would read to the deceased what, from her dictation, he had written; and did audibly and distinctly read the same all over to her in the presence of his said sister and Thomas Gay, who had been present during the dictation aforesaid, or nearly the whole time thereof, one or the other occasionally leaving the room, but for short intervals only. The deceased, during the reading, from time to time said, 'Very good,' and nodded her head, and smiled, and generally, by such her expressions and manner, approved of the contents of the paper: having ended the reading, the deceased desired him to make a fair copy of the paper, and added, 'We must have it properly attested:' and said 'that she wished the depo-[285]-nent, Thomas Witchell, and Mary Cunningham (who were both in the house) to witness it. The deponent then immediately proceeded to make and made a fair copy of the draft so approved of, and having completed it, he read it over to the deceased aloud, and then at her desire handed it to her: the deceased, sitting up in bed, read it to herself, and in so doing observed 'that she doubted whether she had sufficient money unappropriated to pay the legacies she had thereby bequeathed, and then directed deponent to write down that the legacies she had given by the said paper were to be paid out of the legacy of thirty or thirty-five thousand pounds (he forgets which) bequeathed by her will to Sir Harford Jones.' The deponent accordingly added at the foot of the draft a clause to the effect dictated by the deceased, and having done so, he read over to her the said additional clause in an audible and distinct manner, and she approved thereof in general terms, adding 'that it was too late, and that she was too much fatigued, for a fair copy to be made that night.' The deceased also desired the deponent 'to destroy the fair copy made as aforesaid (which he did by putting it into the fire in deceased's bed-room), and to take the said draft away with him, and bring it fairly copied to her the next day;' and then told Sarah King to carry 'Mr. Russell's codicil' back to where she took it from. The deponent then having first drawn, at the deceased's desire, a cheque upon her banker for the sum of three hundred and twenty-five pounds, in favor of his sister Sarah King, to pay the various sums due to the deceased's tradesmen, took his leave." Here is also inserted on the [286] margin of this deposition the following passage:—"Having first, on a separate paper, copied from the codicil, marked B, the form of words to be used as revocatory of Sir Harford Jones' legacy, which form the deponent, with a slight variation, adopted in making the copy to be deposed of." That explanation was rather necessary, because the revocatory clause in the two instruments are expressed in the same words.

Now, in this representation, for this is the account of what passed on the night when the instructions were taken, there is as alert a testatrix as fancy can suppose: she enters into long conversations, and explanations, and dictates every part of the paper. James King was so ignorant of forms that he was unwilling at first to draw up the instrument, and as Miss King, in her affidavit of scripts before the commencement of the cause, swore that the deceased had dictated it, James King is anxious, in every part of his deposition, to shew that the whole proceeded from her: she was not only mentally but bodily alert; she is alive to every thing that is going forward—she not only sends for her former codicil, but she hands the keys—the former codicil is delivered to her—so that she must have had the free use of her hands and arms; she not only from time to time during the reading says "Very good," but in spite of the dreadful state of her back she nods her head and smiles—afterwards James King makes a fair copy, and reads it to the deceased—then, at her desire, hands it to her, and she, sitting up in her bed, reads it over to herself; there is not the slightest apparent difficulty either in sitting up, or reading the paper over; there is no allusion to the darkness of the [287] room, or to the candle-light, and there is no mention of any spectacles in this part of the evidence. The instrument itself, marked D, is in a small and rather cramped hand, and it begins in these terms:—

"I the undersigned Mary Brydges Spinster of H. G. in the Parish of Winterborn County of Glocester in addition to my last will dated the ——— day of ——— do now in sound mind and intellect make this codicil."

This is the commencement of the codicil, and it is quite fairly and regularly written; it hardly needs a correction, except the introduction of the formal words of the "parish of Winterborn," and of "spinster:" and the deceased was so capable that she could dictate a paper of this description without its requiring any alteration.

Having disposed of these legacies—amounting altogether to 13,000l.—she begins to doubt whether she had sufficient to pay them without reducing the legacy to Sir Harford Jones of 35,000l. stock to 20,000l. stock. Now the deceased was worth between 50,000l. and 60,000l.; was shrewd, and well acquainted with her concerns, and she had only disposed, by her will, of about 3000l., in addition to the bequest to Sir Harford Jones: it was strange, then, that she should doubt, but it is not strange that the Kings should not be quite aware of, the extent of her property, and should think it more safe to reduce that legacy. This revocatory alteration rendered a fresh copy necessary, but the deceased, becoming fatigued, desired it to be made the next day; the fair copy, which had been written prior to the change in [288] the amount of Sir Harford Jones' legacy being thought of, was unfortunately destroyed; why it should have been, no satisfactory reason appears. She was not, however, so fatigued but that she could sign a cheque for 325l.—a large sum—and, if this story of the draft were true, it, collaterally, would support the capacity; at all events, as I have before remarked, the money was very convenient and therefore conciliatory to Witchell.

Now I do feel a great difficulty in bringing up my moral conviction to a belief of all these circumstances, considering the condition of the deceased. What part of them may be true I cannot undertake to say: but that none of them were thrown in for the purpose of giving the deceased the appearance of more volition and capacity than she possessed at that time, I cannot persuade myself; and unless I can believe the whole, I must not rely on any part: it is not enough if the Court is not convinced that the witnesses are beyond suspicion; and, in my judgment, the credit of this witness is shaken.

The next morning James King draws out an A B sketch, and shews it to his friend Day, a lawyer, who suggests a few verbal alterations; that A B form is not produced, nor is Mr. Day examined. In the middle of the day, on January the 25th, James King is again sent for to come to the deceased immediately: it is a little extraordinary that he should be sent for, as the deceased had, the night before, desired him to copy the codicil and bring it over with him, and it is not stated that she had become worse: the reason too assigned for not going—that he was busy at the counting-house of his employers—when his sister [289] and the other legatees might lose their legacies by an unexpected death, is not very satisfactory nor probable: he could not even attend to business of such importance as a codicil giving a legacy of 10,000l. to his sister, of 1500l. to Gay, of 1000l. to Hay, nor even, so far as appears, make an application to his employer to release him from their counting-house for half a day!

Again, he does not get to Hambrook Lodge till eight o'clock in the evening: the deceased was then asleep and he could not see her till ten: "At about ten o'clock the deponent, being desired, went up to the deceased, whom he found sitting in bed propped up as before with pillows: he had with him the draft and the fair copy. The deceased, on seeing him, complained that she had been sitting up to receive him, and of his having disappointed her: on explaining that business had detained him she was satisfied. The deceased then enquired 'whether he had completed the paper she had given him instructions for the day before:' deponent said 'that he had, and hoped it was properly done:' the deceased replied 'she hoped so too.' He then, from his pocket, produced the aforesaid draft and fair copy, and proposed that he should read the copy to her, to which she assented: in the mean time the purpose of deponent's coming being known, Thomas Gay, who announced him, went to call Thomas Witchell, who had gone to bed in the house; and deponent's sister had brought Mary Cunningham into deceased's room as witnesses; deponent, in the presence of Mary Cunningham and of his said sister and Thomas Gay, read the fair copy aforesaid all over to the deceased in an audible and distinct [290] manner, and having done so he enquired of her whether the same was agreeable to her intention? and she answered, 'Perfectly so, that nothing could be better!' Deponent then handed the said fair copy, and also the draft aforesaid, to the deceased, who herself then perused the said copy with evident tokens of approbation; saying, here and there, 'Very good,' and nodding her head by way of assent: previous to commencing the reading the deponent proposed waiting until Thomas Witchell was dressed and present, but the deceased said it was of no consequence: Thomas Witchell had come in and was present at the time that the deceased, in answer to deponent's enquiry whether she approved of the said fair copy, approved of the same. The deceased having thus perused the said paper enquired whether the witnesses were ready" [now this was after Witchell was in the room]; "the deponent said that they were; and to facilitate the execution of the said paper, got a music-book, upon which he laid the paper, and handed a pen to the deceased, he holding the music-book and paper thereon in a convenient position, and his sister, Sarah King, a candle, the deceased signed her name at the foot of the paper, in their presence, and in the presence of Thomas Witchell and Mary Cunningham, and also of Thomas Gay. Having completed her signature, the deceased handed the pen to Sarah King, asking her whether that (her subscription) would do. Before the deceased had signed her name, and in the act of signing it, she said aloud, 'Now witness my hand.' The paper being so signed, the deceased desired the deponent to seal it, which he did in her presence, making an im-[291]-pression of deceased's own seal on black wax: when this was done, the deceased, addressing herself to deponent, in the presence of the several persons aforesaid, said, 'Now let this or it be properly attested.' He then read to Mary Cunningham and Thomas Witchell the clause of attestation, and he moreover to Thomas Witchell, on account of his absence when the paper was read to the deceased, explained to him that such paper, which he had been sent for to see executed, was a codicil to the deceased's will, whereby she had bequeathed ten thousand pounds to his (deponent's) sister, and some minor legacies to other persons. The said Mary Cunningham, next Thomas Witchell, and lastly the deponent, in the presence of each other and of the deceased, then severally subscribed the clause of attestation as witnesses of the execution of the codicil. The deceased appearing fatigued, and expressing a desire to take her medicine, deponent and the other witnesses left the room, leaving the codicil on the table: he brought away with him the draft thereof."

The same observations will apply to this account as to that of the preceding night respecting the great alertness and readiness of the deceased. It is strange that, as King came on purpose to have this codicil executed, and as Witchell was talked of the night before as a witness, that he should be allowed to go to bed. James King, indeed, says, Witchell came into the room on the night of the 24th; but that is contradicted by Witchell; but why was he suffered to go to bed when James King arrived at eight o'clock, and the immediate execution was only prevented by the deceased being asleep? It looks as if it were [292] a contrivance that he should see as little as possible of the transaction—the bare act of signing: and some things are declared to have passed after his entrance to which he does not depose, such as the deceased enquiring whether the witnesses were ready, to which James King answered, they were; such as in the act of signing, her saying aloud, "Now witness my hand;" such as her desiring the paper to be sealed, the sealing it in her presence, her saying, "Now let this be properly attested." All these circumstances are thrown in by King, and are not mentioned by Witchell, but are, in a degree, contradicted; for he swears "deceased said but little, and her head hung heavily."

The Court is perfectly aware that some witnesses will recollect what others do not bear in mind; and will sometimes place the parts of the transaction in a different order and detail; and, therefore, it does not rely much on these variations alone; but the important details and remarks stand, at least, on the uncorroborated testimony of James King: so far as Witchell is concerned, he does not confirm him in these particulars. In chief, King speaks of the sealing being by the desire of the deceased, and before the attestation—the paper itself shews that was not the fact—the seal was affixed, beyond all question, after it was attested, for the wax has run over the first letter of Bristol after Cunningham's name. On the 27th interrogatory King says:—

"The seal on the codicil in question was affixed thereto after Mary Cunningham had subscribed her name as a witness."

Whether, on seeing the codicil to identify it [293] at the end of his examination, he perceived that the seal had run over the writing, the Court is not aware, but the very positive and particular way in which he deposes, in chief, on this point is clearly at variance with the fact:—

"The paper being signed by the deceased, she desired the deponent to seal it, which he did: the deceased then said, 'Now let this or it be properly attested!'"

Here, then, is a direct contradiction between his evidence in chief, and on interrogatory; and it is open to suspicion that this variation arose from his observing the seal when he identified the instrument; (a) or it may be that, when he was cross-examined he forgot how he had told his story in his deposition: he was examined in chief on the twenty-eighth of November; and, upon interrogatories, on the fourth and fifth of December—at all events this leads to an inference that truth is not the foundation of his deposition, for truth is uniform and consistent.

Before proceeding to consider more particularly the circumstances respecting the draft, I shall examine the evidence of the other subscribed witness, Mary Cunningham, as far as it applies to the factum: she is a young woman of the age of twenty-five years, the daughter of a tin-japan manufacturer, in Redcliffe-street, Bristol, residing with her parents at Hill's-bridge Parade, and [294] "she commonly goes out during the day to work with ladies at their own houses; she does so more for the sake of employment than profit." This, though not very material, appears in her answer to the first interrogatory; she is a great friend of Miss King, who, according to James King's answer to the third interrogatory, has been residing for the last six months at the house of Cunningham's parents. If there was confederation between the parties to support this codicil, she would be taught to make the deceased very active in originating the transaction, as James King made her active in giving the instructions, and in the execution. Here again, therefore, the Court must look to the probability, and to the consistencies of the different parts of her own evidence, and to its accordancy with, or discrepancy from, that of James King.

"Deponent was acquainted with Mary Brydges, late of Hambrook Grove, during the two years next preceding, and until her death: she made such acquaintance by going to visit Sarah King, who, between two and three years, and until deceased's death, resided with her as her companion. In the course of deponent's acquaintance with the deceased she was in the habit of staying at Hambrook Grove, on a visit, for a week or ten days at a time."

Yet James King had never seen her there, and the workmen about the house never knew of the existence of such a person.

"Deponent and Sarah King had for several years previously been intimate friends: deponent was visiting and staying at the deceased's house aforesaid from the 22d or 23d day of January last [295] past until the 26th of the same month. Deponent, the said Sarah King, and Thomas Gay, the deceased's man-servant, being together in deceased's bed-room (she being confined to her bed) in the morning part of the said 24th day of January, the deceased desired Thomas Gay 'to send Carpenter (who was employed in the stables and grounds) to Mr. James King, at Bristol, for that she wanted to see him on particular business.' At about ten o'clock in the evening of the same day the deponent, who was sitting in Miss King's bed-room, received a message from the deceased, brought her by Miss King, saying 'that Mrs. B. (meaning the deceased) wanted her.' Deponent accordingly went into the deceased's bed-room, Miss King going with her: they found the deceased lying down in bed, and James King with writing materials before him at a table by the bed-side. Thomas Gay was also in the room. The deceased was conversing in a low tone of voice, she being very feeble, with James King, and she also said something to Miss King, who had gone, on entering the room, to the bed-side, whilst deponent remained at the fire; deponent did not hear, not taking notice, what the deceased then said to James King and his sister. When deceased had finished speaking to them, which occupied but a minute or two, she addressed herself to the deponent (who advanced to the bed-side), saying, 'My dear, I wish you to witness this codicil that I am now making in favour of my dear Miss King.' Deponent said, 'Certainly, Ma'am.' The deceased, whilst so speaking, held in her hand a paper, which had just previously been given her by James King."

James King does not say one word about this.

[296] "The deceased just about the same time was raised up in bed by Miss King, who propped her up with pillows."

According to James King she was propped up when he first entered.

"And so sitting up, the deceased, to herself, read over, using spectacles, the paper so handed to her by James King, while Sarah King stood by, holding a candle to light her, the other candle remaining on the table where James King had been writing. When the deceased had looked over the said paper she, speaking to James King, said that she thought there was not money enough besides 'the thirty-five thousand pounds.' The deceased said much more to James King on that occasion, referring to the paper she had read over, than deponent can now recollect; but she well recollects that the tenor of what deceased said was that she had not money to satisfy the legacies mentioned in the said paper, without deducting the same from what she had already bequeathed by her will. From what then passed between the deceased and James King, deponent found that the said paper would not do, and that she would not be wanted to witness it, and therefore left the room."

So that on the evening of the twenty-fourth this witness was only present for a short time—she came in after the paper dictated had been copied, and she left the room before the alteration in respect to the 35,000l.: nothing about the cheque passed in her presence. She goes on:

"The following day, the 25th of January, she heard the deceased (being in her bed-room) desire Thomas Gay (also there) to send 'Thomas' (meaning Thomas Carpenter) for Mr. King: this hap-[297]-pened about noon. At about eleven o'clock at night (of the same day) Sarah King came to deponent, who was sitting in her (King's) bed-room, and said that Mrs. Brydges wanted her. They went into the deceased's bed-room together. Deponent found James King (of whose arrival she had heard ever since eight o'clock) and Thomas Gay already in the room: the deceased was lying down in bed."

This witness differs as to that fact from what James King deposes.

"Deponent went up to deceased's bed-side and asked her how she was: she said, 'Much the same;' and added, 'she had sent for her (deponent) to witness a codicil she had made:' deceased used the very words, 'to witness a codicil that I have made in favour of my dear Sarah King and other persons who have been so particularly kind to me during my illness; as I cannot die happy without leaving them something; and what I am doing is not enough to repay them for their kindness—especially my dear child'—meaning by 'my dear child' the said Sarah King, of whom she frequently spoke by that appellation. The deceased then said to Sarah King, 'My dear, tell Thomas (meaning Thomas Gay, who was standing by the window) to call Witchell.'"

James King says nothing of this long conversation—nothing of this declaration—not a very probable one at such a transaction.

"After waiting two or three minutes, the deceased desired James King, who was by the bed-side towards the fire (the curtains being on that side withdrawn, as the same were at the foot of the bed), to read the codicil, or words to that effect; he, James King, having, when so spoken to, the [298] codicil to be deposed of in his hand. She, at the same time, desired him not to wait for Witchell, as it was quite sufficient that deponent was present. James King then, in an audible and distinct manner, read the said codicil all over from beginning to end: while he was reading, the deceased, two or three times, said, 'Perfectly right'—'it is just as I wished it:' and when the reading was over the deceased (who in the mean time had been raised, as before, into a sitting posture, and supported by pillows) took the paper into her own hand, and to herself read it over. It was about this time that Witchell (who slept in the house and had gone to bed) came into the room; she believes Gay had shortly preceded him. Deceased desired Witchell 'to come round,' meaning to the bed-side, which he did; and then said to him, 'I wish you to witness this codicil to my will:' the codicil was then either in deceased's hand or on the bed: the deceased then asked 'whether all was ready,' upon which James King placed the codicil on a music-book and held it in a convenient position (desk-wise) before the deceased, and handed a pen to her, while Miss King held a candle, standing close to the deceased, and deponent and Witchell close by, and in front of the deceased; who then signed her name at the foot of the paper, and having done so, said to Miss King, 'Will that do, my dear?' Mr. King then removed the book, and took the codicil, so signed, to a table standing in the pier between the windows fronting the foot of the bed, where the curtains were undrawn, so that the deceased could see what was done there, and the candles were removed from the table at the bed-side to the pier-table. James King having pointed out to the deponent [299] the place, she signed her name as a witness to the codicil: he then handed the pen to Witchell, and read to him the clause of attestation, and told him that the paper was a codicil to the deceased's will; that it had been read over in deponent's presence, and that the deceased had thereby left his sister (Sarah King) ten thousand pounds, besides other legacies: Witchell then subscribed his name, and after him James King. Previous to the deceased signing her codicil she desired James King to affix a seal to it; and at the same time desired Sarah King to fetch her (the deceased's) seal, with which, being brought, he, with black sealing-wax, made an impression thereon. Witchell left the room as soon as he had subscribed the codicil. Deponent herself, in a minute or two, after hearing the deceased desire Sarah King not to let her fall asleep without giving her her medicine, returned to Miss King's room, leaving James and Sarah King and Thomas Gay with the deceased."

As to the capacity of the deceased, the same witness deposes:

"The testatrix was, on the 24th and also on the said 25th days of January, at the time of her giving instructions for a codicil to her will, and at the time of her executing the codicil, and on all previous and subsequent occasions of deponent being present with her, of sound, perfect, and disposing mind, memory, and understanding, and talked and discoursed rationally and sensibly, and well knew and understood what she then said and did."

She says in a further part of her evidence on the seventh interrogatory:

"She knows not, and does not believe, that the mental faculties of the deceased were weakened from [300] the latter end of October, 1825, or that her memory became impaired. The only difference respondent perceived in the deceased, from the first of her acquaintance with her until her death, was the alteration in her bodily health, and bodily weakness resulting therefrom."

So that in point of capacity there was no diminution of it from the time of her first acquaintance with the deceased.

In this part, again, Cunningham makes the deceased very alert—desiring Gay to send for James King about noon, but assigning no particular reason—nor was it very probable, as she had appointed him the night before: she describes the deceased as very much alive about Miss King—and very minute in her reasons for giving her 10,000l.; she states several circumstances after Witchell came into the room which Witchell does not confirm—she, in chief, places the sealing with great particularity, even before the signing of the deceased; and she asserts that the deceased, at all times, both before and after, was in a state of perfect capacity: it is not a case, therefore, of temporary drowsiness and stupor, with a power on special occasions of rousing herself to exertion. If this witness' account be true, it is extremely difficult to say that Baker's evidence is not false, but the latter is much supported by many unquestioned facts. In respect to the sealing, she also, like the other witness, very soon contradicts her deposition in chief. In answer to the third interrogatory, she says:

"The word or addition 'Bristol' following her subscription is of her own handwriting. She cannot recollect whether James King sealed the [301] codicil before or after respondent had subscribed her name and addition aforesaid: she well recollects that the codicil was sealed at the table standing between the windows, and by direction of the deceased; respondent being shewn the codicil, cannot be certain whether the same was sealed before or after her subscription."

Now she was examined in chief on the 30th of November, and to this part of the interrogatories on the 1st of December: she and James King and Miss King were all living together in the same house—the better recollection of Cunningham does then excite some suspicion that she had had some conference with James King. This witness and James King certainly agree in the general description of the deceased, and in some leading circumstances, but they are such as might have been preconcerted; though, even in some of these, they differ in several particulars: but where such a confederacy exists it will, more probably and more decidedly, be detected upon some collateral broad fact than upon the transaction itself. Here is a collateral circumstance, on which they were not likely to be so well prepared. James King, on the twelfth interrogatory, says:

"On the 24th day of January, or night thereof, the deceased herself examined several bills and accounts, and her banker's book, previous to her desiring respondent to draw a cheque for her, as deposed of in chief."

On a subsequent interrogatory, the 15th, he answers:

"That the cheque, being the exhibit No. 1, shewn to him, was signed by the deceased in his presence on the night of the 24th day of a January, [302] and by him was presented to her for such purpose, not immediately after the execution of the codicil in question, nor on the evening of the execution thereof, but immediately after the codicil or copy made from the instructions taken down in writing, deposed of in chief, had been destroyed. The deceased next day used the same inkstand when she executed her codicil as was used by her when she signed the cheque."

This fixes the time of drawing the draft to the night of the 24th.

On the thirty-fifth interrogatory he answers:

"That he drew the cheque by order of the deceased. Previous to naming the sum to be drawn for she had various bills and accounts before her, as she sat up in bed: she looked the same over, and herself named the amount to be drawn for, and directed that the cheque was to be made payable to the producent. The deceased did not say any thing by which it appeared whether she did or did not know the balance of cash she had in the hands of her banker."

On the next interrogatory he says:

"That among the bills and papers which the deceased examined, previous to her ordering the cheque to be drawn, was Gay's account book, in which were entered sundry house and other expences defrayed by him, among which, when due, he inserted his wages. Nothing was said, at the time deceased signed the cheque, as to the amount of Gay's wages, or the sundries for which he was to be repaid. The sundries, amounting to 42l. 13s. 9d., were set forth in an account book kept by the producent: the deceased herself looked over the bills referred to in Gay's book, and in [303] that of the producent: having done so, she desired respondent to add up what the same and 250l. to Witchell would amount to: he did so, and handed his calculation on a scrap of paper to the deceased, who looked over it, and then ordered him to draw for the amount of the total."

James King, then, directly binds himself down to this cheque being drawn on the evening of the 24th, after Cunningham had quitted the room; for it was after it had been determined not to have the codicil copied for execution that night. Here is a long and intricate transaction, in which the deceased is most minute and active, as if she were in perfect health; the time and the circumstances are positively fixed and accurately described; if true, here was capacity abundantly sufficient for a testamentary act—if true, I say—but it certainly is not very probable nor consistent, though she was so anxious about this codicil, yet so fatigued she could not wait to have it copied, that still she was so little fatigued that she could go through all this settlement of accounts, examining various vouchers, when, for two months before, Witchell, although very eager for it (particularly about Christmas) could get no money, because the deceased was too weak to sign a draft: but this is a collateral matter; and, if the codicil be not founded in truth, it is upon such a matter that the Court would expect the most striking contradiction to arise. It is necessary, then, to examine Cunningham's account of this exhibit: in chief, of course, she says nothing about it; because, if drawn at all, it was after she had quitted the room; it is on the twelfth interrogatory she speaks to this paper:

[304] "She never knew the deceased to be averse to parting with money, or to pay small sums: the deceased was very charitable: the exhibit or cheque marked No. 1 was signed by the deceased in her (respondent's) presence and that of Miss King, and of no one else as she now best recollects, on the 25th of January, in the course of the day, and before dinner time (six o'clock), as she now best recollects, and verily believes. At the time the deceased was signing the cheque she (deceased) and Miss King were in close conversation, so that respondent, standing near the window, did not hear or attend to what was then said. In the course of the same morning [namely, the 25th], and previous to her signing said cheque, the deceased, in respondent's presence and hearing, asked Miss King for Witchell's bills in order that she might know what she ought to draw for." On a further part of that interrogatory "respondent is not sure whether the said cheque is or is not filled up and endorsed by James King: she is not well acquainted with his hand-writing: she thinks it very likely to be of his hand-writing, because the deceased often employed him in matters of business, as she has heard and believes."

The witness therefore could not have been present when the draft was drawn, because it was filled up and endorsed by James King.

"She knows not whether the deceased did or did not sign the cheque with the same pen and ink as was used by her afterwards in subscribing the codicil: respondent was not taking notice at the time deceased signed the cheque: she did not actually see the deceased sign it; but saw her writing, Miss King being at the bed-side, and [305] immediately after respondent saw the cheque in Miss King's hand. She believes Gay was in and out of the room."

Here, then, Cunningham fixes the day, the time of the day, and the persons present, in direct contradiction to James King: the day—the 25th—not the 24th; the time before dinner—six o'clock—not at eleven o'clock at night; the persons present—herself and Miss King—not James King: she enters into particulars—as sending for Witchell's bills in order to know what to draw for: she sees the deceased writing (no very easy operation for her)—Miss King standing by the bed-side—and, immediately after, the cheque in Miss King's hand. These are variances which I find it difficult to reconcile, and it is as difficult to decide which to believe, or whether to believe either.

But these difficulties do not end here: on the next day she comes, and disavows these answers. It seems that she was examined to the end of the sixteenth interrogatory on the 1st of December; on the 2d of December she corrects her former statement:

"Respondent, since yesterday, has been reconsidering what she then deposed in answer to the twelfth interrogatory as to the day on which the cheque, interrogate and produced to her, was signed. She now recollects more accurately, and deposes that the said cheque was signed in the evening of the 24th day of January last by the deceased, in the presence of respondent, Sarah King, and James King, who, at such time, drew out said cheque. Thomas Gay was also in and out of the room: she recollects that the deceased told [306] James King the sum for which he was to draw. She does not recollect any more that passed on such occasion respecting the said cheque, or the amount for which the same was drawn."

Now all this must be equally false; or at least it is decidedly in contradiction to herself and to James King. According to her deposition in chief, finding she was not wanted as a witness at that time, she had left the room before the burning of the fair copy; and according to James King there was a long transaction of business; the deceased had some bills and Gay's account before her, and he, King, wrote the items on the back and cast up the whole amount; this must have taken a considerable time. These various representations are quite unaccountable, except by referring to Cunningham's answer on the last interrogatory:

"She came to town from Bristol in company with the producent, James King, and Thomas Witchell: she is staying in Bury Street, St. James'. Sarah and James King are also staying in the same house, as did Witchell while he was in town: she sees the producent and James King daily, taking meals with them: she has conversed with James King and Witchell since their examinations; but not on the subject of this cause, because Mr. Toller warned her not to do so: she has not had any conversation whatever with the producent, or James King, or Witchell, respecting their evidence, or with either of them respecting what she herself had deposed on the preceding days of her examination, or respecting this cause, or the codicil in question."

James King also, on the thirty-ninth interrogatory, speaks to their living in the same house, [307] and at the same table; but "that he has not conversed with the producent or either of his fellow-witnesses since their examination, or since his own in chief, on the subject of this cause: he was admonished not to do so, and has attended to the same."

That is the way in which she ventures to answer that interrogatory. It is very difficult not to suspect—violently to suspect—that the contradiction arose from the two witnesses not having preconcerted what account they should give of this cheque: and it is equally difficult not to suspect that there must have been, on the evening of the 1st of December, some conversation, some explanation, notwithstanding the very proper injunction from the proctor; and that this correction by Cunningham sprung from that intercourse—James King, in his deposition in chief, having committed himself to the cheque being signed on the evening of the 24th. I find it therefore very difficult to believe that there had been no intermediate communication between them on the evening after Cunningham's first statement, though James King, on the thirty-ninth interrogatory, unhesitatingly swears in the words already quoted.

Perhaps, without going further, this Court might be bound to say that it could not safely give credit to these two witnesses, and that the proof failed: but another important circumstance was pointed out by Dr. Phillimore in the course of the argument. The codicil in question is written upon precisely the same paper as the will; not only the same black margin, but the same water-mark; and it is hardly possible that James King should have stumbled at Bristol upon a sheet of [308] paper of the same sort as the deceased had happened to use two years before in writing her will: it is still less probable from another circumstance—the date of the paper; for it appears upon further examination that the date of the water-mark in each is 1813;

so that James King, procuring a sheet of paper at Bristol to write this codicil, gets a sheet of paper of 1813, and that precisely corresponds with the paper of the will: this is next to incredible; it is a detecting circumstance. The counsel who spoke second in support of the codicil (for the first, if I remember correctly, did not advert to this observation) in accounting for this was obliged to suppose that the fair copy had been made, not at Bristol, but at Hambrook, after James King's arrival on the evening of the 25th; for, had he deposed that it was written at Bristol, it was admitted it would be difficult to support his credit. His evidence is—and it is a material point—

That "on the following day, in order to satisfy himself that what he had taken down in writing was of a legal effect, he made a transcript thereof in blank as to names and the amount of legacies, and called on an attorney of the name of Day, and submitted the same to him. Mr. Day made a few verbal alterations: the deponent, from the original draft, and the blank transcript corrected by Mr. Day, in the course of the same morning, being the 25th of January, made a fair copy agreeably to the deceased's directions, in order to the due execution thereof as a codicil to her will." Further on he says "he went up to the deceased's bed-room with the fair copy aforesaid" [that is, the copy he had made at Bristol; [309] for he had not made another], and "from his pocket produced the aforesaid draft, and fair copy."

On the twenty-eighth interrogatory he says "that he did, on the morning of the 25th day of January (previous to drawing out, in its present form, the codicil in question), call at the office of Mr. Brooke Smith, an attorney in Bristol: Mr. Smith was not at home, in consequence of which respondent went to Mr. Day, before whom he laid an A B C case for instructions to guide him in preparing the codicil in question. In the evening of the same day, and after respondent had prepared and finished the codicil in question, he again (before leaving Bristol to go to the deceased) called on Mr. Smith, who was then again out of the way: respondent saw his managing clerk, Mr. Rawlinson, from whom he, verbally, enquired the form to revoke a bequest; which form Mr. Rawlinson wrote down on a piece of paper: respondent did so, to satisfy himself that the information he had in the morning obtained from Mr. Day was correct: he found that it was so."

Here, then, the witness, not in one passage, but repeatedly, does fix himself with having written the codicil at Bristol before his return to Hambrook Lodge; the paper is nearly conclusive to discredit the witness to that fact.

The signature itself is suspicious—it is not unlike that to the first codicil—it is very dissimilar from those to the drafts signed by her within the last three months, and from that of the draft dated on the 24th or 25th of January, whichever it may be. And though Witchell supposes he may have seen this codicil signed, deception may have been [310] resorted to, and the affair so managed as to impose upon him in that respect. Such a similitude to the former codicil, and dissimilitude from the drafts, is a circumstance not altogether free from suspicion, though it is not necessary that the Court should rely on it in the decision of this cause.

The whole transaction is clandestine, which, of itself, affixes a strong indication of fraud and contrivance. Here is not a single declaration by the deceased of a wish, about this time, to do a testamentary act of any sort; there is no recognition whatever by her that she had done any such act; there are no disinterested persons who have access to her, except Mr. Baker. Here is, on the following day, the 26th, a message, sent by Gay from Miss King, to Russell, that "Mrs. Brydges is much in the same state, and could not see him," excluding Russell thereby. Here is subsequent concealment, not venturing to disclose the existence of the paper, as if conscious that it would not bear investigation—all these are confirmatory circumstances of suspicion.

Looking, therefore, to the improbability of the disposition—from its difference, in the character and amount of the legacies, from the former papers; looking at the condition of the deceased; considering who were the persons around her—that they are, most of them, closely connected together, and are materially benefited under this paper; considering also the necessary jealousy of the law in guarding the beds of dying persons against fraud and circumvention—I am of opinion that the evidence of the two subscribing witnesses (for the third can prove nothing sufficiently material) [311] is so shaken in credit that the validity of this codicil cannot safely be pronounced for upon such testimony: I, therefore, pronounce against it.

No costs have been prayed by Sir Harford Jones, either from a conviction that the deceased intended, and ought to have done, something in the way of remuneration for Miss King, or from a hopelessness of ever receiving them, if given: he has, perhaps, acted properly, but certainly very liberally, in not praying costs.

The Court, therefore, is not called upon to make any further observation on the subject, but merely to pronounce against the codicil.

DEW v. CLARK AND CLARK. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 4th Session, 1828.—A sentence of the Prerogative Court, pronouncing against a will, and decreeing administration to the daughter, having been affirmed by the Court of Delegates, and the cause remitted: the Court will not allow the execution of the sentence to be delayed, by a prayer for an answer to the interest of the widow, who had been cognizant of, though not cited to see proceedings, nor by a caveat.—21 Hen. VIII. c. 5, § 3, leaves it to the discretion of the ordinary to grant administration to the widow or to the next of kin.

In this case a sentence in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury against the validity of the will of Ely Stott, and a decree of administration to Charlotte Mary Dew, the daughter of the deceased, were affirmed by the High Court of Delegates,(a) and the cause was remitted.

[312] Against this remission Mr. Scurlock entered a caveat in the Court of Delegates, which that Court disregarding, directed the remission to pass under seal: he further entered a caveat in the Prerogative Court that nothing should be done in the goods of Ely Stott without his being informed thereof.

Mr. Shephard also gave an appearance for the widow, and prayed an answer to her interest.

Mr. Loveday (for Bush) brought in the remission, and now prayed the Court to proceed according to the tenor of former acts.

Per Curiam. The decree of administration to the daughter is part of the sentence of this Court affirmed by the Delegates, and which I am now bound, on the remission of the cause, to carry into execution; but independent of that, the statute (21 Hen. VIII. c. 5, § 3) leaves it in the discretion of the ordinary to grant an administration to the widow, or to the next of kin: here the daughter has directed proceedings to be instituted, and has conducted them to a favorable termination; she has incurred all the expence and hazard of the suit, and exposed herself to the danger of a failure; the Court, therefore, would feel much disinclination (even if it had the power) to take the administration out of her hands. That the widow was cognizant is not, and cannot be denied, though a decree to see proceedings was never served upon her: indeed her interest [313] has, in no way, come into question—it has not been asserted nor denied.

In respect to the caveat against the grant of administration, at this late period, after a sentence by this Court pronounced so long ago as Easter Term, 1826, and since affirmed by the Superior Court; and which caveat, I understand, was not entered till Saturday last, the day before yesterday; a contrivance of that kind cannot be permitted to interfere with the decision of the Court of Delegates, which this Court is now called upon to carry into execution.

I direct the grant of administration to pass to the daughter: the usual security will be given, so that the interests of the widow will be sufficiently protected.

(a) The Judges who sat under this commission were—Mr. Baron Hullock, Mr. Justice Littledale, Mr. Justice Gazelee, Dr. Arnold, Dr. Dodson, Dr. Blake, Dr. Salusbury.

Sir Charles Wetherell, Dr. Lushington, and Mr. Bligh were of counsel for the Messrs. Clark, the appellants.

Dr. Jenner, Dr. Phillimore, Mr. Denman, and Mr. Knight contrà.

The cause was argued, at Serjeants' Inn, on the 16th, 17th, 18th, 19th, and 21st of January, 1828; and, on the 13th of February the Court of Delegates affirmed the sentence of the Prerogative Court, and decreed the costs out of the estate.

IN THE GOODS OF DAME SUSANNA GRAVES. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 4th Session, By-Day, 1828.—A monition against an administrator pendente lite will be granted at the end of a suit, to compel him to transfer, to the person entitled, every thing in his possession acquired in that character.

On motion.

A suit was lately depending in this Court respecting the validity of the will and codicil of Dame Susanna Graves, widow, promoted by William Blacknell Wilson, one of the next of kin of the deceased, against Robert Baxter, the surviving executor named in the said will; and afterwards against Daniel Heming, the executor of Robert Baxter, who died during the dependence of the cause.

An administration pendente lite, limited to the receipt and investment of the dividends due or to grow due on two certain sums of stock, "for the [314] use and benefit of such person or persons as should thereafter appear to have a just right and title thereto," was granted to Thomas Wilson and Thomas Brooksbank, respectively, the nominees of the parties in the suit.

The will and codicil were, on the 19th of February, 1827, pronounced to be valid; probate thereof was granted to Daniel Heming, and the limited administration pendente lite decreed to have ceased, and expired.

Mr. Heming had called upon the administrators to transfer the stock purchased by the dividends as aforesaid into his name: Mr. Wilson was ready; but Mr. Brooksbank refused so to do.

Lushington now moved for a monition to issue against Mr. Wilson and Mr. Brooksbank, requiring them to transfer this stock into the name of Mr. Heming, the general representative of the deceased.

Addams contrà. That it is impossible to comply with the motion, one circumstance will satisfy the Court—a petition was presented to the Vice-Chancellor praying that stock belonging to the deceased's estate, and standing in the name of the Accountant-General, should be transferred to Mr. Heming, and the application was refused.

Lushington. The fact is, during the pendency of the suit, respecting the validity of the will in this Court, the proceedings in Chancery were suspended: in that cause an order was made on Baxter, who had then a limited probate, limited to the property over which Lady Graves had a disposing power by settlement, to pay all stock into the Accountant-General's hands; certain stock was transferred; afterwards the limited probate was [315] revoked, and a general probate granted by this Court to Heming. The petition to the Vice-Chancellor was in respect to a sum of 7000l. in the hands of the Accountant-General; and was refused, because the matter could not be decided on an interlocutory proceeding, but must wait the final hearing; but no order has ever been made on Brooksbank to pay over the money in his possession.

Per Curiam. An administrator pendente lite is merely an officer of the Court, and holds the property only till the suit terminates; as soon as it is concluded he must pay over all that he has received in his character of administrator to the persons pronounced by the Court to be entitled: his other functions are then completely at an end, and the Court is bound to take care he discharges the duty committed to him as far as the delivery over of every thing to the proper party. In the present instance, if there is any contest or opposition respecting the property, application must be made elsewhere, but as it is my duty to enforce the transfer of the stock, I am bound to grant this motion. If, from the proceedings in the Court of Chancery, there is sufficient reason to stop this transfer, an injunction may be applied for.

Motion granted.

[316] IN THE GOODS OF JOHN O'BYRNE. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, By-Day, 1828.—Administration being granted to a person out of his Majesty's dominions the sureties to the bond should be resident within the kingdom.

On motion.

On the 16th of January, 1823, administration, under the sum of 100l. to John O'Byrne, was committed by this Court to Edward Gernon as the attorney of Mary Burke, widow, the lawful daughter of the said deceased.

Addams—stating that an increase in the property had arisen from the award of a sum by the Commissioners for adjusting the claims of British subjects on the French government—now moved the Court to enlarge the administration to the sum of 8000l.; and to decree a requisition to issue to swear Edward Gernon, at Bourdeaux, to the truth of the premises, and to take his bond for the due administration.

Per Curiam. This attorney is resident out of the jurisdiction of this Court; and the application is not only for a requisition to swear him, but also to take security; under these circumstances the sureties should be resident in this country; there should also be an affidavit why the additional grant is necessary, and it would be better to insert, if the fact be so, that no person in this country has a claim upon the property. This affidavit being brought in, the requisition may issue.

Motion granted.

[317] MACLAE AND EWING v. EWING AND CRUM, AND ALSO v. REID AND OTHERS. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, By-Day, 1828.—Probate will not be granted to a paper never seen by, nor read over, but only explained, to the deceased, who died suddenly before he saw the solicitor; the answers of the executor (speaking against his own interest) being the only evidence of instructions which were verbally conveyed by him to the solicitor; especially when the intentions of the deceased appeared fluctuating, and when there was a previous paper in his hand-writing clearly entitled to probate.

This was a cause of proving, in solemn form of law, the last will and testament of Robert Ewing, deceased, promoted by Humphrey Ewing Maclae and Margaret Ewing, the executors named in a will bearing date the 1st of June, 1825, against James Ewing and John Crum, two of the executors named in a testamentary schedule, bearing date the day of February, 1827 (without subscription), in which Mr. H. E. Maclae and Miss Ewing were also named executors. A decree, at the instance of the executors under the will of 1825, had been served upon various parties, citing them "to see proceedings."

Lushington and Haggard in support of the testamentary schedule of 1827.

Phillimore and Addams for the executors under the will of 1825.

Jenner for Robert Reid (an executor under a will dated the 4th of November, 1818, and one of the persons cited), objected to the answers of Mr. Maclae being received as evidence against his party.

Lushington in reply said that the objection was not tenable; since it had been recently decided by the Court that the answers of an executor named in two wills, both propounded in [318] the same cause, might be read as against a third party.(a)

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. Robert Ewing, the deceased in this cause, died on the 10th of February, 1827, at Dalby Terrace, in the City Road, at the age of 68 years, a bachelor, leaving an only sister, who is since dead, and several nephews and nieces. His personal property is stated to amount to 18,650l.; and there was also a heritable estate in Scotland. He had an illegitimate daughter, Margaret (the wife of Robert Reid), who died in October, 1826, in the deceased's life-time: of the three children which survived her, two are dead—but that is a circumstance immaterial in the consideration of this case; for these children the deceased entertained the greatest affection, as also for his niece, Miss Ewing; and it was ever an object, which he was very desirous to attain, that she should have the care and management of them.

The deceased had executed several wills—one, in 1808; by which he gave half his property to his daughter who was then unmarried; a second, in 1818, by which she had the same benefit, but trustees were interposed in order to protect the property from the engagements and controul of her husband. In 1825 he executed a third will, by which he left a life interest in one-third of the [319] residue to his daughter, independent of her husband, with a power of disposal of the principal among her children; she being dead I apprehend this third vests in the children: the other two-thirds were bequeathed to his niece, Margaret Ewing, and his nephew, Humphrey Ewing Maclae. This paper is uncancelled, and will, undoubtedly, operate if the paper propounded be not valid, for an intestacy is quite out of the question.

On the daughter's death the deceased became anxious to make a fresh disposition of his property, and determined on making a new will. At this point of the case a considerable difficulty arises, as the only evidence to be obtained must be gathered from the answers of the executor,(a) for the solicitor received all instructions through him, and though he may be a person of the highest honor, though the deceased may have placed the greatest confidence in him, and though he may be speaking against his own interest, yet, on answers alone, to pronounce for such a paper is going a step further than this Court has ever previously gone. Another difficulty is that the contents of the draft were not read over to the deceased: they were only communicated to him in the way of explanation, and he manifested con-[320]-siderable fluctuations of intention; the execution was postponed; however, on a subsequent representation, he did consent to execute it: and it is certain that, at that time, Maclae, and Druce, the solicitor, must have thought that he intended to give effect to the disposition as contained in the draft, because a fair copy was prepared—still when it came to be read over it might have produced much discussion, and the deceased might not then have given it his full sanction and approbation. The blank —left for a clause regulating the disposal of the sum of 4000l., in case his niece, Margaret Ewing, made no appointment of it, and in case of the death of all his grandchildren—is most material; and when I consider that this unexecuted paper is to revoke a will—written with his own hand at no great distance of time—unless I could be quite certain that the deceased would have executed it without alteration, I could not pronounce for it.

(a) Rich v. Mouchett and Isherwood, Prerog. 7th July, 1824. The sentence in this case, establishing the will and codicil propounded by Rich, was affirmed by the High Court of Delegates on the 9th of July, 1825; and an application for a Commission of Review, afterwards made and argued before Lord Chancellor Eldon, in December, 1825, was refused.

Again, on the evening preceding his death, the allusion to the will of 1825, in the enquiry addressed to Maclae, "whether a will in a man's own hand-writing would be sufficient," coupled with Maclae's answer, "that he thought it would as to personal estate," strongly shews that he had not finally decided to execute the paper propounded, nor to abandon the former will. Certainly, the deceased had no doubt as to the other legacies, but only as to the manner of securing the 4000l. to his daughter's children independent of the engagements of their father—still, on the whole, I think it safer to decree probate of the will of June 1, 1825, but I shall direct the costs of all parties to be paid out of the estate.

[321] HAWKES v. HAWKES. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, By-Day, 1828.—The primâ facie presumption is that pencil alterations are deliberative and those in ink final: when they are of both kinds in the same instrument the presumption is strengthened. A doubt whether a testator intended a particular bequest to form part of his will, and to take effect, will not vitiate the whole will, especially if a strong disinclination to die intestate be shewn.

This was a very complicated case, from the obliterations and interlineations in pencil and in ink appearing upon the face of the papers; and it has only been thought expedient to report so much of the judgment as elucidates the view which the Court took of those alterations.

Phillimore and Addams in support of the two papers A and B, propounded by Samuel Hawkes, one of the executors therein named, and a brother of the deceased.

Lushington and Dodson contrà for Francis Hawkes, also a brother of the deceased.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This case on some points is short and clear; but on others, from the state of the papers propounded, and of other papers connected with them now before the Court, it is one requiring a careful examination; but, after such examination, it seems free from doubt in respect to the proper decision.

The testator, James Hawkes, died suddenly at Brighton on the first of May, 1827, by the bursting of a blood-vessel, having on the twenty-first of October, 1826, in the presence of three witnesses, who have attested it, duly executed the will propounded; it is all in his own hand-writing; it originated with and was prepared by himself; and his capacity is unimpeached. The will, therefore, when executed, was valid: so far the case, as [322] to the factum, is short and clear; the question then is, how far it has been since altered and revoked?

(a) June 30, 1827.—Mr. Maclae having declined to renounce his executorship, the Court was moved to permit his examination, although a party to the proceedings, as being the only person who could give evidence on the principal parts of the allegation propounding the draft; dated February, 1827. In support of the motion a comparative statement was exhibited of his interest under the will of 1825, and under the paper of 1827; from which statement it appeared that, under the latter instrument, his benefit was considerably less than under the former.

The Court, however, rejected the application.

After entering on a short statement of the history, circumstances, and family of the deceased, and of the substance of the will, and examining other papers in the cause, which it held not material to the decision of the case, the Court proceeded:

The question then comes to the face of the papers propounded: there are various erasures and crossings and interlineations, some in pencil, some in ink: the general presumption and probability are, that where alterations in pencil only are made, they are deliberative; where in ink, they are final and absolute; but when they are of both sorts the presumption as to each is stronger: if the writer had made up his mind and intended the variation to be final he would, instead of pencil, have used the other material, ink: if he were deliberating only and undecided, he would not use ink, but pencil. Upon the evidence also, upon the deceased's own declarations and conduct, and upon the nature and appearance of those pencil marks, I am satisfied that they were intended to be not finally revocatory, but only deliberative, and depending upon future acts. Against all the pencil alterations and their effect I shall, therefore, pronounce.

I come, then, to the alterations in ink: I have already said that the presumption is that the deceased had definitively resolved so to alter his will; and the parol evidence goes strongly to support that presumption; for the deceased, when he shewed either the paper propounded, or some similar paper, to his solicitor, Faithful, a year and a [323] half before, desired him to make his notes in pencil and not in ink, as he intended the instrument to be his will. The alterations in ink are made in a cautious and curious manner, tending to confirm the idea that they were meant to be permanent: the lines are struck through not merely by hand, by drawing the pen through them in an irregular manner, but, to my eye, the obliterations appear to be made with the assistance of a ruler, forming a broad, dark, equal line, nearly effacing the whole writing; and in one or two instances (as where he varies the bequest to Dearlove—first increasing it from 2000l. to 2800l., and then reducing it again to 2000l.) there are two or three parallel lines drawn across very carefully. These observations confirm me in the opinion that these alterations were made deliberately upon due consideration, and intended to be permanent and final. Similar observations apply in respect to the interlineations.

It is by no means certain that these alterations may not have been made before the execution, and that these are not the identical papers shewn to Faithful; nor is this even improbable; for at the execution the deceased so doubled up the papers as not to allow the witnesses to see more than was necessary to attest his signature: the alterations in ink may, therefore, have been previously made, and the will may be in the same plight and condition, except as regards the pencil marks, that it was on that occasion.

I cannot accede to the suggestion that if the matter in this respect were doubtful, or if it were uncertain whether the deceased did or did not [324] mean any particular bequest to remain, or to be revoked, that such doubt or uncertainty would vitiate the whole will, and render the deceased intestate: nothing can be so manifest as that the deceased did not mean to die intestate, nor that either his real or his personal property should be disposed of by law to his heir, or among his next of kin. But, supposing these erasures and interlineations to have been made after the execution, they would equally direct the distribution, at least of the personalty: for the fact is clear not only from the presumptions on the face of the paper, but from the parol evidence, that the deceased wished it to have validity as his will, in its present shape.

The deceased had interviews with his solicitor long before and long after the execution of the will—one eighteen months before his death—the will was not then interlined, and he was careful that any alterations should be made only in pencil: another, two months before his death, after the will had been executed, and then the alterations in ink had been made; so that there is no improbability that it was altered previous to execution: the last interview took place on the 30th of April, the night before the sudden death of the deceased, when (and this was his last act) he deposited this instrument with Faithful, at the same time declaring and publishing it as his will, in case of his death before he completed a substitute by deed. Whether it can in every respect operate, or in all its parts carry the intentions of the deceased into effect, it is not necessary for this Court to decide; but I am satisfied that he did not consider any of the pencil marks as part of his will; [325] and I am also satisfied that he intended those alterations, which he has so carefully made in ink, to be final and effectual.

The Court, therefore, pronounces for the validity of these papers, but without the pencil marks and writing in pencil.

LADY KIRKCUDBRIGHT v. LORD KIRKCUDBRIGHT. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 15th March, 1828.—The destruction of a latter will revives a former will nearly of the same import; the motive on which the variation was made having ceased to operate; and reconciliation to, and declarations in favour of, the universal legatee under the former will just previous to death being shewn: such revival being always a question of intention, and admitting the introduction of parol evidence.—It is not settled whether the principle of law is that, on the revocation of a latter will, a former will is presumed to revive or not.

This was a cause of proving in solemn form of law the last will and testament (bearing date the 3d of November, 1824) of Sholto Henry, Baron Kirkcudbright, who died on the 16th of April, 1827, promoted by Mary, Baroness Kirkcudbright, his widow, the sole executrix and universal legatee named in the said will, against Camden Gray, Baron Kirkcudbright, the natural and lawful brother and one of the next of kin of the deceased.

The King's advocate and Lushington for Lord Kirkcudbright. The question is whether, by the destruction of the will of 1825, the deceased proposed to give operation to the will of 1824: the presumption is against the revival unless circumstances shew the contrary. It is clear that the second will was intended expressly to revoke the first, and that the testator would have actually destroyed it had he not been prevented by the party benefited, who kept possession of it against his wishes. The will of 1825 has an express revocatory clause. No general declarations, no proof of affection, would revive a will under such circumstances; there must [326] be clear evidence of intention: this is not a simple case of revival; but of recalling into existence that which the deceased would have destroyed if in his power.

Phillimore and Dodson contrà, were stopped by the Court.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The question in this case lies in a very narrow compass, and is free from difficulty. It appears that the late Lord Kirkcudbright executed a will on the third of November, 1824, of which he appointed Lady Kirkcudbright executrix and universal legatee; and on the thirtieth of July, 1825, he made another will, by which he gave a legacy of 500l. to Charlotte Bicknell; but again left, with that single exception, the whole of his property to Lady Kirkcudbright. In August, 1825, he deposited this latter will with his bankers, where it remained till November in the same year, when he took it away himself: and as it was not to be found at his death it must be presumed that he destroyed it; and there is no circumstance to repel the legal presumption, though neither the time, place, nor manner of its destruction can be shewn. It might have taken place immediately he got it from his bankers; and even on the very day before his death he had an opportunity of destroying it.

The former will remaining uncancelled has been set up by the wife, and opposed by the present Lord Kirkcudbright—the deceased's brother; who alleges that it is a revoked will, and that the deceased is dead intestate. It is not quite settled whether the principle of law is, that on the revoca-[327]-tion of a latter will, a former uncancelled will is presumed to revive or not. The presumption may depend, primâ facie, on the nature and the contents of the will themselves, exclusive of circumstances dehors the will. If the latter will contains a disposition quite of a different character, the law may presume such a complete departure from the former intention that the mere cancellation of the latter instrument may not lead to a revival of the former; but intestacy may be inferred. If, however, the two wills are of the same character, with a mere trifling alteration, it may be presumed (because it is the rational probability) that when the testator destroyed the latter, he departed from the alteration, and reverted to the former disposition remaining uncancelled. This case strongly carries with it the latter presumption. Both wills are in character the same; the former gives his whole estate to his wife; the latter, after giving away only a small legacy, still bequeaths the bulk of his fortune to her: it is a mere codicillary alteration, and it is extraordinary that it was not done by a codicil only. The destruction, then, of this latter document bears the inference that he merely meant to revoke the legacy, and then to revert to the former disposition exclusively in favor of his wife. That he considered both wills revoked, and purposed to die intestate, is, on reference to the acts done, in no degree, to my judgment, the correct view of the probable intention, nor the primâ facie presumption. I should, therefore, be much disposed to hold, on considering the papers alone, and if no corroborating circumstances were adduced, that the will of November, 1824, had revived. But it is admitted that all such cases are [328] questions of intention to be inferred from circumstances, and that extrinsic evidence is let in. It is hardly possible but that some facts bearing upon that question must exist; or that a case should ever arise resting only on the legal presumption. If it could be shewn that he intended to revoke this will and to die intestate, there is no rule of law that excludes such proof; nor, on the other hand, would a party be precluded from shewing that, by the destruction of the latter will, the deceased proposed to re-establish the former. Accordingly, in this case, both parties have gone into evidence of intention, and the result of that evidence leaves no doubt upon my mind that Lord Kirkcudbright believed and intended that the former will should remain valid.

It is true that unhappy differences arose between the deceased and his wife, occasioned, not by unfounded jealousy and violence of temper on her part, but by profligate and insulting adultery on his part with his own servant in his own house. But, notwithstanding these differences and quarrels, he makes his will in November, 1824, giving his whole property to his wife; and though he tells his solicitor that he will delay the execution in terrorem—to induce Lady Kirkcudbright to acquiesce in his adultery—I cannot attach much importance to this fact as spoken to by Mr. Squire, since he does execute it, himself carrying it to a tradesman's and getting witnesses to attest it. There was, therefore, a deliberate and decided intention to give his property to his wife; and the fresh will is as slight a departure as can be from the original one. It appears also that with his propensity for other women, still he [329] was much attached to Lady Kirkcudbright, even when he quitted her society; for, though in May, 1825, because she would not patiently submit to this adulterous intercourse being carried on in his own house, he actually separates himself,(a) and goes off to London with his cook-maid, and lives [330] with her for two years, from lodging to lodging; yet he writes affectionate letters to his wife; sends her the news-

(a) On the 4th Session of Michaelmas Term, 1827, an allegation was tendered on the part of Lord Kirkcudbright, pleading that in the course of 1825 the deceased gave his solicitor instructions to draw up regular articles of separation between himself and Lady Kirkcudbright: the Court, however, rejected the allegation upon the following grounds:—

Per Curiam. In this cause four allegations have been already given in, and publication would have passed on the first session of this term if it had not been stopped by the assertion of the present allegation. In this advanced stage of the cause the Court would not admit a plea unless it were sworn that the facts intended to be alleged were, not only noviter perventa to the knowledge of the party, but that he was advised that they were material and important to his case. The affidavit, brought in to induce me to admit this allegation, is deficient in this latter point; nor does the Court wonder at the omission, when it looks at the history as detailed in the pleadings and papers already before the Court.

After stating the facts as detailed in the judgment, the Court proceeded:—

That differences did exist in the spring of 1825 there is no doubt; that Lord Kirkcudbright actually withdrew from his wife and cohabited with Bicknell, and that he made a will giving her 500l., but in all other respects confirming his former will, admit of no question; after these facts are established, that articles of separation were prepared but subsequently abandoned, cannot weigh a feather, nor carry the case one step further. It cannot be worth while again to open the suit in order to introduce matter of such extremely trivial importance. I shall probably consult Lord Kirkcudbright's interest in not allowing this plea to go to proof; but, whether this be so or not, it is my duty to the other party to reject it; and I reject it accordingly and decree publication to pass.

Allegation rejected.

papers; speaks of her most tenderly; pays her many little attentions; occasionally even goes down to Southampton to visit her; writes with a power of attorney to his friend Rudd, who manages his affairs, expressing his wishes for the comfort of his wife—"her convenience and comfort constitute the principal anxiety of his heart:" at last he gets tired or sick of his scandalous life, and becomes anxious for a reconciliation and to return home. Under these feelings he makes a strange proposition (for he is proved to be very eccentric though clever)—that he should again cohabit with his wife; and bring back this very servant, under a solemn promise of having no further connexion with her: but, on his lady very properly rejecting that proposal—and, if he had any good sense or feeling, he must have acquiesced in the moral tone of mind that rejected such an insulting offer—he gives it up; says he likes her the better for it; and at length on Good Friday, April the thirteenth, 1827, he returns to his home and to his wife. He was then in extremely ill-health, suffering under an attack of inflammation in the chest. On his arrival he was very kindly received. Sargant's account of her quarrelling with him after dinner, and again the next day, and of her neglecting him, is so inconsistent with the other evidence as to be entitled to no credit. She attended him to the warm bath that evening, and paid him all possible attention. It so happens that Rudd saw them there together:—

"She was, he says, assisting him to undress, when he, the deponent, went in. The deceased [331] observed to him that he was glad he was come home, and addressed Lady Kirkcudbright in a kind and familiar manner." On that occasion, therefore, this witness perceived no want of cordiality between them. On the following day she was equally attentive and affectionate; she pressed Mr. Maul, the surgeon—who had some reluctance from the course of life Lord Kirkcudbright had pursued—to attend him. On the Sunday, in Maul's presence, the deceased expressed his gratitude to her in these terms:—

"He was afraid he should not live long enough to make her amends for the kindness she had shewn him;" and Maul adds, "that the expressions struck him as singular, for he, the deceased, was not accustomed to acknowledge attentions from any one;" and the next morning he was found dead in his bed. Here, then, is the fact of this return home and the renewal of conjugal kindness, in support of the conclusion drawn from the nature and contents of the papers.

In respect to these wills the deceased had in 1824 deposited his iron chest and writings with Rudd; and in 1825 the will, the subject of the present suit, was also sent to Rudd by a servant, in a packet sealed with Lord Kirkcudbright's arms. There is no direct proof whether it was sent by the deceased or by Lady Kirkcudbright; but the deceased was at Southampton at the time, or had only just left it; and it was more likely to have been sent by him, as Rudd was his own confidential agent. It is not probable that it was sent without his privity, notwithstanding the declarations of Lady Kirkcudbright to the Eames', supposing those declarations to have been accurately recollected; still less probable is it that [332] he was ignorant of its existence in an uncancelled state; indeed it is proved that he was always aware of its existence, because he told Squire that if it had been in his custody he would have destroyed it; and the very case set up admits this; for it is averred that he wished to obtain possession of that paper in order to cancel it, but that his wife would not deliver it up. This fact of his knowledge is most material.

It is said that there were declarations made by him when he executed the second will that he would have destroyed it; but, first, no reliance can be placed on his declarations; and, secondly, the question is not what he intended when he executed, but when he destroyed, the second will, knowing the first to be in existence. Counsel, however, have argued that if he had destroyed it, it could not have been revived; but is it clear that he would in that case have destroyed the second will without executing a new one; or, knowing of the existence of the former will and wishing it not to take effect, can there be any reason to doubt that he would have executed a short revocatory instrument, either making a new disposition or declaring that he meant his property to go according to law. Now in regard to the revival of the latter will, continued affection alone would perhaps not be sufficient, but instead of this the evidence is that he declared his brother and sister should never have any of his property; that he was saving all he could to make his wife comfortable, as he told Eyton, and, more particularly, his friend Ross, who thus deposes:—

"He often heard deceased declare that he meant to leave the whole of his property to Lady Kirkcudbright: he used to say that his brother and [333] sister should never be a shilling the better for him, but that my lady (as he sometimes called Lady Kirkcudbright) should have the whole: upon one occasion, in the latter part of November, 1825, the deceased, alluding to the deponent's having recently sent her ladyship some wine by his order, observed, 'That he hoped it was of the best sort, as it was for her own drinking,' and he also, upon the same occasion, spoke of the manner in which he had endeavoured to secure his property to her as hereinafter deposed."

Now the way in which he does hereafter depose is on the ninth article:—

"That in all his communications with the deceased [and he was very intimate with him], both in June, 1825, and in November following, the deceased's general manner of speaking of his connection with Charlotte Bicknell was such as to indicate regret, not at the intercourse itself, but only as being the means of keeping him in a state of separation from Lady Kirkcudbright; and he always understood from the deceased that it was his intention such connection should not deprive Lady Kirkcudbright of any of the advantages he intended her to have under the will, which he spoke of having made as before deposed"—that is, the will of November, 1825.

In a further part of his deposition Ross says:—

"Bicknell was present when the deceased, speaking to deponent, observed, 'In consideration of Charlotte's good conduct and kind treatment, I have settled 500l. upon her; she knows it to be the case, because she has seen the instrument duly prepared by a legal man,' or to that effect: deponent observed 'he thought the deceased had [334] behaved very handsomely, and Charlotte Bicknell acquiesced in some manner in what he said.' She afterwards left the room, and then deponent inquired 'how he had settled the said 500l.?' The deceased replied, 'You don't take me to be such a fool; it's all fudge; I merely said so to please the girl, and prevent her from relaxing in her attentions to me: I had a paper prepared by a legal man to give it the air of reality, and make her mind satisfied.' He then gave deponent to understand that he either had destroyed, or intended to destroy, the paper he had just been speaking of, which he said had, until then, remained in his own possession; and he added that he should give Charlotte ten pounds or guineas when he had done with her, and that as he had given her a great many clothes, and kept her very well, he thought she would be very well paid."

These are the deceased's own declarations, and his own account of the will of 1825. Why, if it was made with this view, did he get it back from the bankers, if he had not intended to destroy it? Why should he not have left it there? These declarations, coupled with the facts, shew that he only executed it "to please the girl, and prevent her from relaxing in her attentions." But this is not all; for he also tells his old schoolfellow Cole, three weeks before he went home, that "as soon as he got to Southampton he would make a codicil in the deponent's favor; that his will was at Southampton, in the possession of Lady Kirkcudbright; but that if he had had it then with him, he would have got Mr. Weymouth, his solicitor in town, to have made the codicil at once." He once previously observed to the deponent "that [335] he should take care to leave everything to Lady Kirkcudbright, and that, whatever he might give to others, he would not injure her; but, thank God, he had something to spare for an old friend, when he was gone."

Now, whether he would have made this codicil or not is not the question; but here is the fact, that he knew the will was at Southampton. It further appears that, for some time before he went back to Southampton he was tired of his life with Charlotte Bicknell, and declared "he should leave her with her friends, and only give her a few pounds," which possibly he may have done when he parted with her. After then stating this evidence, it seems to me quite impossible to believe that he considered this will as revoked, or that he meant or supposed himself to be intestate; or to doubt that he intended this will to operate. I, therefore, pronounce for it, and in so doing I think that I do not interfere with any principles recognized by this Court.

Costs were prayed by Phillimore; but the Court said that it was not, on the whole, a case for costs, as it was necessary to bring the question before the Court, though the allegation, ripping up the old quarrels, was rather uncalled for.

[336] IN THE GOODS OF DELICIA AIRD. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, Caveat-Day, 1828.—A person appointed limited executor in a will may be appointed general executor in a codicil by implication, and without express words.

On motion.

The deceased was a spinster; and by her last will, after giving to Donald John Macpherson M'Leod, son of Major-General John M'Leod, of the 78th Regiment, the sum of 2122l. 11s. 6d. new four per cents., to be at his sole and absolute control at the age of sixteen years, and a vested right at her decease, and also all her plate, linen, books and furniture to be vested, and at his own control in manner aforesaid,(a)[1] thus proceeded:

"I appoint the said Major-General M'Leod executor of this my will for the purposes hereinbefore mentioned, and make no present disposal of any other property I may be entitled to." Signed, sealed, &c. on the 24th of January, 1828.

This will was written upon the first side of a sheet of foolscap paper; and on the second side was a codicil of the same date, of which the following is a copy:—

"I, the within named Delicia Aird, declare this to be a codicil to my will bearing date this day, and" [after bequeathing a legacy of twenty guineas each to two servants] "all the residue of my personal property I give to the within named Donald John [337] Macpherson M'Leod to and for his own use, to be vested and at his own control at the same time and in like manner as the bequests in his favour in my will contained." In witness, &c.

The residuary legatee, it appeared, was of the age of eight years; and the residue consisted of about 300l.

The King's advocate now moved for a grant of probate of the will and codicil to General M'Leod as executor.

Per Curiam. The Court was of opinion that the residue being bequeathed to the son "in like manner as the bequests in his favour in the will contained," came to him subject to the executorship of his father, and therefore granted the motion.

Motion granted.

GREEN, BY HER GUARDIAN v. PROCTOR AND NEWEY. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, Caveat-Day, 1828.—A legatee, under a former will, who, after long acquiescence, calls in probate of and contests a latter will, setting up a case of incapacity and undue influence, which is disproved—will be condemned in costs from the time of giving in an allegation.—Semble, a next of kin—à fortiori a legatee under a former will—contesting a will, under circumstances manifestly vexatious, may be condemned in the whole costs.—Semble, that the guardian of a minor instituting a suit cannot be condemned in the costs incurred, after a proxy has been exhibited, for the party then become of full age.

Judgment (a)[2]—Sir John Nicholl. Elizabeth Grigg died on the twenty-fourth of June, 1826, at Oldbury, in Shropshire, at the age of 60 years, leaving behind her several nephews [338] and nieces—entitled in distribution (had she died intestate) —to her property, which was of the value of about 3000l. Her will, executed on the nineteenth of June, 1826, and attested by three witnesses, was propounded in a common condidit, in May, 1827, by Proctor and Newey—her executors; and is opposed in the name of Elizabeth Green, a minor—by her stepfather, Joseph Green, acting as her guardian: she was a legatee under a former will of 1822, and is the daughter of a niece of the deceased. The alleged grounds of opposition are—incapacity, undue influence, control and custody: of every single ground there is not only a total failure of proof, but a complete disproof—even by the niece's own witnesses—so much so that her counsel declined to argue the case upon the merits.

The deceased, having been unwell for some time, on Monday, the twelfth of June, was driven over in a gig to Birmingham, five or six miles distant from Oldbury, by Proctor, the husband of one of the nieces, and one of the executors: she there went to the house of Mr. Wills, a solicitor, and gave him instructions for her will. On this occasion Mr. Wills proceeded with the utmost professional delicacy; learning that Mr. Proctor's wife was to be benefited, he desired him to withdraw before he received the instructions—he took them down in writing, very carefully, and explained them to the deceased; and, finding one niece more benefited than the other, he took this further precaution—without either persuading or dissuading—he asked her "if she had well considered the disposition, and hoped it was not from any sudden feeling:" she satisfied him it was her deliberate purpose. The following Friday [339] was appointed for the execution, but on the Wednesday the deceased was taken suddenly ill, and carried back to Oldbury in a state nearly of insensibility: if she had then died, that would not have invalidated the instructions; but it is clear on the following day she recovered; and from that time till her death was in full possession of her mental faculties. On the nineteenth Mr. Wills attended at Oldbury to see the will signed: he offered repeatedly to read the will over to the deceased; she declined, declaring "it had been read to her, and was quite right:" he again offered, saying "it was no trouble;" but she was in pain and weak, and refused. The will was then executed and attested; and there is not the slightest doubt of her volition, capacity, and knowledge of the contents: she died about five days afterwards, during which time her family and friends had free access to her. Of the factum of the will then there is the most satisfactory evidence.

Now, it appears that the will was read over at the funeral, and no objection was then taken; if there was any ground for calling the deceased's capacity into question, it should have been done immediately. The probate was not obtained hastily—it was not taken out for three months—not till November; this was ample time for calling for proof, per testes: but the executors are allowed to remain in possession of the probate till the April or May following; when, on actions being brought against some of the family to recover debts due to the estate, Green, who is indebted to it in the sum of 400l., calls in the probate, and puts the executors on proof of the paper, under the colour, and in the name, and as protector and [340] guardian of his step-daughter, a minor, and a legatee under the will of 1822, and, in this suit, he sets up in plea a most unfounded case in point of fact. There is nothing that justifies him in this opposition. I hardly recollect a case so vexatiously and falsely offered to the consideration of the Court. The party setting it up would be liable to the full costs if they had been pressed for; he is not entitled even to the ordinary privilege of a next of kin calling for proof, per testes, whom it is not usual to condemn in the costs incurred before the giving in of an allegation; though even next of kin, calling in probate under circumstances so manifestly vexatious, would be liable to the payment of full costs; for the Court is not precluded from taking such a step if it deems it necessary for the sake of example, and in order to deter parties from frivolous opposition; but here, Joseph Green, the step-father, who is the party, stands on a former will; and it is quite clear the opposition was merely set up by him and others to delay the payment of their debts to the estate. In this case, however, considering the near connexion that subsists between Proctor and the Greens, and that under the former will they shared pretty equally, I shall not carry the matter further than to condemn the party in costs from the time of giving an allegation, which are all that have been asked for. The costs, up to the time of a proxy being exhibited for Miss Green, will fall upon her father; those since must be borne by her, as the Court, perhaps, might have some difficulty in enforcing them against her father.

[341] IN THE GOODS OF MARY ALICIA GILL. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, Caveat-Day, 1828.—Probate of a will of a feme-covert (supposed, at the time of the grant, to have been sole) revoked; and administration granted to her next of kin, the husband having died after her. The administration of a feme-covert's goods left unadministered by the husband having been held, in several cases, to belong, under the 31 Edw. III. st. 1, c. 11, and 21 Hen. VIII. c. 5, to the next of kin of the wife at the time of her death, though the right to the property is in the representatives of the husband.

On motion.

Mary Alicia Gill was the party deceased: she died in the lifetime of her husband, John Gill, from whom she had lived apart for many years. On her death a probate of a paper, purporting to be her will, was taken in this Court in the month of March, 1813, by William Cooper—the sole executor therein named—on the supposition that she had died a widow.

Dodson now prayed that the probate should be revoked, as the paper was executed during coverture, and was therefore null; and applied for an administration to be granted to Alice Ainsworth, widow, the lawful mother of the deceased, she having left no children nor father.

Per Curiam. The practice of granting these administrations to the representatives of the wife, when the beneficial interest in the property belongs to the representatives of the husband,(a)[1] is very inconvenient, and in defiance of all principle. Notwithstanding the statutes (b)[1] require that administration shall be [342] granted to the next of kin, it has been solemnly decided that the residuary legatee is entitled, and it has always since been the constant practice so to grant it.(a)[2] In that and every other instance but the present, the right to administration follows the right to the property; but in a case said to have been argued here by Lord Mansfield,(b)[2] then [343] at the bar; as also in a case before the High Court of Delegates, in 1748, it was (a)[1] By the 29 Car. 2, c. 3, s. 25, it is declared that the statute of distribution (22 & 23 Car. 2, c. 10) shall not extend to the estates of femes-coverts that shall die intestate, but that their husbands shall have administration of their personal estate, and enjoy the same as they might have done before the act. (b)[2] The printed reasons for the appellants—written by Mr. Hargrave, as junior counsel for Dr. Bouchier, in the case of Bouchier v. Taylor, on an appeal from the Court of Chancery to the House of Lords—asserted it to be settled that, soon after the statute of distribution, the right to administration which exists at the death of the intestate is transmissible—and that the representatives of that person, who was the next of kin, have the same right to it as such person, if living, would himself have. Lord Mansfield, in delivering his reasons against the decree of Lord Chancellor Northington (which was reversed), denied this position, and observed:

"That he remembered arguing a case before Dr. Lee as Judge of the Prerogative Court, in which, after great consideration, the latter held the right to administration not to be transmissible as above described, but to be grantable to the next of kin for the time being." On this Mr. Hargrave remarks:

"A case to the same effect, before the High Court of Delegates, was cited in Chancery by Lord Mansfield when Solicitor-General; and Lord Hardwicke allowed the practice of the Ecclesiastical Court to be so settled as to administration, though he decreed for a distribution in favor of a husband's representatives on the principle of transmissibility from him as the person entitled to administration at the time of his wife's decease. Elliot v. Collier, 1 Wilson, 168, 1 Ves. sen. 15, 3 Atk. 526. These authorities are certainly entitled to very great respect. But, on the other hand, there are cases according to which the right of administering ought to follow the right to the estate. In one case Sir Joseph Jekyll, Master of the Rolls, is represented to say that this point had been so solemnly determined by the Spiritual Court, Bacon v. Bryant, East. Vac. 1729, in 11 Vin. Abr. 88. The same doctrine is asserted by the reporter in 1 P. Wms. 382, and by Lord Macclesfield in Cha. Prec. 567, and by Lord King in a case in 11 Vin. Abr. 87, pl. 24. The practice also of granting administration to the residuary legatee, in preference to the next of kin, seems to be an additional authority on the same side; for it proceeds on the idea that the statutes, requiring administration to be granted to the next of kin, were made with a view to their benefit, and, therefore, become inapplicable when the next of kin cannot, in any event, be entitled to the surplus of the estate to be administered. See further (Rex v. Dr. Bettesworth), 2 Str. 1111." Hargrave's Law Tracts, 4to, p. 475.

Sir George Lee was Dean of the Arches and Judge of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury from January, 1752, to December, 1756; he was knighted upon succeeding to those appointments; and the editor has been unable to discover any trace of such a case as that described by Mr. Hargrave to have been argued by Lord Mansfield during that period; he is inclined to think that a confusion has arisen between the names of Sir George Lee and Dr. Bettesworth, who was his immediate predecessor in the same offices; for in the case of Elliot v. Collier, 1 Wils. 169, there is the following passage:—"Quære, the case of Hole and Dolman at Doctors' Commons in Michaelmas Term, 1736, cited by the Solicitor-General, who said he was of counsel in it, and that ruled that [344] the Court was bound, by the statutes, to grant the administration to one of those persons who were next of kin of the wife at the time of her death: (a)[1] but if the persons, who at that time were her next of kin, die before the grant of administration, it has always been held that the Court may exercise its discretion.

I have directed the cases to be looked up, as I feel inclined, if the point should hereafter come before me, in a contested form, to send it up for the decision of the Court of Delegates, in order that the question may there be deliberately reconsidered.

In the present instance I shall allow the administration to pass, a proxy of consent from the representative of the husband, who is a party to the proceedings in Chancery, being first exhibited.

Motion granted.

The following cases upon this point, decided at different times, have been communicated to the editor from the manuscript collections of the late Dr. Swabey, and from the notes of Dr. Arnold:—

WELLINGTON, OTHERWISE HOLE v. DOLMAN. Arches, Mich. Term, 1736.

An appeal from Exeter.

Per Curiam (Dr. Bettesworth). The Court revoked the administration granted by the Court below to the Reverend Robert Dolman, executor of Jeffery Follett, late of Northam, [345] in the county of Devon, of the goods of Margaret Wellington, otherwise Follett, late wife of the said Jeffery Follett, and administratrix with the will annexed of the goods, chattels, and credits of Peter Wellington, late of Biddeford, left unadministered by the said Margaret Wellington; and decreed administration to Rebecca Wellington, otherwise Hole, wife of Henry Hole, the sister and next of kin of the said Margaret Wellington, otherwise Follett.

KINLESIDE v. CLEAVER. Prerogative, Mich. Term, 1745.

Mary Kinleside, formerly Galton, died intestate in April, 1744: administration was granted by the Prerogative Court of Canterbury to William Kinleside, the husband, who, having made his will and appointed his son sole executor, died; probate of this will was granted to the son by the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, and administration was prayed of Mary Kinleside's effects, left unadministered by her husband, to be committed to him as his executor. A proctor exhibited for Mary Cleaver, wife of William Cleaver, and alleged her to be the daughter, only child and only next of kin of Mary Kinleside, formerly Galton, and prayed the de bonis grant to her.

On the fourth session of Michaelmas Term, 1745, Dr. Bettesworth, Judge of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, decreed the administration, de bonis non, to the daughter and next of kin of the wife.

On the 1st of July, 1748, this decree was af-[346]-firmed by the High Court of Delegates, with 5l. nomine expensarum.(a)[2]

it was therein determined by the Judge and all the Doctors (not in the cause) that the husband's right of administration to his wife is not transmissible to his representative, but that it goes to the next of kin of the wife."

Elliot v. Collier was argued in 1747, and at that time Lord Mansfield was Solicitor-General. The foregoing statement from Wilson is confirmed by the following entries respecting the case of Hole v. Dolman, extracted from the assignation book of the Court of Arches:—

On the by-day after Trinity Term, 1736, common lawyers were directed to be heard, at the petition of both proctors.

On the fifth session of Michaelmas Term, 1st December, 1736, the proctors, on both sides, porrected sentences. The Judge having heard the advocates and proctors on both sides, and the opinions of the rest of the advocates present, read the sentence, &c. &c. &c. &c.

WALTON v. JACOBSON. Prerogative, Easter Term, 4th Session, 1765.

The question was whether an administration, de bonis, should go to the representative of the husband, or to the next of kin of the wife.

Per Curiam (Dr. Hay). The Court observed—it may be mistaken in whom is the interest—on that point it has no jurisdiction. The Court is ministerial and must follow the statute: the statute Edw. 3, c. 11, having said the next lawful friend, and the statute of Hen. 8 explaining it to be the next of kin. There is no difference between the first administration and the administration de bonis. If the husband forgets to administer and dies, the next of kin will have the administration. I decree the administration, de bonis, to the next of kin of the wife.

[347] REECE (FORMERLY MILNER) v. STRAFFORD. Arches, Trinity Term, By-Day, 1800.

An appeal from Worcester.

Jane Strafford (formerly Milner), wife of Thomas Strafford, was the deceased: her husband died without taking administration. The Court at Worcester granted administration to Sally Strafford, widow, the relict (second wife), and administratrix of Thomas Strafford. A citation issued, at the suit of Elizabeth Reece, the sister and next of kin of Jane Strafford deceased, to shew cause why this administration should not be brought in, and a new one decreed to her. The Court, however, affirmed the grant; and the case now came, upon appeal, before the Dean of the Arches for his decision.

Per Curiam (Sir William Wynne). The question is, whether administration of the wife's effects should be granted to the representatives of the husband, or to the next of kin of the wife? This has been long settled here. Formerly it appears to have been thought discretionary in the Court—perhaps because grants (without the statute or against it) are made to the residuary legatee. There are several cases. Wellington v. Dolman was solemnly argued in the Prerogative Court in 1736, and by common lawyers. Elliot v. Collier, in Chancery (1 Ves. sen. 15)—a suit by the next of kin of the wife for an account—in which it was held that they had no right; but it is laid down in that case that the Ecclesias-[348]-tical Court was bound to grant administration in that course. In Kinleside v. Cleaver, before the Delegates in 1748, the husband took administration: it was held that made no difference, and the grant was directed to issue to the next of kin of the wife. Since that decision the practice has been settled.(a)

The only point for me to consider is, whether there is any objection to the citation: it was irregular, inasmuch as it only called upon the party to bring in the administration and shew cause why another should not be granted, and that it did not say—to shew cause why the original administration should not be revoked: but the grant is revoked as to the party when it is brought in; the citation, then, was sufficient.

The Judge below granted administration to the only party asking it; when that was called in he confirmed it. No costs were given in the first instance, but it is so clear a point here that the party might have been satisfied on any advice, and, therefore, I give the costs of the appeal.

Sentence reversed.

[349] WEBB v. WEBB. Consistory Court of London, Hilary Term, 4th Session, 1828.—Facts of adultery newly come to the knowledge of the party may be pleaded after publication.

On motion.

This was an application for leave to bring in an allegation pleading further adultery on the part of Mrs. Webb since the admission of the libel on the 10th of May, 1827.

The affidavit of the husband stated that he came to London from Bath on the third day of February instant, and that until the fifth he had no knowledge, nor any information, that a criminal and adulterous intercourse had been formed and carried on between his wife and Thomas Walton; that he believes such criminal connection is still subsisting, and that he shall be able to substantiate by evidence the allegation now offered on his behalf.

(a) Vide Roper on Husband and Wife, vol. 1, p. 205, 2d edition.

Dodson in support of the motion.

Jenner contrà.

Per Curiam (Dr. Lushington). It has been correctly stated that the practice of the Ecclesiastical Court is to allow facts of adultery, that may have come to the knowledge of a party even after publication, to be pleaded: but [350] such pleas must be strictly watched—they are open to suspicion, and care must be taken lest litigants should avail themselves of information from the evidence. In the affidavit before the Court it is not sworn that the husband has not had access to and read the depositions—the presumption is that he has perused them. But in the case of Sir Wastel and Lady Brisco, adultery was suffered to be put in plea long subsequent to publication—where the party was in full possession of the evidence taken on the original case, and where, if great diligence had been used, the fresh charge might have been sooner pleaded, the additional fact alleged being adultery with one of the female servants, and the birth of two children (Brisco v. Brisco, 2 Add. 259). Now, here, Webb is an attorney at Bath; he has professional avocations to detain him there; the adultery, if committed, has been in London, and he has not had the same means, therefore, of discovering any recent misconduct of his wife, as others might have possessed; and he has sworn, in his affidavit of the 9th of this month, that he only knew of this connection a few days before; he has then taken the earliest opportunity of bringing it to the notice of the Court. I shall watch the proof of this additional plea with great jealousy, but I must, according to practice, permit the allegation to be introduced.

Motion granted.

[351] HARRIS v. HARRIS. Consistory Court of London, Hilary Term, By-Day, 1828.—1. In answers to an allegation of faculties it is proper to state that the wife brought no fortune; but not that her father is possessed of large property. —2. The estimated value of all marketable securities must be included in the calculation of the husband's income, in order to the allotment of alimony, pendente lite.

[See further, 2 Hagg. Ecc. 376.]

This was a suit of divorce instituted by the wife on a charge of adultery. An allegation of faculties having been admitted, the answers of the husband were taken, and, in respect thereof, each party had made and brought in an affidavit. The sufficiency of the answers was the question before the Court.

In his answers to the first article the husband claimed a deduction of 26l. 1s. 8d. as an annual payment for the assurance of the sum of 1000l. on his life; and in his answers to the seventh article, after admitting that he was entitled to six shares in the Economic Insurance Office, for which he paid 1500l.; and also to one hundred shares in the Asylum Insurance Office, for which he had paid 480l., but that some further instalments still remained due thereon; said, "that his (the respondent's) shares in the Economic were all mortgaged and assigned as a security to his agent for advances already made and to be made to the respondent, for the purpose of paying outstanding debts now owing by him, amounting to 250l. or thereabouts, and to meet the expences of the present suit, and he therefore derives and will derive no income whatever from such shares; and he further saith that his shares in the Asylum Insurance Office are also at present unproductive of income to him, the rules of the said office requiring as a condition of his holding such shares that the in-[352]-terest thereon be paid into the office as instalments of payment for the said shares, for which purpose such interest will be applied for the next six years at least."

In a further part of his answer to the same article—"that he had not on his marriage, nor has he ever since, had any portion or advancement whatever with his wife, although her father is possessed of a large property and income."

Phillimore and Addams in objection to the answers.

Jenner contrà.

Per Curiam. In disposing of the objections the Court observed that, in answers to an allegation of faculties, to state that the husband had received no portion with his wife was customary and proper; but the introduction of that part of the husband's answer to the seventh article—that his wife's father was in possession of a large property and income—was improper: it could have no weight in an allotment of alimony; and was inadmissible on two grounds: first, because it might lead the Court into an inquiry as to the amount of the father's property; and, secondly, because there was no legal obligation on a father to maintain his daughter after marriage. The Court was also of opinion that the husband was not entitled to make any deduction in respect of the 1000l. for which he had insured his life, inasmuch as a policy of insurance was capable at any time of being converted into money; and further said, that though it might be true the shares in the Asylum Insurance Office might not, in the first instance, be available as income, yet if the Court were to allow this exemp-[353]-tion, a husband might so invest his income as to evade all claims upon him for the support and maintenance of his wife.

The Court, after entering into a calculation to ascertain the amount of the husband's income, continued—

"Taking, then, the income of the husband at 250l. per annum, and considering that he has two children to educate and maintain, and that he will have to pay the expences of this suit on both sides, I allot to the wife the sum of 75l. per annum as alimony, pendente lite: she must have the means of furnishing herself with a decent subsistence."

The Court directed the alimony to commence from the return of the citation, and that the amount of all debts which the wife had incurred since that time, and which had been discharged by the husband, should be first deducted.

[355] THE COUNTESS OF PORTSMOUTH v. THE EARL OF PORTSMOUTH, BY HIS COMMITTEE. Arches Court, Easter Term, 4th Session, 1828.—A marriage de facto solemnized, under circumstances of clandestinity inferring fraud and circumvention, between a person of weak and deranged mind and the daughter of his trustee and solicitor (who had great influence over him, and by whom he was clearly considered and treated as of unsound mind) pronounced null and void; and the pretended wife condemned in costs.

This was a suit of nullity of marriage instituted originally in the Consistory Court of London on the part of the Earl of Portsmouth, acting by his Committee; and in an early stage of the proceedings came up by appeal to the Court of Arches, where it was retained.

The cause was argued by Lushington and Pickard for the Earl of Portsmouth; and by the King's advocate and Dodson contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This suit is described as brought by the Earl of Portsmouth, acting by his Committee, against Mary Ann Hanson, falsely calling herself Countess of Portsmouth, to have a marriage, in fact solemnized between them, declared to be null and void in law.

The proceedings originated in the following circumstances:—In January, 1823, a commission issued to enquire into the alleged lunacy of Lord Portsmouth; the inquisition was executed; very long proceedings took place; the [356] matter was strenuously contested; a great number of witnesses was examined; and the finding of the jury was "that Lord Portsmouth is of unsound mind, so that he is not sufficient for the government of himself and his property, and has been in the same state of unsound mind from the first of January, 1809." In consequence of this finding, Mr. Henry Fellowes, a distant relation, was appointed Committee; and by an order made in the Court of Chancery the Committee was directed to institute proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Court "for the purpose of annulling and declaring void the marriage of John Charles, Earl of Portsmouth, with Miss Mary Ann Hanson, now Countess of Portsmouth."

Thus the proceedings commenced in the Ecclesiastical Court. The verdict would not of itself affect the validity of the marriage de facto solemnized—though solemnized within the time of the finding by the jury. The finding is a circumstance and a part of the evidence in support of the unsoundness of mind at the time of the marriage, but no more; for this Court must be satisfied by evidence of its own that grounds of nullity existed. Accordingly a long libel was given in, setting forth in detail the mental condition and unsound conduct of Lord Portsmouth, and the measures pursued to effect the marriage; his birth in December, 1767; the death of his father in 1797; the great weakness of his mind from the earliest period; his marriage with Grace Norton in November, 1799; the settlement on that marriage and the names of the trustees; Mr. John Hanson, the solicitor of the family, being one of those [357] trustees. The libel goes on, that after that marriage his mental weakness increased, until at length he became of unsound mind, that he so continued and still continues of unsound mind: averring, therefore, that he was from his birth and before his first marriage not of "unsound" but only of "weak mind," which afterwards "became unsound." The libel then proceeds to allege a variety of facts from that marriage till the death of Grace Lady Portsmouth as indicating unsoundness of mind, and proving that he was treated as a person incapable of managing his own property, and was always kept under a certain degree of superintendence and restraint. It further recounts Lord Portsmouth's conduct on the death of Grace Lady Portsmouth in November, 1813, and the circumstances attending the second marriage to Miss Hanson on the 7th of March following, to shew that that marriage was not the act of a person of sound mind, but was effected by fraud and circumvention. It then details the subsequent conduct of Lord Portsmouth and the treatment he experienced in continuation and confirmation of his former unsoundness. It mentions the birth of a female child at Edinburgh in July, 1822; his removal from thence just before that event by some of his family, and the subsequent proceedings under the inquisition already mentioned.

This is the general substance of the libel. The prayer of it is, "That the marriage may be declared null by reason of the earl being at the time of unsound mind and incapable of forming such a contract; and also by reason of the fraud and circumvention practised [358] on him upon that occasion; and that Mary Ann Hanson may be condemned in the costs of suit." It consists of forty-nine articles, and on it sixty-seven witnesses have been examined.

On the part of Lady Portsmouth an allegation in reply was given, setting forth that Lord Portsmouth was possessed of a capacity and understanding fully equal to the ordinary transactions of life; was so considered and treated by all persons till removed from Edinburgh on the 2d of July, 1822; corresponded with his friends; mixed in society like other noblemen and gentlemen; in 1790, on coming of age, suffered recoveries with his father, and made a new settlement of his family property. It explained the arrangements on his first marriage and detailed his observations upon it. It alleged that he settled accounts with his agents; attended public meetings and committees; prosecuted an offender and was examined as a witness in 1802; was much affected at the death of his wife; that the second marriage was freely entered into—was his own act and the result of no fraud; that his family wrote letters of congratulation on that marriage; that in 1814 Mr. Newton Fellowes, his brother, applied for a commission of lunacy, which was refused; that subsequently, in 1815, Lord Portsmouth executed a will and codicil, exercised his functions as a peer, and cohabited with Lady Portsmouth till removed by force from Edinburgh; and it exhibited many of his letters. This allegation consisted of above thirty articles, and fifty-seven witnesses were examined in support of it.

[359] Upon the result of this mass of evidence, given by one hundred and twenty-four witnesses, on pleas consisting nearly of eighty articles—depositions more in bulk than in any cause within memory before these tribunals—the Court has to decide whether the marriage is null and void.

The law of the case admits of no controversy, and none has been attempted to be raised upon it. When a fact of marriage has been regularly solemnized, the presumption is in its favour; but then it must be solemnized between parties competent to contract—capable of entering into that most important engagement, the very essence of which is consent: and without soundness of mind there can be no legal consent—none binding in law: insanity vitiates all acts. Nor am I prepared to doubt but that considerable weakness of mind, circumvented by proportionate fraud, will vitiate the fact of marriage, whether the fraud is practised on his ward by a party who stands in the relation of guardian, as in the case of Harford against Morris (2 Consistory Reports, 423), which was decided principally on the ground of fraud, or whether it is effected by a trustee procuring the solemnization of the marriage of his own daughter with a person of very weak mind, over whom he has acquired a great ascendancy. A person, incapable from weakness of detecting the fraud, and of resisting the ascendancy practised in obtaining his consent to the contract, can hardly be considered as binding himself in point of law by such an act. At all events, the circumstances preceding and attending the marriage itself [360] may materially tend to shew the contracting party was of unsound mind, and was so considered and treated by the parties engaged in fraudulently effecting the marriage.

In respect to Lord Portsmouth's unsoundness of mind, the case set up is of a mixed nature—not absolute idiotcy, but weakness of understanding—not continued insanity, but delusions and irrationality on particular subjects. Absolute idiotcy or constant insanity would have carried with them their own security and protection; for in either case the forms preceding, and the ceremony itself, could not have been gone through without exposure and detection; but here a mixture of both, by no means uncommon, is set up—considerable natural weakness, growing at length, from being left to itself and uncontrolled, into practices so irrational and unnatural as in some instances to be bordering upon idiotcy, and in others to be attended with actual delusion—a perversion of mind, a deranged imagination, a fancy and belief of the existence of things which no rational being, no person possessed of the powers of reason and judgment, could possibly believe to exist.

Such being the species of case alleged, what is the sort of proofs of its reality which are laid before the Court? The case is of that importance that I should have been disposed, for the satisfaction of the parties and the relief of my own mind, to have entered into the circumstances minutely, and to have quoted the depositions supporting the several circumstances; but the facts are so extremely numerous, and if detailed at all require to be detailed with all the accom-[361]-panying incidents in order to see their just effect, while the evidence is so very voluminous, that the attempt would be almost endless and impracticable.

To several of the most important articles of the libel, those which set forth the general state of Lord Portsmouth, and his conduct before the death of the first Lady Portsmouth, there are above twenty witnesses examined; so that the existence of the facts generally cannot be doubted, and the shades of difference become immaterial: to select the depositions of particular witnesses would not be satisfactory, as the individual depositions selected might state too much or too little—more or less than the fair general result of all the testimony.

The facts themselves in point of time happened, some before the marriage in question, others after. Those before the marriage are the most important, especially those nearly approaching it, and they are also the most numerously deposed to; but those after the marriage are not immaterial as corroborative and confirmatory, and strengthening the presumption and the proof of unsoundness existing at the marriage. Even the evidence as to the state of Lord Portsmouth at the time of taking the inquisition, and the verdict itself, are not without weight, though nine years after the marriage. Applying to that time several medical gentlemen have been examined—persons particularly skilled in mental disorders—who had various interviews with the noble earl, and they give a decided opinion that he was of unsound mind. Upon their opinion, and also upon the circum-[362]-stances which they mention, it seems hardly denied that in 1823 Lord Portsmouth was unsound; and the explanation attempted is, that he might be in a state of excitement by being hurried down from Scotland (but that was six months before), or from knowing that the enquiry was then going on. However from the facts detailed by the medical witnesses—from their opinions as men of skill, confirmed by the finding of the jury—I am satisfied that at the time of the inquisition Lord Portsmouth was of unsound mind: so far the Court can have no difficulty at once in declaring its deliberate conviction. But some of the medical gentlemen read the affidavits, and they also (as I understand them) heard the witnesses examined at the inquisition, and upon that evidence, as well as upon their own observation and judgment, they carry back their opinions to an earlier period than the time of taking the inquisition. This testimony, therefore, is not without its weight and effect, even retrospectively; but the Court must principally rely upon the circumstances preceding the marriage in question, as spoken to by the witnesses produced on both sides in this suit.

Of the facts bespeaking unsoundness of mind, the persons examined to their belief that Lord Portsmouth was of "sound mind and capable of conducting the ordinary transactions of life" were for the most part wholly ignorant. They themselves admit weakness of intellect. They almost universally designate his lordship as a weak man. Imbecility is a matter of degree, and the degree of weakness differs in the same [363] individual under different circumstances, and according to the different habits existing, and the different situations in which he is placed, at one time or another of his life.

When the medical men give their opinion that the mental deficiency was connate, I do not understand them to mean that he was born either an idiot or a lunatic; but that his mind was naturally and constitutionally defective, and that its defect was not occasioned by any accident or supervening disease. At most, whatever may be meant by that expression, its being connate is only matter of opinion; it is not the case set up in the libel. Their opinion, however, if understood in the manner the Court has explained it, is confirmed by facts, and by the history of Lord Portsmouth. At school he was deficient, and not like other boys; he had especially that character of mind which afterwards accompanied him through life—timidity; he was easily intimidated and cowed; yet he was not incapable of instruction and of improvement; but the capacity of instruction and improvement is a quality possessed by a child at a very early age; it is possessed even by the brute creation; they can be taught, and can acquire things by habit and practice to a certain extent. Lord Portsmouth had a very good memory, and that in a great degree accounts for his receiving instruction, and also accounts for the wrong opinion formed by many witnesses; he could learn arithmetic and languages; but children of eight or ten years old are often perfect in the first rules of arithmetic, and make considerable progress in acquiring [364] languages: it is principally an effort of memory. Lord Portsmouth then was capable of improvement, and no doubt all possible pains were taken to improve him and to qualify him to fill the high station in society to which he was born. He was sent abroad, and had the benefit of foreign travel; he certainly therefore was not considered an idiot, whose mind could in no degree be informed by education, or enlarged by observation.

In 1790, soon after coming of age, he joined his father in suffering a recovery, and in making a new settlement of the family estates, in order to provide for younger children. Here again he was not esteemed nor treated as an idiot; but an act of that sort, proper in itself, and done in concurrence with his family and natural guardian, is no great proof that he did not labour under considerable weakness of mind.

In 1797 his father dies, and though he is then thirty years of age, he remains under the care and superintendence of his mother, who is described as a very clever woman; and is managed by her.

In 1799 he marries Miss Grace Norton. Looking at the circumstances of that marriage—he 32 years of age, Miss Norton 47—and at the settlement then made, by which his property is placed in the hands of trustees; it is hardly possible not to be impressed that this was a piece of family arrangement, for the purpose of protecting a person incapable of taking care of himself, and liable to be imposed upon, and to be entrapped into some improper connexion. With the propriety of that arrangement this [365] Court has nothing to do. The unsoundness of his mind might not at that time have grown to the extent which would render such a marriage, had under the protection and with the concurrence of his family, invalid; nor is it in question, so as to call for the expression of any opinion by the Court, either as to the propriety or the validity of that marriage. Under the maternal care of a wife nearly 50, a kind, prudent, discreet lady, Lord Portsmouth might still further acquire the habit of conducting himself in society in the manner described; his property, put out of his own power, was in the hands of trustees; he had by this settlement constituted them, as it were, the committees of his estates; his domestic concerns were all in the management of his wife; she took not only the superintendence, but the entire control, of every thing domestic; she acted as the committee of his person.

That in 1802, upon receiving a threatening letter of a most infamous kind from a person of the name of Seilaz, whom it was judged necessary to prosecute, he should be able to give evidence in a court of justice, is no conclusive proof of any great extent of capacity, even at that time; it was a simple fact he had to prove, requiring little, if anything, more than memory; nor does it appear that his cross-examination could require more than recollection of facts—not any considerable exercise of the understanding, and of the reasoning powers of the mind; yet even so early as that—in 1802—it was a matter of surprize and of subsequent talk that he did so well; so that the previous impressions [366] and public notoriety were very unfavourable to his understanding.

This examination is perhaps the strongest fact in support of his capacity; for his behaviour at parties, his receiving and paying visits, his making a few observations on the state of the weather, or on horses or farming, his going to public meetings, races, and county balls, are not incompatible with great imbecility of mind; still less are they incompatible with the existence of certain mental delusions and irrational fancies and practices when freed from observation and control. Under the restraint produced by the presence of formal company—under a sense of being observed—a person labouring under considerable imbecility, and some delusions, will pass as possessing a certain degree of understanding; much more than the individuals of the company would give Lord Portsmouth credit for, if they knew his condition when not so restrained: it is just in the same manner that a child in the presence of company will appear very different from his character when at play and unrestrained; but the conduct of such a person will more especially shew itself to advantage when the superintendant is present to watch and to manage him, and by a nod or look keep him within proper bounds, and prevent his exposing himself and his infirmities of mind.

Under these considerations, the great mass of evidence produced to the general conduct and deportment of Lord Portsmouth, and the opinion of his capacity formed by the witnesses, weigh but little against the facts proved as to [367] his behaviour when under no restraint. It should, indeed, seem, that the more properly Lord Portsmouth was able to conduct himself under restraints and checks, the more strongly do the acts of which he was guilty at other times, when left to follow his own inclinations, wear the aspect of derangement rather than of imbecility. Unsoundness of mind does not shew itself upon all occasions; nay, it can often only be discovered by probing and close examination—sometimes even requiring the clue or key that will lead to its detection. He knew he was a peer of the realm, and had learnt some of the rights and duties that belong to that high station; but he either was so weak or so deranged that he was wholly ignorant of what he owed to himself and to his rank; as will appear by the facts to which the Court will very briefly refer.

What are some of the facts proved? I forbear, for reasons already assigned, to enumerate them with the details connected with them, as that would lead to much length, and they have been in a considerable degree stated by counsel.

Grace Lady Portsmouth treated him with great kindness and indulgence, and it is not improbable that such indulgence might lead to the more complete perversion of his mind. If he had been kept under more restraint, he might have continued only a weak man, instead of becoming deluded and unsound; but what is his conduct?

His servants were his playfellows in town and country; he played all sorts of tricks with them; more particularly in the country, where he was [368] less under observation, where he found additional playmates in his farm servants and labourers, and where he was less liable to notice.

He was fond of driving a team, and Lady Portsmouth so far indulged him as to have a team of horses kept for his amusement as a toy and a plaything, with which he carted dung and timber and hay; yet he used to flog these horses most unmercifully, and often in such a manner as to produce danger to his own person.

As further proofs of his unsoundness of mind may be added his propensity for bell-ringing, not, as sometimes young men will do, for exercise, but to share the money; this too by a nobleman of 40, at his own parish church, and near his own residence: his fancy respecting funerals, and his conduct and all the circumstances connected with that fancy: the slaughtering of cattle and the incidents attending that whim. Another trait is his pleasure in malicious cruelty to man and beast; never expressing any regret, but "serves him right" was his usual remark upon his own acts of cruelty. I allude only to these facts very generally, but to state them with the force and effect they have upon my judgment would require a detail of the minuter circumstances connected with each of them.

A still more decided delusion of mind is that relating to lancets, and tapes, and basins in women's pockets; the particulars of which, for the same and even for additional reasons, I do not enumerate. The fact is proved beyond all question; it was a delusion that continued even to the time of the inquisition. Dr. Ainslie ad-[369]-mits that "such a propensity is not consistent with a perfectly sound mind." What the distinction is between a mind not perfectly sound and an unsound mind is not explained by the witness; nor what is the state of the capacity of a man who, when between 40 and 50, twice married, and living in society, supposes that the gestation of a woman could be fifteen months; nor of one who admits that he knew another man was in bed with his wife, that he remonstrated, but "they never took any notice of me," and who does not resent this, nor take any steps for relief, because the man was "too strong" for him. These and other circumstances, admitted on the interrogatories by this witness, occasion his evidence to produce no alteration in my opinion respecting the bearing of the facts before the marriage spoken to by the other witnesses; and the evidence of Swait, the bailiff, who is brought forward to contradict the facts, and to prove the correctness and propriety of Lord Portsmouth's conduct, is equally nugatory: for this witness, on the interrogatories, admits—

"That he did sometimes control the noble earl," that "when he was running a little contrary he threatened to tell Dr. Garnet of him." "Respondent has sometimes wrested a whip out of Lord Portsmouth's hand, when my lord in play has cut him across the legs."

What a picture is this of the noble earl, from a witness produced to prove his capacity and soundness of mind! A nobleman of 40 flogging an old bailiff of 60 for his amusement, and in play cutting him across the legs! the bailiff [370] not submitting nor quitting his service, but by force wresting the whip out of his hands! and the nobleman in his turn submitting to this indignity and forcible control!

I dwell too long on these circumstances. In 1808, whether Lord Portsmouth, perhaps from over indulgence and loose given to his fancies, became less manageable, as a froward boy does, or whether Lady Portsmouth, from her advanced time of life, approaching 60, grew less equal to the task, Mr. Coombe, a medical gentleman, was taken into the family to assist in superintending the noble earl. That gentleman soon acquired an ascendancy, by pretending to quarrel with him, and threatening to demand satisfaction as a gentleman. This of course had the effect of reducing Lord Portsmouth to passive obedience; generally at least, for on two or three occasions passion got the better of timidity. From that time Coombe's presence alone was sufficient to check him, whether at play with the labourers, or whatever irrational fancy he might be pursuing. Mr. Coombe's attendance continued three years, till 1811, when he left, not because Lord Portsmouth had recovered, but because Coombe's private concerns required his attention. It may be proper to repeat that a feature in the character of Lord Portsmouth, which accompanied him all through life, was that he was easily intimidated and controlled. This character usually marks and accompanies unsoundness of mind, whether it be imbecility or derangement, or a mixture of both: if a servant resisted him, he submitted and desisted; if a threat was held out to tell [371] Lady Portsmouth, or Dr. Garnet, or Mr. Coombe, it produced the same effect, and among others (it is not immaterial) the threat to tell Mr. Hanson occasioned the same result. Mr. Hanson's influence and ascendancy over him, as one of the trustees —the acting trustee indeed—is fully established.

In November, 1813, Lady Portsmouth died. Lord Portsmouth's conduct was of that inconsistent character which distinguishes persons of such a mind: at the funeral he behaved as at other "black jobs," as he termed them, one moment overcome with grief, the next merry again. He talked of a Miss de Visme as the object he was very anxious to engage; Miss Hudson, he said, was also suggested to him, but she was too old. The trustees thought it prudent to send him down to Hurtsbourne, attended by Coombe. Another wife was the string of his disorder, but Miss Hanson was never proposed by him as the object of his choice.

On the 28th of February, 1814, Coombe thought it prudent to bring him to London, and to deliver him up to his trustees, Hanson being one, and then in town; that day week he was married to the daughter of Mr. Hanson! Hanson, the confidential solicitor of the family, one of the trustees, who had a great ascendancy over him, who owed him every possible protection, married him to one of his daughters! It is unnecessary to state the jealousy with which the law looks at all transactions between parties standing in these relations to each other.

I will not enter into the particulars of the transaction; the whole of it will bear but one [372] interpretation!—every part is the act of the Hansons! Lord Portsmouth is a mere instrument in their hands to go through the necessary forms! the settlement is begun in forty-eight hours after Lord Portsmouth's arrival in London! the contents of that settlement, the mode in which it is prepared, the concealment of the whole from the friends and the other trustees who were in town, some in the same house with Lord Portsmouth—all these particulars bear the same character. The necessary forms are gone through, but in support of these mere forms not a witness is produced to shew that this nobleman was conducting himself as a man, understanding what he was doing, or capable of judging, or acting as a free and intelligent agent: nothing tending to shew that he was a person of sound mind, nothing in his conduct inconsistent with unsoundness of mind—every circumstance conspires to prove that he was the mere puppet of the Hanson family, and that the celebration of this marriage was brought about by a conspiracy among them to circumvent Lord Portsmouth, over whom they, and particularly the father, had a complete ascendancy and controul, so as to destroy all free agency and rational consent on his lordship's part to this marriage.

A marriage so had wants the essential ingredient to render the contract valid—the consent of a free and rational agent. The marriage itself and the circumstances immediately connected with it do not tend to establish restored sanity; it was neither "a rational act," nor was it "rationally done;" the whole "sounds to folly" and negatives sanity of mind. The Hanson's, [373] in the mode of planning and conducting the transaction, shew that they treated and considered Lord Portsmouth as a person of unsound mind, and Lord Portsmouth, in submitting, acquiescing, and not resisting, confirms his own incompetency. Even if no actual unsoundness of mind, strictly so called, if no insane derangement had existed—if only weakness of mind, and all admit he was weak, yet considering the passiveness and timidity of his character on the one hand, the influence and relation of Hanson, his trustee, on the other, and the clandestinity and other marks of fraud which accompanied the whole transaction—I am by no means prepared to say that without actual derangement in the strict sense the marriage would not be invalid, but in my judgment Lord Portsmouth was of unsound mind, as well as circumvented by fraud.

As this is the great fact which the Court has to decide, it seems unnecessary to pursue the subsequent history. The Court gladly relieves itself from going through the disgusting particulars of the treatment which this unfortunate nobleman afterwards experienced from the pretended wife and her family and associates—forbearance in this respect is for their advantage; yet the subsequent treatment corroborates, and is confirmatory of, the former condition of Lord Portsmouth; no change in his mind and character is suggested to have taken place after the marriage; no supervening malady producing derangement of mind; he continued just the same man as before the marriage in mental condition, though treated in a manner very different from the kindness of the first wife.

[374] Upon the whole, the Court pronounces that the marriage in fact, solemnized between the Earl of Portsmouth and Mary Ann Hanson, is in law null and void; he being at that time not of sound mind sufficient to enter into such a contract; and that the celebration of such marriage was effected by fraud and circumvention; and pronouncing, as the Court feels bound to do, that latter part of its sentence, it feels also bound to grant the prayer for costs.

CHEALE v. CHEALE. Arches Court, Easter Term, 4th Session, 1828.—A suit by the wife against her husband having abated by the wife's death; the Court will not, at the petition of the proctor, direct the costs incurred by the wife to be paid by the husband.

On petition.

This petition, after alleging that in a cause promoted by Mary Cheale against her husband by reason of cruelty and adultery the Court, on the by-day of Trinity Term, 1827, had allotted the sum of 50l. on account of alimony to be paid to the wife; further stated that, on the 31st of August, Mrs. Cheale died without having received any part of the alimony, and that her proctor's costs had not been paid; and concluded with a prayer that the Court would direct the costs incurred on her behalf in this suit to be paid by the husband, and would refer the bill for taxation.

Lushington and Dodson in support of the application. Assuming that if the husband had died, we could not, in this Court, have proceeded against his executor; yet, since the husband is alive, the Court is not precluded by the death of the wife from enforcing against him [375] the costs which have been incurred on her behalf. A contrary decision would lead, in all cases of this description, to the necessity of strictly enforcing a taxation de die in diem during the suit. In this instance the costs are trifling, and, at any rate, must be taxed.

Per Curiam. At whose suit is the Court to tax the costs?

Lushington. At the petition of the proctor; and when his bill has been taxed a monition will issue in the usual form for payment to the proctor or his party.

Phillimore contrà. By the death of Mrs. Cheale the cause has abated, and the authority of her proctor ceased. A proxy is only a personal appointment, "ad comparendum, et ad agendum omnia quæ ipse cliens ageret si præsens personaliter esset" (Oughton, tit. 48, s. 1).

Per Curiam. The object of the law in permitting a de die in diem taxation was to obviate any inconvenience or delay that might otherwise arise, in the progress of the cause, from the wife's want of funds to meet the costs. Here the proctor forbore at the proper time to procure such taxation; and the Court cannot now assist him. His appointment is extinct. No precedent has been furnished me of a proctor suing a husband in these Courts for costs: he may, perhaps, have a remedy at common law, and if it is wished, the Court will direct his costs to be taxed in order to ascertain their amount. I must decline to make the decree prayed in this case.

Application rejected.

[376] IN THE GOODS OF JAMES GIBBS. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 1st Session, 1828.—Where minors are concerned, probate in common form cannot be granted of a mere memorandum of doubtful construction, on affidavits shewing that the deceased intended to increase the benefit to certain legatees under a formal will, and was prevented by death from giving his solicitor instructions to that effect.

On motion.

James Gibbs died on the 3rd of March, 1828. He left a widow and seven children, minors—four daughters and three sons. By his will, dated the 17th of February, 1825, and duly executed, he appointed his wife (during widowhood), Samuel Pickering, and Thomas Gray, executors; and, after providing for the management of his business, and bequeathing legacies to his wife and three sons, he gave to each of his daughters 1000l. 3 per cent. reduced annuities absolutely, and 1500l. of the like stock for life, afterwards to their children; and the residue equally between all his children who should attain 21; the daughters' shares to them for life, and then to their respective children. The personal property amounted to about 25,000l. From an affidavit it appeared that the testator, during the last three months of his life, had frequently expressed to his executors, and to his eldest son, that he intended to alter his will and leave his daughters more property, in consequence of his eldest child, Mrs. Robinson, having died without issue; that on the 21st of February last he [377] wrote in the presence of his wife a memorandum as follows:—

"Martha Eliza Cate Sofia, 3 R. 1300—1000 3½, if James settles and occopys the frunt house he must alow his brother Thomas 50l. a year for that"

The affidavit then stated that he put this paper into his pocket-book, and both at that time, and on subsequent days, declared his intention of making an addition to his daughters' legacies; that on the 2nd of March he expressed himself to that effect to his solicitor, and appointed to attend at his office for that purpose on the following morning, but was prevented by sudden death.

The memorandum was found after the testator's death in his pocket-book; and Lushington now moved for probate of it, to issue in common form to his executors as a codicil.

Per Curiam. There are not sufficient grounds laid to enable the Court to grant probate of this paper. The original will is a long instrument, carefully prepared, and the disposition seems to have been maturely considered. The present paper was written as a mere memorandum, not as embodying the deceased's final intention. His object, as the affidavit tends to shew, was to give a larger portion to his daughters: but the construction of the paper is obscure whether the sum mentioned was to be an addition to, or substitution for, the benefit under the will; whether it was proposed to be given to them absolutely, or [378] for life, and then to their children. I should feel considerable difficulty in granting probate of this instrument even on a proxy of consent; but as on the present occasion the interest of minors will be affected, I am decidedly of opinion that the facts stated are insufficient to justify the Court in acceding to this motion.

Motion refused.

IN THE GOODS OF RICHARD MORESBY. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 1st Session, 1828.—The deceased, supposing his will appointing his wife sole executrix and universal legatee for life to be lost, made in Peru a nuncupative will (not in conformity with the statute of frauds), with a general revocatory clause, and appointing two executors and his wife universal legatee absolutely. The executors renounced, and she took probate of that will in Peru. The former will being found (of which fact he was ignorant at the time of his death), probate thereof, at the wife's prayer, granted to her.

On motion.

This was an application from the widow of Lieutenant Moresby, R.N., that probate of his will, dated on the 25th of January, 1821, might be granted to her as sole executrix; and in support of her application she made the following affidavit:—

"That she was the relict of the deceased, sole executrix, and universal legatee for life named in his will duly executed and dated the 26th of January, 1821; that shortly after this period the deceased left England in the command of a private merchant vessel, taking with him this will, and proceeded with his wife to Peru; that after their arrival they resided principally on board; but that during a temporary absence of Lieutenant Moresby the vessel with all his effects and papers, including his will, was captured by pirates, but was soon afterwards retaken: that on the occasion of [379] such capture the deceased lost several papers of consequence, and expressed his firm belief to his wife that his will had then been destroyed. That the deceased, as she has been informed, and verily believes, whilst at the city of Bolivar, was attacked with the illness of which he died; that on the 13th day of February, 1827, the day before his death, being incapable of writing, and fearing he might die intestate, he sent for a notary, in whose presence, and that of four other witnesses, he made a nuncupative will, by declaring that in contemplation of his death he nominated and appointed two executors, both resident in the city of Bolivar, and his wife sole heiress, and revoked all his other testamentary dispositions; but that the said will was not reduced into writing in the lifetime of the deceased." Mrs. Moresby further made oath, "that, upon the renunciation of the two executors in the proper Court at Lima, she there duly proved the nuncupative will, and administered the effects in Peru; and that shortly before the deceased's death, and, as she verily believes, while he was at Bolivar in his last illness, she discovered among his papers on board the will, dated 26th January, 1821, but that he died in ignorance of that circumstance." The affidavit further stated that both the executors were resident in the city of Bolivar, or some other part of Peru, of which one was a native.

The only property of the deceased in this country consisted of about 500l. due for arrears of half pay.

[380] Lushington. The question is whether a nuncupative will made and proved in Peru supersedes a prior will written and executed in this country—whether the statute of frauds (29 Car. II. c. 3, s. 22) does or does not affect such a case. The widow, in asking probate of the will of 1821, waives an interest which she would take under the will of 1827; in the former she has but a life interest; in the latter she is absolute universal legatee.

Per Curiam. It is not necessary here to decide the question (upon which there may be some doubt) whether the statute of frauds would apply to the nuncupative will made in Peru. Both wills contain nearly the same disposition, and give the whole property to the wife; the latter, absolutely: the former, of which she is content to take probate, for life only. It appears that the deceased did not intend to revoke the will of 1821, but supposing it to be lost, and being unwilling to die intestate, he made the nuncupative will. As, however, the former has been recovered, there is no objection to probate thereof being granted to the widow and universal legatee for life.

Motion granted.

[381] IN THE GOODS OF JOHN EWING. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 1st Session, 1828.—Administration durante minoritate of children in the East Indies decreed to the uncle resident in Ireland, he giving full justifying security: the grandfather, to whom as next of kin the grant would naturally pass, being upwards of 80, and also resident in Ireland.

On motion.

Haggard moved, on the affidavit of the Reverend William Ewing, to the following effect:—

Per Curiam. The deceased was a major in the Madras regiment of infantry: he died intestate, and has left three children who are minors, all resident in the East Indies; and the uncle (the Reverend Mr. Ewing), who lives in Ireland, is desirous of being nominated guardian to take out administration for their use and benefit. The next of kin, whom the Court usually appoints, is the grandfather; but he is superannuated, being eighty years old; he is also resident in Ireland: it would then be extremely inconvenient to appoint him, since he would hardly live till the minors were of age. The uncle states the property to be in the hands of an agent, and under 500l.; and that he is willing to collect and invest it. He will give full justifying security, so that the interests of the minors may be protected. With this precaution, and under the special circumstances of the case, the Court will, I think, exercise a proper discretion in granting this application.

Motion granted.

[382] LARPENT v. SINDRY. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 1st Session, 1828.—In decreeing probate, the Court is usually regulated by the grant of the Court of probate where the party was domiciled; i.e. the competent jurisdiction—in this instance the Court of Supreme Judicature at Fort William, Bengal.

[Applied, In the Goods of Earl, 1867, L. R. 1 P. & D. 451.]

On motion.

Thomas Barnes, of the H. E. I. Company's Civil Service, died in May, 1826, in India. He left two testamentary papers, written with his own hand, bearing date respectively the 12th of April, 1825, and the 6th of May, 1826, both beginning in the same formal manner, and both disposing of the whole of his property, though differently. By the first will, which was duly executed, he appointed five executors; but by the second no executor was named, though it contained this sentence—"which sum the executors thereinafter mentioned;" and the paper thus concluded—"I feel too fatigued to write more." This paper bequeathed the residue to the deceased's natural son, a minor, who was, in December, 1824, consigned to this country for his education: the paper was subscribed, but not witnessed.

Of both these instruments probate had been granted, as the will and codicil of the deceased, by the Supreme Court of Judicature at Fort William, in Bengal, to John Palmer, Esq., one of the executors in the will of 1825, with the ordinary power reserved. Of the other executors, three were willing to renounce; and a decree had been served, in the usual manner, on the remaining executor, Mr. Sindry, who was resident at Bombay.

[383] An exemplification of the probate in India having been transmitted to this country, Lushington moved for administration with the exemplified copy of the two papers annexed, as the will and codicil of the deceased, to be granted to Mr. Larpent, partner in the house of Cockerell and Co., the attornies of John Palmer, the executor.

The property within the province of Canterbury nearly amounted to 2000l.

Per Curiam. The form of the grant in India is not exactly according to our practice. Here the two papers would have been proved as together containing the will of the deceased: but the Court in India, which, as the deceased died domiciled there, is the Court of competent jurisdiction, has considered them as a will and codicil, and this Court is perhaps bound to follow it. The question how far this and other Courts of probate are to be governed by the decision of the Court of Probate where the deceased was domiciled has never been expressly determined, but I certainly should not feel inclined to depart from what has been the general practice, unless a strong case of inconvenience were brought under my consideration. I have, on the present occasion, the less difficulty in following the Indian grant, because I am not aware that there will be much difference in the ultimate result, whichever way the decree passes.

Let the administration with the exemplified copies of the two papers pass as prayed.

Motion granted.

[384] INGRAM v. WYATT. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 1st Session, 1828.—Mere evidence of execution of a will and codicil by a person of weak and inert mind, appointing his attorney and agent sole executor and almost universal legatee of a large property, is insufficient, without proof of instructions by the deceased; instructions for the will being given to the solicitor, who prepared and attested it, by and in the handwriting of the executor's father (also the deceased's co-agent and attorney); the codicil being prepared exclusively for his own benefit by the executor, in whose house the deceased was living apart from his family; and other circumstances strongly inferring fraud and circumvention.

[Reversed, 1828, 3 Hagg. Ecc. 466. Applied, Butlin v. Barry, 1837, 1 Curt. 619. Discussed, Barry v. Butlin, 1838, 2 Moore, P. C. 483; Fulton v. Andrew, 1875, L. R. 7 H. L. 461.]

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. John Clopton, the deceased in this cause, died on the 20th of November, 1824, aged about 74 years, leaving Miss Barbara Ingram, his sister, and sole next of kin. His personal property amounted in value to £25,000; his real estate to £250 per annum.

The will propounded bears date on the 4th of August, 1821: it bequeaths to his sister, Barbara Ingram, £2000; to his cousin, Barbara Ingram, £4000; to Hugh Carolan, £1000; to the poor of Stratford-upon-Avon, £50; to Henry Wyatt, the residue both of his real and personal property; and appoints Henry Wyatt sole executor.

The codicil, dated on the 5th of August, 1822, after reciting the clause of the will giving £2000 to his sister, revokes that legacy, and in all other respects confirms the will.

The will and the codicil are each attested by three witnesses; they are propounded by Henry Wyatt the executor; and are opposed by Barbara Ingram, the sister of the deceased. The present question is on the factum of those instruments respectively; and the proceedings that have taken place are shortly these. The [385] executor propounded the papers in a common condidit pleading instructions, execution, and capacity; the six subscribed witnesses were examined, and deposed to execution and capacity. Additional articles were afterwards brought in alleging the incapacity of Richard Wyatt (who received the instructions for the will from the deceased, and communicated them to the solicitor) in order to account for his non-examination; and on these articles two witnesses were produced.

In opposition to this case the sister gave in a long allegation, entering into the history of the deceased, and of all his conduct and transactions, for the purpose of shewing that this will and codicil were obtained without testamentary intention and capacity sufficient to give them legal effect.

To that allegation a long reply was made in order to establish testamentary intention, and to confirm and support capacity. Upon these pleas twenty-eight witnesses have been examined by the sister, and eleven by the executor, besides those before produced on the condidit, and additional articles: and it was upon their depositions and upon a great number of exhibits, which furnish very important illustrations of the case on both sides, that the cause was elaborately argued at the end and after the conclusion of last term.(a)

The case is of considerable intricacy, involved in a great mass of testimony and mul-[386]-titude of facts, important in value, and as it affects character. There were also other suits occupying fully the time of the Court in an unusual degree up to the caveat day; so that it was a matter of justice to all the parties that the Court should take time to deliberate and to revise the evidence and arguments.

For the sister it was argued that the disposition was in favour of a stranger in blood that the parties interested were active in obtaining the instruments; that the will was prepared from instructions conveyed by the father of the executor—the codicil by the executor himself—that these persons were the attornies and agents of the deceased; that the presumption of law was against the act; that the law, though not positively invalidating, yet required the clearest proof of unbiassed intention and full understanding of the nature and effect of such instruments; that the capacity of the deceased, though not intestable, yet was weak and liable to circumvention and imposition; that the evidence of the factum did not clear up these difficulties, and was insufficient to support the testamentary papers; lastly, that there were such marks of fraudulent conduct in the executor as called for his condemnation in costs.

For the executor: that though by the principle of law, where parties interested were active in the framing of the testamentary instrument, and stood in a particular relation to the testator, a greater degree of vigilance was required in investigating the transaction, yet that this case would fully satisfy the most jealous examination; that the deceased was not a person of [387] doubtful but of perfect capacity; that no circumstance of fraud attached upon the executor; that the evidence on the condidit, and of subsequent recognitions and conduct, fully established the testamentary intention and the validity of the will and of the codicil.

This is the general outline of the argument, though various collateral circumstances of detail were necessarily gone into; and in nearly the same order am I disposed to review the case, and—

First, to examine the principles of law applicable to the admitted facts of the case.

Secondly, to endeavour to ascertain the nature and degree of the deceased's capacity, and how far he was liable to, or secure against, imposition, noticing any circumstances creating a suspicion of any imposition having been actually practised.

Lastly, combining the condition and degree of the capacity of the deceased with the relation and conduct of the executor, to consider whether the evidence of the factum is sufficient to satisfy the demands of the law and the conscience of the Court, that this was the free act of a capable and intelligent testator.

A short statement of the admitted facts is necessary in order to consider the principles of law applicable to the case.

The deceased's original name was Ingram; he was the younger of two brothers, and had an only sister, the party opposing the present will. In earlier life he was wild and extravagant, and thereby (as Barbara Ingram, his cousin, states on the seventh interrogatory) "gave offence to [388] his relations, and involved himself in much pecuniary embarrassment, and lived many years in a state of indigence." On a very narrow income—an annuity of £72 left him by his father, and a portion of the Chetwode estate in Buckinghamshire, making together not quite £120 a year (for whatever else he had acquired from his father seems to have been dissipated)—he had for thirty years been leading a strange obscure life, in wretched lodgings or at coffee houses in this town; when in May, 1818, his elder brother Edward, who was tenant for life of the Clopton estate near Stratford-on-Avon, of the yearly value of £1500, and who had assumed the name of Clopton, died intestate; and in consequence that estate devolved on the deceased for life, and he soon after changed his name: he also succeeded to half his brother's personalty, amounting to nearly £10,000, and to the other moiety of the Chetwode estate. At that time he was living in a lodging at Mead's, an engraver in Queen Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, and occupied a room up two pair of stairs, at eight shillings per week. Shortly after his brother's death he removed to lodgings at Hugh Carolan's, an apothecary in Charlotte Street, Fitzroy Square, where, in like manner, he had a room up two pair of stairs at the same rent. In the latter end of June, 1822, he went to Stratford, accompanied by Carolan, who, leaving him at an inn in that town, on the following morning returned to London. The same day the deceased was called upon by Henry Wyatt, who occupied Clopton House as his tenant: thither he was carried the [389] next day, and there with Henry Wyatt and his family he resided till his death in November, 1824.

This is a short history of the deceased; and it may be proper here to add that on the death of Edward Clopton, Richard Wyatt and his son Henry, who were attornies at Stratford, and agents to Edward Clopton, came to town and were met by Mr. Severne, an intimate acquaintance and friend of the sister, Miss Barbara Ingram, on whose part he was to act. On that occasion administration to the brother was taken out by the deceased, and Richard Wyatt and Severne became his sureties. Before Severne left town half the funded property was transferred into Miss Barbara Ingram's name; the other half into the deceased's name, then John Ingram: Wyatt and his son were to continue the agents and receivers of the Clopton estate; to remit the rents to the bankers, Messrs. Martin and Company; and the bankers were to receive the dividends, and when the balance in their hands exceeded £500 to purchase stock. Matters being thus arranged, Mr. Wyatt returned to Stratford, and the deceased remained at his lodgings at Mead's, but soon after removed to Carolan's, as already stated.

Richard Wyatt appears to have come to town in 1819: the accounts at the stamp office were passed in that year, and a charge of £21 for the journey is made in the accounts for 1818 and 1819, settled in June, 1820, when Richard Wyatt was again in London. Those accounts are signed by both parties, and on the same day, viz. 30th of June, 1820. In July, 1821, the [390] Wyatts again come to London, Richard, the father, about the 25th, Henry, the son, about the 29th, and on the 31st of July the account for the year 1820 is signed. Early in August instructions in Richard Wyatt's handwriting are carried by Richard Wyatt to his town agent—Mr. Adlington—to prepare a will for the deceased. The draft of that will is prepared and sent by Mr. Adlington to Richard Wyatt, who returned it indorsed "4 August, 1821, ingrossed," and on that day the will is executed in the presence of the executor. In respect to the codicil: the deceased arrives at Stratford on the 24th of June, 1822, on the 26th he goes to Clopton House; soon after his arrival the draft of the codicil is prepared by Henry Wyatt—his attorney and agent—entirely for his own benefit; on the 19th of July he takes it to a law stationer, who makes the copy, carries it back and delivers it to Henry Wyatt; on the 5th of August it is read by Henry Wyatt to the deceased in the presence of one witness, and afterwards executed in the presence of three persons and attested by them.

Both instruments, then, are prepared from instructions, not given directly by the deceased, but through the intervention of the party interested, and are executed in the presence of the executor and residuary legatee—that person being the attorney and agent of the deceased.

Under these admitted facts the first consideration is whether the law has established any principles specially applying to such a state of circumstances. The Court has been refer-[391]-red to the case of Paske v. Ollat (2 Phill. 323). The same doctrine is held in Billinghurst v. Vickers (1 Phill. 193); it is hardly, however, fit for me to depend much upon those cases, as it would be relying upon my own authority; and I shall, therefore, only say that I see no reason to depart from the opinions there expressed; but as the present case is important, it may be proper to advert to some authorities in support of the principles maintained in those decisions.

By the civil law, if a person wrote a will in his own favour, the instrument was rendered void.(c) That rule has not been adopted in its full extent by the law of England, which only holds that such conduct creates a presumption against the act, and renders necessary very clear proof of volition and capacity: nor does the law of this Court determine that the act is absolutely void, even though the person making the will is the attorney and agent of the testator. The suspicion is thereby increased; and for obvious reasons: the testator reposes confidence in his attorney, and is less on his guard against imposition: while the attorney, from skill and knowledge, is more likely to be successful in such a contrivance, and has more influence so as to obtain a blind acquiescence. Courts of Equity have in many instances set deeds aside on account of the relation of influence in the person obtaining, and of confidence in the person granting, the benefit; as in the cases of guardian and ward—attorney and client—agent and principal—and the like—more par-[392]-ticularly in respect to attorney and client. As, for example, in Walmsley v. Booth (2 Atkyns, 25-27): it was this case. "Japhet Crook in 1728 being under several prosecutions for perjury and forgery, employed the defendant Booth as his attorney to get bail, which he accordingly did; Crook himself having used many fruitless endeavours for that purpose: during this transaction Booth drew Crook's will, who directed a legacy of £1000 to the defendant, and £500 apiece to the bail; the defendant, subsequently, got a bond for the security of his legacy. Crook afterwards revoked the will, and by another appointed the plaintiff, Mary Walmsley, executrix, and made her his residuary legatee After the death of the testator Booth brought an action on the bond, and obtained a verdict and judgment; and a bill was filed to be relieved against it on the ground of fraud; Crook living six years after giving the bond, and not attempting to be relieved, Lord Hardwicke decreed for the defendant." However, in the course of his judgment the Lord Chancellor said, "To be sure it is extremely wrong in an attorney to take bonds for services; but if a client, with his eyes open, will give such a bond, it would be going too far to say such a bond is absolutely void. This case has been compared to that of young heirs in distress for money in the lifetime of their fathers, but I do not think this comes up to the present case, for there the Court presumes weakness in the person and upon that consideration; but there is no pretence [393] for it here, for Crook was more likely to impose than to be imposed upon; and yet if there had been the slightest evidence of imposition upon Crook, I should make no scruple of relieving against this bond."

(c) Vide Dig. lib. 48, t. 10, s. 15, and lib. 34, t. 8.

The slightest evidence of imposition then, even in the case of a very shrewd man, as Crook is represented to have been, would have been sufficient to set aside the bond.

The case afterwards came on for a re-hearing, when Lord Hardwicke reversed his former decision; and, on reversing it, said "that it was a case of a good deal of consequence: that it had been compared in the first place to the defrauding of young and improvident heirs where the Court relieves on the general principle of mischief to the public without requiring particular evidence of actual imposition upon them, and they are cases of general concern: they also give relief, because the circumstances and situation of young persons at the time of the agreement make them extremely liable to imposition."

In a further part of his judgment the Lord Chancellor says, "I think the case is stronger between attornies and their clients than any of the cases it has been compared with; because all Courts order their bills to be taxed; and there are a number of cases in this Court where a client unassisted by an attorney has paid a law bill and accepted of a receipt for it, and yet has been allowed to open the whole account notwithstanding, and to take exceptions to any improper or extravagant charge in the attorney's bill. Nay, even if a client [394] has given an attorney a bond or mortgage to secure the payment of what was charged to be due to him on account of a law suit, the Courts of Equity have relieved the client, and ordered the bill to be taxed. And what is the reason the Court goes upon in such determination? Why the great power and influence that an attorney has over his client."

On this second hearing the bond was set aside. So, in another case, the case of Saunderson v. Glass (2 Atk. 297), it was laid down in the course of the hearing that "if an attorney, pendente lite, prevails on a client to agree to an exorbitant reward, the Court will either set it aside entirely, or reduce it to the standard of those fees to which he is properly entitled."

Now these cases shew that there is a particular jealousy and anxiety on the part of all Courts in guarding suitors against that sort of influence and knowledge which attornies possess and may exercise injuriously towards their clients. There are other cases to the same effect.

In Cray v. Mansfield (1 Ves. sen. 379) a deed by one just come of age to an agent, as a bounty or gift, though there was no fraud, was in part set aside; so in Pierce v. Waring, cited in that case, a deed to the late guardian was annulled; and in Oldham v. Hand (2 Ves. sen. 259) the same doctrine was recognized.

The cases then shew how extremely jealous the law is to protect the unwary against undue influence and control. Where that relation of confidence exists, and where the party frames the instrument for his own advantage and benefit, every presumption arises against the [395] transaction. As in the case of an interested witness, it is not necessary to prove falsehood; a court of law will not hear him at all; so in the case of such an executor it is not necessary to prove fraud and circumvention—he must remove the suspicion by clear and satisfactory proof. To shew that such has been the doctrine of this Court at all times (because it is the doctrine of common sense and of sound justice) I will state a note of a judgment of one of my predecessors, Dr. Calvert, who was as able and as excellent a Judge as ever filled the chair which I have now the honour of occupying. The case is Middleton v. Forbes, decided in this Court in Trinity Term, 1787. I was not of counsel in it, but was at the bar at the time. It was very elaborately argued by Dr. Wynne, the then King's advocate, and by Dr. Scott, now Lord Stowell, in support of the will—and by Dr. Harris and Dr. Bever for the next of kin. The judgment will sufficiently shew the circumstances of the case.

"John Wilcox died on the 21st of October, 1778, leaving a will dated on the 5th of August, 1776. The contents are in substance as follows:—'He describes himself as John Wilcox of Ringwood—cousin, heir at law, and sole next of kin of William Wilcox, late of Portsmouth Common, deceased: he directs his debts to be paid; he leaves—to two female servants of his late cousin annuities of 10l. 8s. each—to his niece, Catherine Wilcox, and to his cousins, James Middleton of Ringwood, and John Middleton of Rumsey, all his property real and personal as tenants in common; if his niece shall have no issue he be-[396]-queaths her third of the real property to the Middletons; he appoints James and John Middleton his executors. The will is signed by the deceased and attested by three witnesses.' As to the state of the deceased: he had lived at Ringwood a poor man, but by the death of his relation he became possessed of about 3000l. Immediately on the death of this relation, Middleton, receiving notice, carried the deceased to Winchester—got administration to his cousin, then carried the deceased to Portsmouth, where William Wilcox had died, and soon after obtained this will. The Middletons afterwards got a deed of gift from the deceased, took possession of the estate, and kept possession of it till 1781, when Forbes took out administration to the deceased and proceeded against Middleton, in Chancery, to set aside the deed. The deed was set aside, and the decree affirmed by the House of Lords. During the proceedings in Chancery no mention was made of this will. The will has now been set up here. Objection is taken to it in point of law as giving the property to the attorney, and cases have been quoted in Chancery shewing that the objection would there be valid; but that rule has never been adopted here. In the testamentary cases quoted, Barton v. Robins (3 Phill. 455, notis) and Ousley v. Wells (Prerog. Trin. Ter. 1777) there were other circumstances of fraud upon which the wills were set aside. It is objected also that the subsequent deed revoked the will; but that is not so: for the deed disposed only of part of the property; [397] the will applies to the whole. Overruling, therefore, the legal objections, I come to the facts of the case; and the question is whether there is proof that this was the unbiassed act of the deceased. The first consideration is his capacity. It is admitted he was a drunken man, whom the boys followed and hooted—boys do not follow a mere drunken man, but an antick man playing tricks, such as this man did: his relations considered him in this light, for they made him a small weekly allowance. On his receiving this 3000l. the Middletons immediately carried him away and had the entire management of him; he had no regard for money; he was intirely under the direction of the Middletons, and under their custody, though not actually shut up, at Portsmouth, at a distance from his relations; the will was made by the person who had the beneficial interest—Qui se scripsit hæredem renders the will void under the civil law, though it is not so by the law of England. A deed is also obtained for the same purpose, and though the setting aside of the deed does not establish fraud, yet it is a corroborating circumstance. The ineptitude of such a bargain might be a sufficient ground to set aside the deed, but not the will, which does not take immediate effect. Yet the obtaining such a deed does come strongly to corroborate the fraud of the will: it shews that the testator was liable to imposition, that he executed a deed which he ought not to have executed, and that the Middletons obtained a deed they ought not to have obtained. In Ousley v. [398] Wells Sir George Hay laid the foundation of the fraud, on the part of the executor, in his amusing the next of kin in order to prevent their taking administration till he had obtained probate—that shewed a mala fides—here is a much stronger instance of mala fides in obtaining this deed—still this may be done away by full proof of the factum. Two of the attesting witnesses are dead, only one is surviving; here are no instructions, though instructions are not necessary where the capacity is not doubtful, yet where imposition and custody are suspected the defect of instructions is extremely material, more especially when the writer makes himself executor. Collins, the subscribing witness, says that a conversation passed between the deceased and Middleton and the witness' father about a will; but not that the will was prepared by the direction of the deceased, nor does he specify the conversation. The evidence of the execution does not specifically detail any thing as originating with the deceased himself, but merely what he said in answer to what was put to him.

"This is all that comes out to clear up these doubts, and to remove the suspicion of fraud: every thing originates with the Middletons—it seems a concerted plan to obtain this will—they shew that they thought the deceased liable to imposition, otherwise they would have trusted him, and not got the deed: they were afraid of the continuance of his affection, lest he should fall into other hands.

"Upon the whole, I do not think the evidence [399] of the execution does away the suspicious circumstances of fraud and imposition. I shall therefore pronounce against the will, but I shall give no costs."

I have looked into the original papers in Middleton v. Forbes; and the deposition of Collins, the only surviving attesting witness, was to the following effect:—"He is an auctioneer; he and his father were employed on the death of William Wilcox about his funeral. The transaction of which he is about to depose took place at his (William Wilcox's) house about a fortnight after the death. From a conversation between the deceased, Middleton and witness' father, he understood the will was ready for execution: the deceased expressed a desire then to sign it, and desired deponent to fetch a third witness, his uncle. The will was read in the presence of all three; the deceased was attentive—expressed full approbation—took a pen and signed his name, and published the paper as his will." The witness speaks to his full belief of his capacity—says "that the deceased was a wary man, perfectly sober, and expressed great obligations to the Middletons,(a) though the deceased was not acquainted with the nature and full extent of the property of which he was become possessed, yet he thought it considerable." This is the substance of Collins' deposition; and from my note of the sentence the learned Judge did not seem to think this witness discredited, yet on [400] the whole case he was of opinion that the will was not satisfactorily proved.

The circumstances differ in many respects from the present; for no two cases of circumstances agree exactly: yet the principles deducible from it confirm those laid down in Paske v. Ollat. This case shews where such grounds of suspicion exist, the evidence must be clear and decisive; it shews that it is not necessary to prove fraud and imposition; for the Judge gave no costs, so that fraud was not proved, yet he pronounced against the will; it shews also that though the parties may stand in a suspicious relation, and though there may be suspicious conduct, and some deficiency of capacity, yet satisfactory evidence of the factum may establish the instrument—that the instrument is not in law invalid.

Secondly, then applying and governed by these principles, I proposed to examine what was the state of capacity: for if the capacity was quite perfect, and the deceased in no degree exposed to circumvention, he would take care not to put his hand to an instrument and publish it as his will without fully knowing its nature and import, and approving its contents.

It was not denied in argument; that the deceased to a certain extent was possessed of capacity, which with clear proof might give effect to a testamentary instrument; that if the attesting witnesses could have spoken to instructions given by the deceased himself; to circumstances and conduct clearly and distinctly manifesting intention and volition, and that he fully comprehended the nature of the act, and [401] evinced a voluntary wish and desire so to dispose of his property—there was nothing in the evidence of incapacity sufficient to falsify such a case.

The deceased was not insane; nor was he an idiot: he had a certain degree of eccentricity; but no delusion: he had a certain degree of weakness of understanding that exposed him to imposition; but not that degree of imbecility which rendered him intestable. This is the sort of case set up in argument, and upon which the Court has to decide. It becomes important, therefore, for me to consider carefully what is meant by "imbecility of mind"—what are its marks and characters—and what are its effects and bearings in deciding upon the validity of a will.

In order to arrive at the true meaning of "imbecility of mind," we may resort to what the law describes as perfect capacity, which is most correctly found in the form of our pleadings. The averment to be contained in a common condidit is, that the testator was "of sound mind, memory, and understanding, talked and discoursed rationally and sensibly, and was fully capable of any rational act requiring thought, judgment, and reflection." Here is the legal standard. When all this can be truly predicated of the person, bare execution is sufficient: but if it cannot be truly predicated, a deficiency of capacity exists—a deficiency not necessarily rendering the person intestable, but in proportion to the degree of deficiency, requiring clearer and more direct proof of the unbiassed testamentary intention. Imbecility and weakness of mind [402] may exist in different degrees between the limits of absolute idiotcy on the one hand, and of perfect capacity on the other. When the law uses the terms "mind, memory, understanding—thought, judgment, reflection," it must not be supposed that they are quite synonymous; that each means precisely the same thing.

(a) It appeared that the Middletons were distant relations, and that one of them paid the deceased his weekly allowance before the death of William Wilcox, the cousin.

By no means: they are separate faculties, though nearly connected with and graduating into each other; and one or more of these faculties may be defective in a greater or less degree, while the others remain perfect in the same individual.

Locke, speaking of idiots, says, "Those who cannot distinguish, compare, and abstract, would hardly be able to judge or reason to any tolerable degree, but only a little and imperfectly, about things present and very familiar to their senses; and indeed any of the forementioned faculties, if wanting or out of order, produce suitable effects in men's understandings and knowledge." "In fine, the defect in naturals seems to proceed from want of quickness, activity, and motion in the intellectual faculties." (a)

In confirmation of this doctrine we find (and I state it from observation, from examples, and from high medical authorities which have lately come under my notice) (b) different faculties failing in different persons. For example, the memory is sometimes perfect where [403] higher powers of the understanding are greatly defective. When imbecility is original or, as medical authorities express it, connate, the memory is often perfect, especially of trifling and simple circumstances, though the other mental powers remain infantine; or, as the same authorities suppose and express it, "The brain has never developed itself." In such an individual the understanding has made little progress with years—it has not matured and ripened in the usual manner: yet, even in such individuals, unless the imbecility be extreme, some improvement will have taken place—some progress in knowledge beyond mere infancy will have been made; by the help of memory, by imitation, by habit, such an individual will acquire many ideas, will recollect facts and circumstances and places, and hacknied quotations from books, will conduct himself orderly and mannerly, will make a few rational remarks on familiar and trite subjects, may retain self dominion and spend his own little income in providing for his wants, as a boy spends his pocket-money, and yet may labour under great infirmity of mind and be very liable to fraud and imposition.

The principal marks and features of imbecility are the same which belong to childhood, of course (as already observed) varying in degree in different individuals—frivolous pursuits, fondness for and stress upon trifles, inertness of mind, paucity of ideas, shyness, timidity, submission to control, acquiescence under influence, and the like. Hence these infantine qualities have acquired for this species [404] of deficiency of understanding the name of "childishness." The effect is, that where imbecility exists at all, and in proportion to its degree, it becomes necessary, especially in a case exposed to other adverse presumptions, to ascertain its extent with some accuracy; to see how far the individual was liable to be controlled by influence—to submit to ascendancy—to acquiesce from inertness and confidence in those acts, upon the validity of which the Court has to decide.

The character of the deceased, and of his mind, is spoken to by a vast number of witnesses, though it is perhaps more accurately and satisfactorily to be collected from the documents, and from his conduct, and in no inconsiderable degree from obvious acts which he omitted to do; and I shall have occasion to examine whether there was not latterly one character of imbecility more particularly exposing him to imposition, namely, inertness and indolence of mind, or, as Mr. Locke has expressed it, "want of activity and motion in the intellectual faculties."

There are several witnesses examined to the character and capacity of the deceased, going back many years, to a time when he resided at the Black Lion, Water Lane; at the Cecil Coffee House; at the Russell Coffee House, and at other places: they give a strange and not a very precise account of him; some think him foolish; others out of his mind—qualities, however, not wholly irreconcileable: they describe him as filthy in his bed-room, disgusting at his meals, entertaining a dislike to women, insulting people in the streets, hal-[405]-looed after by the boys, abusing people for coughing, singing out "Yehep, Yehep." Some of these peculiarities may possibly be highly coloured and exaggerated: but even these witnesses do not make out a case of absolute incapacity, nor shew that he was wholly intestable, though they tend to lower him considerably beneath the standard of perfect understanding; and as the question does not turn upon the total absence but upon the degree of capacity, the evidence of these witnesses need not be stated at length, for they contribute but little to fix that point, and the facts themselves to which they depose are remote. The more material part to be examined is the state of the deceased at and about the time of his brother's death, and from thence to the execution of the codicil.

At the time of his brother's death the deceased, as I have said, was lodging at Mead's, the engraver's. Now to this part of his history a witness has been examined, whose evidence has been much observed upon by both sides—Miss Barbara Ingram, a legatee under this will in the sum of £4000—she is produced in opposition to the papers, and is in point of law deposing directly against her own interest; she declares upon oath that she has received no promise, and has no expectation of indemnity, if the will should be set aside. It is suggested that she may expect to be rewarded by Miss Ingram, the party who will have ample means of so doing: that is possible, but it is mere conjecture, and she denies it: she is very distantly related, being a second cousin once removed, and there are seve-[406]-ral other relations in the same degree; and it is also rather hinted that other persons, Mr. Severne and his family, are the most probable objects of Miss Ingram's testamentary favour. The fact however is, that she is deposing directly against her interest; for she will gain nothing by an intestacy, and will lose her legacy of £4000. She may have some bias on her mind, arising from friendship and regard for Miss Ingram, and still more from what she may conceive to be the justice of the case, which would induce the Court to look at her evidence with caution: but still she appears to have deposed according to her sincere impression of the truth, and she has had considerable opportunities of forming a judgment of the character of the deceased, and particularly about the most important period. On the second article she thus deposes :—

"Deponent (Barbara Ingram) first saw the deceased at Kensington about thirty-five years before his death; he called occasionally at deponent's aunts, Mary and Ann Ingram, with whom deponent resided from her childhood. The deceased came perhaps once a week for a week or two together, then absented himself for months, perhaps a twelvemonth together, without ever accounting for his absence." [This conduct is odd and eccentric.] "Deponent left London in 1792: she saw the deceased again in 1802, when he called at Kensington upon his sister. Deponent left London in 1806, and did not see him again till the death of his brother, when she called at Mead's." [The more material [407] period follows.] "From that time she called about once in a month or six weeks for the satisfaction of his sister—not at her request—she so called at his lodgings at Carolan's, and staid ten minutes or a quarter of an hour. She continued so to do till about the time deceased went to live at Wyatt's. The deponent considers deceased to have been decidedly imbecile in mind as long as she knew him—wholly incapable of the management of any business of importance. His conversation marked extreme imbecility." [It is clear from the context that the deponent means weakness, not absolute idiotcy.] "He rarely conversed upon any subjects than what articles of food were palatable or unpalatable; about the east wind being injurious to health—he had a particular aversion to the east wind, so that deponent rarely saw him that he did not so speak of it. When deponent called upon him at Carolan's, after he had asked about his sister, the state of her health, and her eyes, he seldom spoke of any thing but the game he had from Wyatt's, and such like trivial subjects. His manners were eccentric and offensive, perhaps more disagreeable than eccentric—spitting on the carpet and rubbing it over with his foot. He was extremely reserved; shy beyond any thing; but she does not consider that as at all accounting for any apparent weakness of intellect, for he was exceedingly frivolous; and said the same sort of things over and over again—not in the course of the same visit, but on each succeeding visit it was a repeti-[408]-tion of the same trifling remarks on the same frivolous subjects as the preceding. He did not talk irrationally: it was not derangement but feebleness of understanding that he manifested, and that he did uniformly. The deceased also appeared to be of a remarkably indolent, sluggish disposition—extremely averse to taking the least trouble in any way about any thing. He spoke, for instance, of his aversion to writing: he always desired deponent to give his kind regards to his sister, but excused himself from writing to her, because he said he disliked it. His dress was slovenly, and his whole appearance and manner were those of a person extremely supine and averse to the slightest exertion. He was personally civil to deponent: he came down to her, and attended her to the house door; but his manner was that of extreme indolence, both natural and habitual. He latterly complained very much of his eyesight—he was always extremely short-sighted. He was very deaf latterly, so that to make herself heard she was obliged to raise her voice considerably. He might be equal to ordering what he liked best for dinner, and to the payment of little current expences, but she believes him to have been unequal to the management of any thing, incapable thereof from his extreme feebleness of intellect." That is, however, only matter of opinion.

To the 7th article she says, "She once saw young Wyatt at the deceased's lodgings in Great Queen Street; and afterwards heard him mention Wyatt as having sent him some [409] game, but in terms of displeasure for leaving him to pay the carriage of it: this he did on more than one occasion. All she ever heard the deceased say of any property that had come to him by his brother's death was, that it had come too late for him to enjoy it; that if it had come some years sooner he might have had some enjoyment from it."

If this description be tolerably correct, it shews considerable weakness of mind, and exhibits a character much exposed to fraud and imposition. It will be seen how far this portrait of the deceased is confirmed as to its likeness. Some of these traits are spoken to by the witnesses on both sides—his eccentric manner, his dirty habits, his shyness and reserve, his penuriousness. Mead, though the deceased had lodged there two years, would not suffer him to dine with his family, but sent him cold meat up to his room; even Carolan, his great friend upon whom he has heaped acts of bounty, pursued the same course; at first (according to Orlton) the deceased was allowed to dine in the parlour, but he was so disagreeable that he was sent up stairs; after a time he was tried again and was re-admitted into the parlour, but he was again banished to his own two pair of stairs room, and this witness is in some degree corroborated by the fact of the deceased having applied to return to Mead's, and being refused. His penuriousness, almost to a morbid extent, is acknowledged by some of Wyatt's own witnesses, who yet speak very strongly to their opinion of his capacity; for instance, Fountain, the owner of the Marquis of Granby public-[410]-house, and who supplied the deceased with wine, gives this account:—

"The deceased was in deponent's judgment a well-informed man, and could be amusing in the way of anecdote." [This is proof of memory.] "He was a very shy man; there were few people to whom he would talk. He quoted Shakspeare, and could repeat a great portion of several of the plays; he had evidently a good memory. He did at all times conduct himself as a sensible rational person: the only thing remarkable was the difficulty of getting money from him; he was unwilling to pay money at any time: he would allow an account to run up to three or four pounds, and then it was with difficulty that one or two was got from him. The account was delivered to him once every week, and deponent has known him, after looking at it, say he was charged for more than he had; but that was because he was unwilling to part with money: he appeared to be very penurious, but in no respect incapable of the management of himself and his affairs." That is, his own little income.

To the 9th interrogatory he answers, "The deceased was rather singular in his appearance; a little old spare man; very near-sighted and shy; very reserved generally. He was dirty in his appearance and habits; unpleasantly so undoubtedly, but he knew what good company was, and could behave as correctly as any man." To the 12th—"He was unwilling to pay. When respondent represented to him that it was [411] not customary to give credit for such small articles, it was still difficult to get the money from him, and then only a part at a time. There was part of his account unpaid when deceased left Carolan's house."

Here then, though for the last three years he was in the receipt of an annual income of £2000, he will not settle a little tavern account of a few shillings, but leaves London without paying it. Thus he was either very penurious, or else he did not comprehend that he had the use and command of this property acquired by his brother's intestacy. The witness thinks, because he was scrupulous in these petty matters, and able in this feeble manner to manage his own little income, that he was of course adequate to the transaction of business of consequence, and competent to regulate and understand more weighty affairs; the important consideration will be how far he was able to, and did really, comprehend his new concerns so as not to be liable to imposition.

Of his general capacity, an account very similar to Fountain's is given of him after he leaves London in 1822, and goes to Clopton House: he there resides with Mr.

Henry Wyatt and his family, is occasionally driven out in his gig, dines at his table, in company with Wyatt's professional and sporting friends, before whom he would naturally be on his good behaviour, and, after his shyness and reserve were worn off, would occasionally join a little in conversation, would talk of places he had been at, quote little hacknied passages from Shakspeare, and other authors, which in the course of a long life [412] he had picked up and recollected; and from these and the like circumstances, witnesses might draw an inference and form an opinion that he was a person of perfect mind. This evidence, given by six or seven gentlemen of station, might in some cases be of importance; and if the question were whether the deceased was sane or insane, whether there was such a degree of infirmity of mind as should shake the credit of witnesses deposing to full instructions and testamentary intention, it would be evidence of great weight as collateral support of such witnesses, and in opposition to testimony of total incapacity: but in a case like the present, turning on the degree of capacity from which, without evidence of instructions, and under circumstances of suspicion, full comprehension of the act and testamentary intention are to be inferred, the general statement and opinion of these persons, who speak to the deceased's condition at Clopton, bear with less force on the true point of the case. An old man of seventy-two, very short-sighted, rather deaf, enjoying the comforts of Mr. Wyatt's table (to which it appears by other parts of the evidence he was by no means insensible)—excited by the society and civilities of Mr. Wyatt's friends—might say and do all which these witnesses attribute to the testator, and yet might possess an extremely slender, feeble, inert mind, acquiescent in and impressed by any thing which Henry Wyatt proposed or suggested, and might have no sufficient comprehension of the nature and effect of a testamentary instrument which he might subscribe. Those witnesses [413] indeed who speak to recognitions must be distinctly considered; but the exact degree of capacity attributable to the deceased, and whether it comes up to the exigencies of this cause, must rather be decided on other parts of the evidence than on the testimony of the witnesses at Clopton House.

First, here are several letters written by the deceased's brother Edward, which certainly shew that the deceased was not considered as an idiot, incapable of expressing an assent to or dissent from the sale of the Chetwode estate—nay, when his mind was brought to the consideration, he could make a rational observation respecting it, such as that it was adviseable to sell as prices were high, or, as he expresses it, "to make hay while the sun shines," and the like; but the correspondence ends without any final answer being obtained from him: he could never be fixed to any decision. This then proves no more than that he was held not disqualified to do a legal act binding his property, or, as is admitted, that he had a testable capacity.

The next set of exhibits is the rental and observations on the Clopton estate, made in 1800 by Edward Clopton and sent to his sister Barbara; and, in 1818, on the death of the elder brother, forwarded by the sister to the deceased and endorsed by her "for the information of my brother John Ingram." These, again, only shew that Miss Barbara Ingram did at that time consider that the deceased was not incapable of understanding such documents if he applied his mind to the subject; or at all events that it was her duty to place these papers [414] in his hands; but she had not seen him for many years.

I come, thirdly, to the deceased's own letters, and they are of great importance: they establish testamentary capacity to a certain extent beyond all doubt; nay, that he was aware, in some degree, of his rights, and capable of comprehending some matters respecting his property, or at least respecting parts of it. His letter written immediately upon hearing of his brother's death to Mr. Grantham, the tenant of the Chetwode estate, is exhibited, and it is in these terms:—

"Sir,—My Brother having departed this life, the whole rent of the estate of Course comes to me, so you may pay it in to the Banker in Fleet Street, with a draft for me to receive it, or to Mrs. B. Ingram at Thenford, My Brother Dying without leaveing a will, it is not yet known what other property he has left You will I hope let me have it soon, as you are much behind hand in your payments, and I am at present out of Cash, do not forget to prevent my writeing again.—Your most humble servant,

"London, May 29th. "J INGRAM.

This letter carries at first sight more weight with it than it is entitled to, when coupled with the other letters. It relates only to the Chetwode estate, which he had long held jointly with his brother; and it shews he was [415] aware that the other moiety of that estate devolved of course on him by his brother's death. But it is to be remembered that he had been in correspondence respecting the sale of that property, and that it was an object with which his mind, however dull and sluggish, had long been familiarized. In this very letter there are symptoms of very limited faculties—"The rent is to be sent as usual either to his banker in Fleet Street or Mrs. Barbara Ingram at Thenford"—not to him or his own bankers, Martin and Company—that change of place does not occur to his mind—no such "thought or reflection" originates with him; he is "anxious for this cash," but does not seem aware that the Clopton estate had descended to him, which was nearly of ten times the value of the other: Chetwode therefore was now become comparatively a trifling object, yet it alone is mentioned by the deceased. Grantham comes to town and calls upon him at Mead's, and says he made rational enquiries and held rational conversation about this Chetwode property—to that extent his attention is excited—he comprehends and understands, and is alive to what relates to this little estate. So Mrs. Barbara Ingram deposes, "all she ever heard him say about his brother's property was that it had come too late for him to enjoy it"—not entering however into any particulars which shew his apprehension of the extent of the addition: he might still only allude to Chetwode.

The next exhibit is the bond on taking administration to his brother. The fact of taking administration and executing this bond under [416] the circumstances go but a little way to demonstrate the extent of his capacity. Here were Severne, acting for the sister, and Wyatt, the old agent of the estates, with the deceased; he was old, rather deaf, nearly blind, not in the habit of business; the active part would naturally devolve on Wyatt and Severne, the merely formal part on the deceased: it proves that he was not an idiot, who could not be exhibited, and go through the forms of executing such an instrument and of transferring the property under an administration, in the presence and under the direction of friends; but the mere circumstance of having gone through the forms of such business when accompanied by Wyatt and Severne affords but very slender proof of his activity and apprehension in managing and transacting business. To give greater effect to this occurrence, no evidence on the part of the executor has been offered of any sort—no person has been produced to shew that he took a prominent part in the business, or gave directions or assistance respecting it; he does not say any thing to Mead that he was going to transact, or had been transacting, any such business. He makes no reference to it, nor has any conversation, as from himself, with his bankers. At his bankers, however, the arrangement already noticed was made, viz. that Wyatt should receive the rents of the estate and remit them to the bankers, who, when their balance exceeded £500, were to purchase stock. This arrangement (as has been argued) carries with it inferences of the deceased's weakness of mind and inaptitude for business, and that it [417] was necessary to act for him by a sort of guardianship: he was living in London, he might therefore from time to time have given his own directions; if he chose the remittances to be made to the bankers, he might have desired to be advised of such remittances by his agent; he might have enquired at his bankers of the state of his balance—he might have had a banker's book; he would naturally have done all this or something of the kind if he were in the management of his own concerns; but there is not a tittle of evidence in explanation; nothing to prove that the arrangement originated with the deceased, or was discussed or approved by him with intelligence and understanding. After this arrangement is made there is no letter to shew that Mr. Wyatt ever advised him of any remittance, or acted as if he considered the deceased had the least knowledge or comprehension of these matters. All that Wyatt does (so far as appears) is, in June, 1820—at the end of two years—to pass a sort of account with the deceased, in which the remittances are lumped—£550 in one year—£1690 in the other. The account is signed by the deceased, no voucher is referred to, nor, as far as appears, produced; nor is there even a date to any one item of receipt or expenditure. There is no banker's book, nor is there any thing to shew that the deceased ever makes a single enquiry whether the money was remitted or whether the surplus was laid out. The only time the banker's book is made up is in 1821, just when the will was signed; it is then copied out uno contextu from the banker's ledger, the [418] stock receipts and four drafts are stuffed into the pocket. It was found in his box at Carolan's after his death; but that there was any prior account from his bankers, or any subsequent account, though he remained a year longer in London, there is not the slightest trace during the whole period from 1818 to 1822. The fact itself—the conduct of the parties—the conduct of the deceased—bespeak so strongly his inertness, his indolence, his inactivity, his acquiescence, that it does not require the evidence of Mr. Severne to confirm that view of it: it does not however prove want of testable capacity, if properly put in motion and called forth. If, in this arrangement, it could be shewn that it originated with the deceased, that he had proposed it as saving him trouble, that he had even upon discussion and consideration and the assignment of proper reasons agreed, or even, if afterwards, he had been active in executing this arrangement and in carrying it into operation, the unfavourable impression produced by it might have been taken off—it might possibly have told in favour of capacity—but the only evidence produced is quite the other way. Mr. Severne deposes that the deceased was a mere cipher throughout the whole business. Mr. Severne is undoubtedly a strong partizan; he has the management of the cause, he is therefore a biassed and prejudiced witness, to be heard with caution, particularly in matters of opinion and inference; but looking at his whole evidence, I see no reason to disbelieve him on matters of fact. But upon this part of the case the facts speak for them-[419]-selves and demonstrate that the deceased was not so active and alive to concerns of importance as to be in no degree in danger of circumvention and influence. He is by this arrangement treated as a child—as a person whose affairs were necessarily to be conducted for him; and his own subsequent inactivity respecting it confirms the character of inertness and indolence described by Mrs. Barbara Ingram.

The next occurrence in order of time is the change of name. Upon that occasion Mr. Gregory (the partner of Mr. Adlington) had some slight intercourse with him. I say slight, because he deposes that he understood the business had been arranged with Mr. Wyatt; the expences were paid by Mr. Wyatt and are charged in his accounts; the deceased, therefore, had only to go through the formal parts under the guidance of Mr. Gregory, who once also attended him to the accountant general's office to identify him, in order that he might receive a sum of money. On these two occasions he appeared to understand the business and conducted himself as a rational person. These transactions are so slight that they are of no great effect in fixing the extent of the deceased's mental powers, nor in ascertaining whether he was so far alive to his interests as to be in no danger of imposition.

To return, however, to the deceased's own letters, which certainly constitute the strongest part of the case in support of the general capacity. Letter "I" is dated the 20th of [420] December, 1818, and is addressed to Mr. Wyatt:—

"Sir,—This is to inform you, there has been a Letter sent to me at my former Lodgins, which I have long ago left, as you might not know this, I did suppose it was from you or my Bucks Tennant, which I should be glad to know, it was of course taken back to the Post Office, not finding me, my Address at present is at No 94 Charlotte Street rathbone place, where you direct in future and let Mr. Grantam know soon as you see him. Illness prevented my coming down as intended, but I mean it soon to spend the remainder of my days as I am quite tired of the Town, dont forget about raising the rent of the Bucks estate, as it ought to have been done long before this time, I shall expect to hear soon from you, and what Money you have paid in on my account—I am your Humble Servant, "J. INGRAM."

Here, again, the Buckinghamshire estate, Chetwode, is the burden of the song; not a word about Clopton, nor about the remittances to his bankers; for "paid in on my account" might have referred to the Chetwode rent, which was to be paid in Fleet Street or to his sister. It might certainly have some relation to the arrangement, but so little active and alive was he to his own concerns and business that he had not even sent his address, though he had changed his lodgings from Mead's to Carolan's six months before.

[421] Letter "K," annexed to Wyatt's general interrogatories, is pretty much of the same character: it is dated January 6th, 1819; and addressed to Mr. Wyatt:—

"Dear Sir,—I have received your long Letter; but you make no mention whether Grantham has paid his rent, which has been due, long before this time, when I was last at Martins with you I signed some paper, what it was I know not, perhaps that be a power of Attorney for him to receive my new Dividend, I have not been there since, I mean to call soon, as also upon your Agent as you wish me you will settle matters with the Bucks Tennant, that may be the means of making the estate more valuable is what I wish, or else sell it, if a good purchaser is to be found, I suppose you come to Town in the Winter if you do shall be glad to see you, Mr. Severn has called twice, I have no more to say at present. "J. CLOPTON."

Here is the same harping on the Buckinghamshire tenant. Here is evidence that he had not been at his bankers for six months, and that he did not know what he had signed—"I signed some paper, what it was I know not"—this is strong proof of great inertness and weakness of mind, not amounting to absolute idiotcy, but rendering him liable to be much imposed on: it looks as if he would sign any thing which a person in whom he had confidence would place before him. The other let-[422]-ters go on very much in the same form: the next is dated on the 13th of January:—

"Dear Sir,—I have received the Game you sent up, but prefer any thing in the poultry way such as Capons or Ducks which I will be obliged to you to send soon as possible a Brace of Each, should they not be to be had send any thing you can catch, Pidgeons or wild rabbits, but nothing stalled fed, by which you will much oblige your very Humble Servant, "J. CLOPTON."

"L" is a letter addressed to Henry Wyatt:—

"My Dear Sir,—I have been favord with your obliging Letter, and inform you I shall continue in Town till your Father comes to settle the business with regard to the stamp office and when that is done I mean to pay a visit to Stratford—I am not quite so well in health as I could wish, but perhaps the country air may mend me, I do not know what Cash has been paid into the Bankers, but I find the Bucks Tennant, much behind Hand, he must be looked after being a Farmer who thinks of no bodys wants but their own, I shall be very glad to leave London, having been so long confined in it, and the noise and bustle does not at all agree with me, I like the Town of Stratford much as the roads about it are good, I can divide my time between it and Warwick, perhaps take a peep of Leamington spa which I hear [423] is increasing very fast in Building but it being a public place I should not continue long there I have no more to add at present, but remain your most obedient Humble Servant.

"London June 1st—19. "J. CLOPTON."

There is nothing in this letter sounding to folly, nor, on the other hand, which is most material, any thing to shew a capacity for managing or comprehending his situation and property, nor to prove that he had turned his attention to them. All, in that respect, relates to the Buckinghamshire tenant alone. It is a trifling letter, such as a schoolboy would write. He talks of leaving London and of going into the country: it indicates that degree of intellect which renders him neither idiot nor lunatic, but it does not manifest that knowledge of the world and of business which would guard him against circumvention.

"M" is addressed to Mr. Wyatt:—

"Dear Sir,—Your stay in Town was so very short, I had not time to make mention of all I wished to say, you know very well I have had none of Grantham's rent since you paid me last, and is now a year, I want to know, if he has paid in any since that time, and whenever he does in future you will be so good as to let me know, you paid me one half years rent at my old lodgings, last summer, none have I had to this time, when I call at the Bankers I in-[424]-quire if any of the Bucks rent is paid separate from any other stock, so you will let me know when any is paid in, and I shall know when I call, here has been nothing but foul weather since you left Town, I mean to be down soon as possible pray remember me to all your Family, I am yours,

"London June 29th—19. "J. CLOPTON."

This again is still confined to the Buckinghamshire tenant—his mind cannot get beyond that. If he had inquired at the bankers he would have learnt that £700 or £800 had been remitted to them, in addition to the dividends received on the stock, and he might have got any money he wanted.

"N" is in these terms:—

"Dear Sir,—I am sorry I have not been able to come down to Stratford, according to my promise, owing to ill health, I did not think it safe to Travell alone, but I made every preparation for coming down, to stay allways as I should not like to have my Bones laid in London when I depart this Life, the Bucks rent you must remit to me or pay it in to the Banker, as by this time there will be another half year Due, I have received the game you sent last, which were very good, I only wait for a Companion, going the same way, and I have met with one, who goes by the Birmingham six Clock Coach and stops at the White Lion [425] about Eight to Breakfast, this is the conveyance, I mean to come by, sooner or later, I shall add nothing more at present, only to say, I am at this time at the same No 94 Charlotte Street Fitzroy Square.—Your most Obedient Servant, "J. CLOPTON.

"London Oct. 29th—19."

"N 1" is also to Mr. Wyatt:—

"Dear Sir,—I have received both your letters, and you are here informed I give my consent to your filling up the place of the old Tennant, I am sorry to hear of your son's illness, but this winter has been so severe as to affect all ages, the Game he sent, I had safe, but wondered to find the conveyance not paid, as always has been before, so that in future, it must come carriage paid, I have not yet been after the Chancery Money, but will stay till you come to Town, I shall add no more at present, as writing is very troublesome to me, so remain your H St "J CLOPTON

"London Feby 23d.
"20."

This letter confirms Mrs. Barbara Ingram's evidence, that he was angry game was sent to him without the carriage being paid, and shews that he was not aware that if paid at Stratford it would form an item in his agent's account.

[426] "O" is addressed to Henry Wyatt:—

"Dear Sir,—I have received the papers with your letter inclosed, and will take care, what you mention shall be done, I should have seen you before now, had it not been for the badness of the weather for the very Day I had fixed for my departure, which was Monday week, turned out a complete wet one, and it has not been settled weather since, I mean to come yet, for I think September the pleasantest Month in year for Travel, if you remember, I told you when you was last in Town, I would not have you send up any Game, till it is wrote for, as I have no convenience of cooking it, if I come down I shall spend all this year with you, but you shall hear further from me, should I wish you to come and fetch me, but do not send any Game at present remember me to all your Familly, I remain Sr Your most H Servant

"London August 30h—20. "JOHN CLOPTON"

This letter raises the standard of his intellects no higher.

Letter "P" is written to Mr. Wyatt:—

"Dear Sir,—Perhaps you will think it strange, you have not received your papers yet, but I must beg leave to inform you I cannot chuse to put my signature to them, as I pay enough to Government, as it is, if I employ Gamekeepers, my outgoings will be so much the more, and I [427] do not receive any benefit by it, if I lived at the estate, it then would be proper, as to what others have done before me, is no rule for me to go by, I have seen Mr. Severn, who came up to Town in a great hurry owing to the death of a relation I meant to have been down before now, but I have been very unwell, and the weather has been very cold and changen, it may happen that I may come yet, should I not, I will send you the packet, but I do not mean to put my name to them, my Compliments to all your Familly—I am Sr your very Obedient Hbe St "J CLOPTON

Exhibit "Q" is addressed to Henry Wyatt:—

"Dear Sir,—It is now a long time since I last heard from you, wherein you made mention, as to the incroachments made on my estate, which you might be assured I should give a negative to, as I consider it no better than a robbery, but as you have the management of the Estate, I did suppose you would settle it to my advantage, I thought you would have been in Town, before now, as I wished to see you, I will come down soon as I can, but I have been very poorly of lately, we have had a deal of cold weather in Town, but I hope it will soon change for the better, I shall add no more at present, only to remind you about paying in the rent, to the Banking House —I am Sr Your very HSt "JOHN CLOPTON

"London June 26—21"

[428] "Q" 1 is the last of this collection of letters, and is addressed to Henry Wyatt:—

"Dear Sir,—I return you thanks for your obliging letter, but tell your wife, never to send me a Goose in future, as it is what I dislike, any other will do, but that she could not tell, my pallet, I had none of it, I gave it to Mr. C" [Mr. Carolan I suppose] "and his wife who like it, You give an account of your journey, I did not suppose you would like that Country long, there has been nothing but wet Weather in Town since I saw you last, you mentioned about coming up in Octr or November, which if you do, there will be no occasion to come on purpose for me, unless you chuse it, give my Compliments to your wife, and say I shall be glad to accept of any thing but Goose, I think you would like South Wales, but north is to much of mountain, tho the mutton is much finer.—I am Sr your very H St "J CLOPTON

"London Octr 4—21"

This shews frivolity of mind, that he was fond of eating and considered it of great importance. It begins with the goose and ends with the goose.

These exhibits though they negative idiotcy, or total incapacity, though they prove he was testable, provided it were shewn that in doing the act he really wished to dispose of his property, and clearly apprehended and understood what he was doing; yet they do not establish [429] that complete understanding and perfect capacity, that a mere bare act of execution shall infer full knowledge of the nature and contents, under such circumstances that the Court must require to be satisfied that no imposition was practised.

Two matters which would have been of the highest importance to the executor I have in vain looked for in these letters. First, some active attention to this great property which the deceased had acquired by his brother's death, or even some knowledge of its nature and extent and of his rights regarding it, but scarcely a reference to it is to be found: secondly, some trace of an intention to give this property to Henry Wyatt—or even of affection and particular regard and partiality for him, so as to render the existence of such a purpose in the deceased's mind probable; but there is nothing going to either point.

On the other hand, when I consider what obvious and natural acts are omitted to be done—there is no one matter of business, wherein he was engaged, that he takes such a part as indicates his ability to manage his concerns. I have already noticed the arrangement at the bankers, in which he appears a perfect cypher—a mere instrument; and have remarked on his subsequent inactivity in respect to that arrangement: further, he takes no share in the management or conduct of the Clopton estate; even after he goes down to Clopton he pays no attention to it, he takes no view of it, he makes no enquiries about it, he never asks whether the farms are advantageously let? [430] whether there are good tenants? who have paid their rents, or who are in arrear?

As little did he look after and manage his personal property while resident in London; he never informed himself whether the remittances were regularly made by his agent, whether the dividends were duly received, whether the surplus was properly laid out? he draws for his £36 half yearly just as before his brother's death—but as far as his acts and conduct go there is no one circumstance to establish that he was aware he had the right and power of using that great addition to his fortune; the remaining portion of Chetwode is the only part of which (so far as appears) he had any notion: he goes on as before in his lodgings at 8 shillings per week, haggling and disputing about paying for his weekly supplies at the tavern; discharging that account bit by bit; and going out of Town in 1822 leaving part of Fountain's bill—a pound or two—unpaid. From some frivolous obstacle or other he is four years making up his mind to go down to Stratford; the vis inertiæ was strong, but at last with great difficulty he induces himself to leave London.

The result of the evidence upon this head of capacity is, that he was a very weak man; that judging both from what he did, and from what he omitted to do, his understanding was much below par, and the legal standard of perfect capacity: that inertness, inactivity, indolence, torpidity of mind, inattention to his large property, were the leading characteristics and symptoms of his weakness; that he was [431] therefore (to take it no higher) a person so far liable to be imposed upon as to require the Court to look with vigilance and jealousy into the proofs of the factum; that he might possess a testable capacity; and that very strong and clear evidence of the factum and of free and active testamentary intention might establish the executor's case.

Is there such evidence?

First, is there any thing to lead up to the intention of making this disposition of his property? On the one side it is said that it is a probable disposition; while on the other it is as strongly maintained that it is an improbable disposition. In cases where there is any doubt of capacity or any suspicion of fraud, evidence of affection and testamentary declarations are generally adduced to prepare the mind of the Court, and to conduct as it were to the testamentary act. It was argued that the sister was far advanced in life and was already amply provided for, that he thought himself ill used by his relations, and that it was not extraordinary he should take a liking to this young man and give him his fortune. And certainly in that statement there is nothing improbable if there were any proof of it: but, on the other hand, his sister was not his only relation; his cousin, Mrs. Mary Ingram, was living when these instructions were made; she did not die till the 14th of December, 1824; she outlived the deceased (Henry Wyatt's letter on the death of the deceased is addressed to her), and under her will Mrs. Barbara Ingram acquired a considerable addition to her fortune and was one of her [432] executors. The present will therefore not only cuts off his sister, but excludes his cousins and his whole family, and adopts a stranger in blood against the ordinary presumptions of law which favours those allied by kindred. In respect to complaints against his relations: it is true that he and his brother do not seem to have been upon terms of much cordiality or kindness; they were joint residuary legatees of their father, but the deceased had dissipated all his share over which he had any power, and might be angry with his brother for not affording him the means of indulging in his extravagance and eccentricities; but from his sister he did receive assistance even beyond her limited funds; through her he was furnished with supplies from his brother, who concealed from the deceased that the relief came from him; and as far as the deceased was capable of affection he did, to the last of his residence in London, make kind enquiries after his sister and send his kind regards to her: there is no trace of disaffection towards her before the will was made: he might, it is true, from some fancy or caprice take a liking to Henry Wyatt and adopt him as a son; but where is the proof of it previous to and in aid of these acts? If, in conversation with his bankers or with Mr. Gregory or with Mr. Fountain or with any other person, he had made frequent declarations to this effect, they might be important; but there is not a hint of the sort: there is no expression of affection for Henry Wyatt, no declaration of any kind, by word or by letter, even as to making a will disposing of his property at all, much less in favour of [433] Wyatt. On the other hand, here is not a mere declaration, but a formal act in his own hand-writing and attested, quite negativing any such intention up to a date long subsequent to his brother's death. I refer to that which has been denominated "the will of interment." It is rather a strange act, strangely expressed, but not unsuitable to the character, weak intellects, and feelings of the deceased:—

"The last Will and Testament, of John Clopton Esquire is when he departs this Life, he may be a Conveyed in a Hearse to the Town of Stratford upon Avon, in the County of Warwick, there to be interred, in the Family Vault of the Cloptons he being the last of that Family, if he absent from his Estate, as to his property it goes of Course to the nearest kin. Witness my Hand "JOHN CLOPTON.

"January 1st, 1820.

"Witnessed by H. Carolan 94, Charlotte St. Fitzroy Sq

"E. F. Bennett, 4 Edward St. Portman Sq."

This certainly proves that he knew what a will was; so far it is favourable to the executor's case. Its contents, as to the place of his funeral, quite agree with passages in several of his letters—it was an object that excited and roused him to some exertion—but as to any intention at that time of adopting young Wyatt, it directly negatives it—it declares his property is to go to his nearest of kin. This was his intention in January, 1820: his wishes in this [434] respect continued to May, for in that month he delivered this instrument to Barbara Ingram, with a strong expression of adherence to it.

On the 11th and 12th articles she says, "Upon the 10th of May, 1820, she called upon the deceased at Carolan's: he told her he had been wishing to see her; for he had been thinking that if he were to die in Charlotte Street they would bury him like a dog in Pancras parish; so he said he had made a will of interment of which he wished her to take charge! The deceased then delivered into her hands the paper writing, now shewn to her, open and unsealed. Deponent told him 'that if he had any papers of importance, she conceived that his sister as being his nearest relation was the proper person to have charge of them.' The deceased replied, 'Oh, that is only a will of interment; you will see by it that my property goes to my nearest of kin;' deponent took charge of the said writing: the deceased then gave her a strict injunction that she should see he was buried at Clopton, which she promised: and that was all that passed on that occasion."

This brings down the intentions of the deceased to the 10th of May; negativing any intention of making Henry Wyatt executor and residuary legatee.

In the next month, June, 1820, Wyatt senior came to London, and the accounts for the two preceding years were passed and signed by the deceased, and by him in the manner already noticed: there is no proof of any other communication at that time, nor is it very clear that [435] Henry Wyatt was then in town, though he possibly may have been; but he admits that between that time and the following July, a few days before the will was made, he did not see the deceased; nor is there any thing in the letters which passed, marking particular affection or intended adoption. There is consequently nothing antecedent to the will in the way of affectionate intercourse and testamentary declarations shewing a previous intention and leading up to the will itself, but the "will of interment" is quite in opposition to the papers propounded.

An intermediate act, however, of some consequence occurs demonstrating the exposed condition of the deceased and his liability to imposition, and which is not wholly unconnected with the disposition under the present will, viz. Carolan's paper. It is dated on the 4th December, 1820, and is in these words:—

"Mr. Hugh Carolan.

"Sir,—Fearful lest the several conversations I had with you lately should be misunderstood I think it advisable to take this method of stating to you plainly my intentions on the subject.

"I John Ingram Clopton of No. 94 Charlotte Street Rathbone Place in the parish of St. Pancras and County of Middlesex Esquire do hereby charge my personal estate with the yearly payment of two (a)[1] hundred pounds to [436] Hugh Carolan of the same place Apothecary his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, provided the said Hugh Carolan shall be living at the time of my decease, being in consideration for his professional and other services rendered to me for many years. And I do hereby direct my heirs, executors or administrators, previous to any other appropriation of my personal estate and effects, to make provision therefrom for the payment of the said annual sum of Two hundred pounds Bank Stock by regular quarterly payments; the first payment to be made within three months next after my decease.(a)[2]

"December the 4*th* 1820 "John Clopton"

Here then he subscribes, fills up and interlines a paper professing to grant a perpetual annuity to Mr. Hugh Carolan in case he survives the testator. What is the consideration? No professional or other services are established. The deceased had lodged at his house two years and a half, in a back room, up two pair of stairs, at a weekly rent of eight shillings; he was at first allowed to dine in the parlour, was turned away, was admitted again, and again turned away, and attempted to go back to Mead's lodgings. Who prepared it? In whose hand-writing is it? No account is given, nor does the deceased ever in any manner recognize or refer to such an act. It has been said that "this paper does not concern Henry Wyatt;" but [437] Carolan comes with the deceased to dine at the Black Lion; Carolan is a legatee under this will for £1000. Carolan takes the deceased down to Stratford; surely, if it had not been a gross imposition on the deceased, Carolan would have enabled Henry Wyatt to explain it; not being explained, it affords a strong argument of the liability of the deceased to be imposed upon; it shews that he would acquiesce in, and lend his hand to fill up and to sign, an instrument so highly improvident as this grant of an annuity of £200 to Carolan. As to the interlineation of bank stock, no plausible explanation can be given to account for its weakness and absurdity, and yet, six months afterwards, this Carolan is made a legatee in the will to the amount of £1000. A considerable suspicion is thus excited that the legacy was not the act of the deceased, but was introduced into the will to secure the silence or procure the co-operation of Carolan. In both views, as shewing the deceased liable to imposition, and as creating a suspicion in respect to this legacy, it adds force to the demand for clear proof of the factum.

I come now to the will itself. On the 25th of July Richard Wyatt, and on the 29th Henry Wyatt, arrive in town. On the 31st another year's account is passed and signed; and a copy of the bankers' book is made up to that day, which, with stock receipts and cheques in the pocket, was found in his box at Carolan's: but there is not a tittle of proof that this bankers' book was prepared or procured by desire of the deceased. A day or two afterwards the preparation of the will is commenced, and [438] on the 4th of August it is executed. In the mean time the deceased, who was penurious and fond of eating, sometimes accompanied by Carolan, regularly dines at the Black Lion with the Wyatts, except that, on one day, Henry Wyatt carries the old man up to Hampstead, and there they spend the day together. This conduct will bear two constructions; it might be in order to soothe and amuse this insulated, desolate old man, and it might arise from kindness, or from gratitude, if Wyatt knew his testamentary intentions; or, on the other hand, it might be for the purpose of coaxing and nursing and influencing him, and inducing a blind confidence preparatory to the formal execution of this will on the following day—it is open to that suspicion and adds to the burden of proof to be required. At all events, as far as that may throw light on the inquiry into the exercise or effect of undue influence, the deceased was in the possession of the Wyatts, his agents; and the transaction was as much behind the backs of any relations who might guard and protect him against imposition as when he was afterwards living in the little room at Clopton House with Mr. and Mrs. Wyatt.

Now then commences the most important branch of the case—the origin of the act itself—the proof of which act (from the view already taken of the history) requires to be clear and direct. There are indeed some subsequent grounds of suspicion which reflect back, upon this part of the transaction, additional reasons for examining the evidence with vigilance and for requiring strict proof.

The Court, under the circumstances already [439] referred to, cannot accept opinions and inferences and conjectures. It must have direct testimony from witnesses above exception, speaking from undoubted recollection of facts, and it must have the facts themselves stated, so as to enable it to judge for itself whether those facts shew volition and full understanding and knowledge of the act done.

In such a case the first requisite would be instructions coming from the testator himself: it is true that, if they cannot be proved, the defect may by possibility be remedied by something passing at the execution tantamount to instructions, or by subsequent recognitions so clear and direct as to supply the place of instructions. In this case there are before the Court the written instructions from which the will was prepared; they are in the handwriting of Richard Wyatt the father, a quarter as unfavorable, perhaps more so, as feeling a stronger interest, than even Henry Wyatt himself. It has been said that "Richard Wyatt was incapacitated by the state of his faculties from giving evidence; that he could not be examined; that he might have proved receiving these instructions from the deceased himself." That is mere conjecture, which cannot compensate for proof; if the evidence is by accident defective, the misfortune, especially in such a case as the present, must fall on the party upon whom the burden of proof lies. It has been said the deceased was very shy—he might prefer giving these instructions to Richard Wyatt; but that again is only conjecture; and ought Richard Wyatt to have accepted them? or would he, if acting fairly? Ought he not to have represented the [440] indelicacy of his receiving them? Would he not have forewarned the deceased of the difficulty which such a course might throw upon the proof, and the possibility that it might be the means of defeating his kind intentions? besides, the deceased had already some acquaintance with Adlington and Gregory to reconcile him to seeing one of them. If the deceased had not sense and understanding enough to agree, upon such representations and forewarnings, to give his instructions himself to the solicitor who was to be employed, he had less understanding remaining, and was under greater weakness of mind, than there is reason to attribute to him.

But there are appearances to induce a strong suspicion that the deceased never saw, nay, was never consulted either upon the instructions or upon the draft, and never was consulted respecting the will itself till carried to the solicitor's office to execute it. First, the instructions are not signed, a precaution which an old experienced attorney like Mr. Richard Wyatt would naturally have taken under such circumstances of delicacy, if the deceased had been consulted: but, secondly, that which leads more strongly to a suspicion that the deceased was never even consulted with on the instructions or on the draft is that Carolan's Christian name is left in blank in the instructions, in the draft, in the engrossed copy, and is not filled up till the execution! Who is Mr. Hugh Carolan? The deceased had been lodging in his house for two years and a half, paying him for his lodgings repeatedly; it was a weekly lodging; he must have known his Christian name; nay, here is this paper leaving him the annuity [441] of £200, in which it occurs three times, and which even begins with the address, "Mr. Hugh Carolan, Sir." The blank then for the Christian name remaining till the very execution, renders it highly suspicious and probable that neither the instructions nor draft had ever been communicated to the deceased, and that he had not even been consulted upon them—at all events there is no proof that his opinion was ever taken upon them.

The act then originates (at least nothing appears to the contrary) with Richard Wyatt; it commences with his carrying instructions, written by himself, to his town agent, Mr. Adlington. The employing Mr. Adlington would not carry with it any suspicion, provided the deceased had gone or been taken there to give instructions himself. Adlington and Gregory had been before employed to procure the change of name and to receive money from the accountant general. The deceased had no solicitor of his own; he does not appear ever to have employed one. If the will had been the deceased's own act the house of Adlington and Gregory might therefore have naturally and properly been resorted to; and if the deceased had come or been brought to their office—if, being left alone with Mr. Adlington, he had himself given the instructions clearly and rationally—still more, if Mr. Adlington had probed his mind and satisfied himself (and in thus satisfying himself he would probably also have satisfied the Court) that the deceased was acting under no improper influence, but on his own unbiassed intentions and wishes, the case would [442] have been free from difficulty. Mr. Adlington, as far as the Court knows and must presume, is a respectable solicitor of unimpeached character, and sufficiently disinterested to be entitled to full credit, but the case presenting itself in the manner it did, it is possible that Mr. Adlington's professional caution may have been lulled and his vigilance surprised by his confidence in Mr. Wyatt, to whom he stood much in the relation of attorney to client. That Mr. Adlington was privy to any fraud or circumvention, or even suspected any, the Court has not the least reason to suppose. His evidence clears him of such an imputation, for he has no perfect recollection of any part of the transaction—he seems to have considered himself as a mere instrument to carry into formal execution an act which he was performing under the direction and at the responsibility of Wyatt, trusting to him that every thing was right; he never appears to have imagined that he was conducting business requiring the exercise of his watchful care as the testator's solicitor; consequently no portion of the transaction has left an accurate impression on his mind, otherwise some of his errors would be unaccountable lapses of memory. If the deceased had been a person of full capacity and Wyatt quite a disinterested party, Mr. Adlington's conduct would have been sufficiently correct: but surely had he been aware of all the circumstances to which the Court has adverted—the supine character of the deceased, the small extent of his capacity, the imposition to which he was liable and which Carolan had already practised on him, [443] the amount of the property he was giving to a total stranger in blood, and that person standing in the suspicious relation of his attorney and agent—he would without doubt—giving him credit for character and the professional caution belonging to such character—he would, I say, without doubt have pursued a different course: he would have said to Richard Wyatt, "All this, I have no doubt, is perfectly right; but recollect! you yourself stand in a delicate situation as attorney and agent of the deceased; the will is in favor of your son, and Mr. Clopton's family is absent; for your own sake, for your own character, and in order to insure the kind intentions of this gentleman against suspicion and against defeat, bring your principal to me. Let him give me the instructions with his own mouth, not from your written paper." If his caution had not been blinded by confidence in Wyatt, Mr. Adlington would surely have thus acted. His evidence appears to be given with perfect fairness and truth, naturally, however, with some degree of bias in favor of the validity of the will; and also under a great failure of memory.

At first, and in chief, he supposes that the deceased was, or at least is doubtful whether he was not, with Richard Wyatt when the instructions were brought to him; but on cross-examination, having in the mean time conferred with his partner, Mr. Gregory (which was not quite correct), he is satisfied that Richard Wyatt came alone. This is an error quite unaccountable, except on the reasons already stated: he has no recollection of any discussion or conver-[444]-sation that passed, or even of the exact time when the instructions were given: strange again, considering the nature of the instructions! he has made no entry, because he meant to make no charge, as he supposed Richard Wyatt would make none; so that he considered himself as acting completely as Richard Wyatt's agent and for his benefit; he supposes that the instructions were delivered on the third of August: that can hardly be accurate, for the subsequent note about the legacy to the poor is dated "Friday morning," and Friday was the third; he delivered the instructions to his clerk from which to prepare the draft; he corrected the draft; then a fair copy was made, which he says he sent either to Richard Wyatt at the Black Lion in Water Lane, or to the deceased at Carolan's: another strange failure of recollection! he could, however, only doubt while he was under the belief that the deceased attended: surely not after he discovered that Richard Wyatt only was present; but there is no probability nor trace that he sent it to the deceased, with whom at that time he had had no intercourse respecting the will. The first time, then, Mr. Adlington saw the deceased on this subject was the day of the execution, the 4th of August, and he thus deposes:—

"On the day of the execution of the will Richard Wyatt came with the deceased to the deponent's office: they brought with them the fair copy, and it being approved by the deceased, and no alteration having been previously made or then suggested by the deceased, it was executed in the deponent's [445] presence. Of what passed in conversation deponent has no recollection, and he has no memorandum of anything that then occurred; but it has always been his invariable practice to be careful and particular in every thing relating to and attending the execution of a will in his office, or to which he is a subscribing witness:" I have no doubt he took care there were three witnesses present; that the deceased executed it in their presence; that they attested it in the presence of each other, and so on. "He has a further recollection as to this particular will that his attention was more especially directed to it from the nature of its bequests. Whether deponent read the will to the deceased, or deceased told deponent that he had read it or not, deponent does not remember; but deponent undoubtedly satisfied himself that deceased knew its contents and approved them: deponent has no recollection of Richard Wyatt having left the room: to what passed in conversation he cannot depose, but he remembers that they had conversation together before clerks were called in: deponent can and does depose with perfect confidence that he was fully satisfied the deceased knew and approved of the will; that it was his own act, and the clerks being called in the execution would, and deponent has no doubt did, take place according to the usual form. Deponent well remembers that the deceased desired him to keep the will, and that he did so. The deceased might be with him on that occasion previous to the execution of the will for per-[446]-haps a quarter of an hour: the execution itself could have occupied but a short time. Either then, after the execution of the will or at a subsequent interview, when deponent saw him alone, and had a good deal of conversation with him; the deceased asked him 'if he might not make a codicil,' and deponent replied, 'Certainly, whenever he pleased.' Deponent does not remember on which occasion this occurred, or whether it might not have occurred on both: the circumstance deponent remembers well, and he would rather have thought that it was on the subsequent occasion, but that Mr. Henry Wyatt, on the deponent lately mentioning it to him, said that it was at the time of the execution of the will; from which circumstance it would appear, as indeed Henry Wyatt also stated, that he, Henry Wyatt, was present at that time; but of his being so present deponent had not the least and has not now any distinct recollection. From the name 'Hugh' and the word 'twelve' in deponent's handwriting supplying two blanks in the first side of it, deponent has no doubt he went over the will with the deceased and filled up those blanks from his directions. Certainly at such a time, and the deceased himself being present, deponent would not have taken any information or direction whatever from any other person: moreover, Richard Wyatt was very deaf, so much so as to make it troublesome to communicate with him; and it is probable that he would hear but little of what passed between deceased and deponent."

[447] Now the whole of this is mere inference and conjecture—there is no recollection of facts, upon which facts the Court can form its judgment; "he must have made the deceased acquainted with the contents because it was his usual practice:" but this was an unusual sort of business, for the regularity of which Mr. Adlington seems to have pinned his faith entirely on Richard Wyatt. There were two slight blanks then filled up—one for the Christian name of Carolan—the other for the number of months at which the legacies were to be paid—"he must have applied to the deceased—he would not have applied to any one else—besides Richard Wyatt was deaf:" but the deceased also was rather deaf and shy and almost blind; and Henry Wyatt was present, who was neither deaf, shy, nor blind; why should he not for such a purpose have applied to him? it is quite as probable, when the blanks were not material parts of the disposition. But what reliance can be placed either on the recollection or the reasons of Mr. Adlington? At first he supposes Richard Wyatt alone was present; he then admits that Richard and Henry were both present—but what if he is mistaken in both? Now Henry Wyatt in his answers expressly states that his father was not present at all at the execution, and therefore his deafness was not a reason for applying to the testator. "To the sixteenth article respondent answering saith he admits that he but not his father was present when the said will was executed:" so that Mr. Adlington has forgotten the whole business—he is no bet-[448]-ter than a dead witness, whose character and handwriting are proved. Mr. Adlington's character stands unimpeached and he means to speak the truth—but the result of his evidence, in connection with Wyatt's answers, is that on August the 4th young Wyatt, the executor, to whom the great bulk of the property is left, after having taken the deceased to dine tête à tête at Hampstead the day before (for he will not say it was not on the 3rd that they went to Hampstead), carried the deceased to his (Wyatt's) agents, who had never seen the deceased on the subject of the will, which was ready drawn up for execution from instructions brought by Richard Wyatt; and Mr. Adlington cannot recollect any conversation, nor how far he probed the deceased's mind, nor what passed to shew that the will was prepared by his authority, or desire, or approbation, so as to enable the Court to form its own judgment—but he is of opinion that he must have ascertained the fact! The forms of execution according to the statute he may have attended to; but is that to overcome all the legal jealousy and all the difficulties of such a case?—of this will, not only giving Carolan £1000, but also revoking the "will of interment," without substituting any directions about his funeral; though to guard against being buried in London was an object of all others or rather was the only object resting on the mind of the deceased? These are considerable difficulties and suspicions, and, in my judgment, they are not removed by this evidence; and the clerks merely deposing to a formal execution, carry the proof of the factum [449] no further. But there is a codicil purporting to confirm this will.

The deceased remains in London nearly a year afterwards, though talking about going into the country, but being prevented by some frivolous cause or other. There is during this interval no intercourse personally with this executor, nor are there any letters recognizing, even by inference, that Henry Wyatt was his adopted heir. The only letter is that of October, 1821, disapproving of the present of a goose and desiring that no more goose may be sent. At length, in June, 1822, after endeavouring for four years to make up his mind to go to Stratford, he proceeds there, accompanied by Carolan, who pretends to be going to Liverpool; but who, after depositing the deceased at the Red Horse Inn at Stratford on the 24th June, early the next morning returns to London: so that whether Carolan did or did not persuade the deceased to go; yet it is necessary to practise a deception upon him, even according to Henry Wyatt's own account; and this deception awakens a suspicion that he is carried to Stratford by contrivance and preconcert, in order to place him the more completely and securely in the possession of Henry Wyatt—the latter had long before prepared the mistress of the inn, Mrs. Gardner, to expect "an eccentric old gentleman, and she must take care to keep the house quiet, for he did not like noise:" he did not come at the appointed time; however at last he arrives unexpectedly. The next day Henry Wyatt calls and Mrs. Gardner announces him to the deceased—What [450] says the deceased or how does he act? as one come to see an adopted son?

Mrs. Gardner thus deposes: "That the deceased, on deponent's telling him Mr. Henry Wyatt was come, desired to see him, and told her to bring a quart of ale: the deponent, thinking it more respectful to Mr. Wyatt, asked the deceased if she should not bring a jug and glasses—the deceased said, 'No, he is only my tenant, a quart will do.'"

This is the deceased's treatment of his adopted son, and of one who was the heir of his property!

The next morning the deceased is fetched away in a gig and is carried to Clopton House, and there he remains till his death. He had not left London with that view; he had retained his lodgings and left his boxes and their contents at Carolan's; and these lodgings he keeps till his death. He frequently talks of going back to London, and once has his clothes actually packed up; but at Henry Wyatt's he remains. He is treated with great kindness and attention; his taste in eating and drinking is consulted, he has the best bed-room at first, but that not being so convenient for some reason, either on account of the difficulty of getting him up stairs at night, or on account of his chilly temperature, Henry Wyatt's dressing room on the ground floor is fitted up as his bed-room. That room he inhabits, and uses it for all purposes—the same filthy purposes as formerly—so as occasionally to be offensive; there Henry Wyatt goes of a night to take his glass of brandy and water, and a servant sleeps in [451] an adjoining apartment, in order to attend to his wants in the night, and he occasionally heard him singing out according to his old habit, "Yehep, Yehep." All this may be quite equivocal: and to endeavour to make his benefactor as comfortable as possible in his declining years, and to give him the benefit of the cheering society of his friends and visitors, would appear, if the will was satisfactorily proved and nothing further done, to arise on the part of Henry Wyatt from a very proper sense of the debt of gratitude; but, on the other hand, this conduct and treatment might be for the purpose of more securely retaining him in his possession and under his influence, and from a fear that, if he should make his escape and return to London, some fortunate or fraudulent person might undo all that had been already done and get a new will from him; for the deceased apparently still retained a testable capacity. Indeed it might not be quite certain that some act had not been already obtained subsequent to the will. An attorney would well know that if there was any risk of that sort, a republication of the will by a codicil would be a great security, besides being a means of conveying an additional benefit to himself: and this is a further reason why the law looks with more jealousy and suspicion at the acts of an attorney in his own favour than those of other persons—because, possessing greater opportunities and better information for carrying his purposes to a successful issue, he is more likely to originate and to suggest them. What is the fact? Within three weeks after the deceased arrived at Clopton—ere yet [452] these kindnesses could have added much to his affection for Henry Wyatt, and before it was possible that any offence could be taken at his sister for not having been over to visit him (for she lived twenty-five miles off, was upwards of 80 years of age, and non constat that she was aware of his removal from London to Clopton), the making of a codicil is put in motion and has made great progress: for he reached Clopton House on the 26th of June, and the codicil was delivered to be copied on the 19th of July. Not one syllable from the deceased, in the way of declaration to any human being, that he wished to alter his will and confer a greater benefit on Henry Wyatt, appears in the evidence—he had been introduced to Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Lloyd had called at Clopton; Mr. Pritchard was attending at Clopton, though not on the deceased; others may have been introduced; but there is not a trace of the least expression by the deceased himself of a wish to alter his will or to do any testamentary act—not the slightest proof of any instructions from the deceased; but this attorney and agent having this old man in his house, himself draws up this codicil and gets it copied, ready for execution, by a law stationer. Now what are the words of the paper? Here is a reference to the will cautiously by its date thereby republishing that will, and excluding any subsequent will made in the intermediate time: here is a revocation of the sister's legacy simply, and then here is a ratification and confirmation of the will and an attestation by three witnesses. It is in these terms:—

[453] "Whereas I John Clopton of the parish of Saint Pancras in the County of Middlesex Esquire did by my last will and testament in writing duly executed bearing date in or about the month of August one thousand eight hundred and twenty one Give and Bequeath unto my sister Barbara Ingram the Sum of Two Thousand Pounds Now I do by this Codicil which I desire may be annexed to and taken as part of my said will Revoke and make null and void the said Legacy or Bequest of Two thousand Pounds so as aforesaid given to my said sister, and I do in all other respects ratify and confirm my said Will and every Article and Thing therein contained In testimony whereof I the said John Clopton have to this Codicil set my Hand and Seal this fifth day of August in the year of our Lord one thousand Eight hundred and Twenty-two. "JOHN CLOPTON (L.S.).

"Signed sealed published and declared by the said Testator John Clopton as and for a Codicil to be annexed to his last Will and Testament, and to be taken as part thereof in the presence of us—

"John Gam[l]. Lloyd.

"James Pritchard.

"Rebecca Twiggen."

[454] On considering this instrument three observations present themselves—

First. It was perhaps thought safer to revoke the legacy of £2000 to the sister, than either the legacy to Carolan, or that to the cousin, Miss Barbara Ingram.

Secondly. This republication of the will in the presence of three witnesses would completely set it up again, even if any intermediate instrument had been procured either by Carolan or by any other person.

Thirdly. So cautiously worded is this codicil that in reading it over in order to execution, no person—not even Mr. Lloyd, a barrister—would find out or be led to suspect that any imposition had been practised, because it does not appear to convey any benefit to the confidential attorney, Mr. Henry Wyatt; though that gentleman very well knew that, besides republishing the will, it would, by revoking the legacy, convey a benefit of £2000 to him as residuary legatee.

Exposed, however, as this codicil is to these suspicions, they might still by possibility have been removed by something passing at the execution, or even by subsequent recognitions. The deceased might have given such explanations of his will and such reasons for making this codicil, and all this might be proved by witnesses so far above all suspicion as completely to silence all objections: but what is the evidence? The executor first appoints the law-stationer, on two different days, to attest the execution, but that act is postponed: he then [455] thinks it better to apply to a respectable neighbour and acquaintance—a barrister at law, Mr. Lloyd—who had once seen the deceased with Henry Wyatt in his gig, and had called for about ten minutes at Clopton House and been asked by Henry Wyatt if he had any objection to attest the deceased's will. Henry Wyatt also applied on the same day to Mr. Pritchard, an apothecary (but who had never then attended the deceased professionally), to meet Mr. Lloyd on the following day—Rebecca Twiggen, Henry Wyatt's own nurse-maid, was merely called in at the moment to make a third witness, and thus the codicil was rendered a valid confirmation of the will of lands. Mr. Lloyd arrived first, and they waited for Mr. Pritchard about a quarter of an hour: Lloyd thus deposes:—

"That in the course of that time he believes nothing passed between him and the deceased beyond the usual salutation at meeting, and nothing passed, as he recollects, between Henry Wyatt and the deceased. Deponent remembers that, conceiving it to be a will that was about to be executed, he asked Henry Wyatt who was to be the third witness? to which he then replied 'that it was a codicil, and that it related only to personal property.' The deponent thereupon said 'that two would do very well.' Mr. Wyatt then observed, 'But there is a small freehold estate bequeathed in the will, and so we may as well have another witness; we can call in the nurse.' Deponent remembers that Henry Wyatt produced two or three sheets of paper (as it appeared to the [456] deponent) and proceeded to read, and read aloud, what purported to be a codicil to a will of the deceased of a date recited in the said codicil. What the said Henry Wyatt read was in substance simply to revoke a legacy which had been given by the said will to the sister of the said deceased. Whether Mr. Pritchard and the nurse, or either of them, were present at this reading or not he cannot depose: Henry Wyatt then said to the deponent, 'Will you ask Mr. Clopton if that is what he wishes it:' deponent did so, and the deceased in an angry tone replied, 'Yes, yes:' Deponent looked to Henry Wyatt, who then said to the deceased, 'I requested Mr. Lloyd to ask that,' or to that effect. It appeared to deponent as if the deceased thought that deponent was interfering with the disposal of his property. He appeared to be satisfied with the explanation of Mr. Wyatt; and signed his name, Mr. Wyatt having placed the paper before him. The deceased was short-sighted, and deponent thinks he recollects that as he was poking about rather over the paper to see where to write his name the said Henry Wyatt pointed his finger to the place, and the deceased then freely signed his name."

In a further part of his deposition he says "he believes the deceased to have been of sound mind, memory and understanding, and capable of making and executing a will or codicil. The deponent had had at the time of the execution of the codicil but little opportunity of judging of the deceased's state of mind: he saw nothing then and had seen [457] nothing previously to raise a doubt as to the sanity and capability of the deceased; but considered him to be a reserved man of somewhat peculiar habits—certainly not the sort of man whom one would expect to meet as a member of an ancient family, and possessed of large property."

Here then is an execution in the presence of Henry Wyatt, a reading over by Henry Wyatt—an answer "Yes, yes," angrily by the deceased, but which anger is quieted on Henry Wyatt's explanation, and then follows the formal execution. The other witnesses carry the history no further—indeed not so far—they were not even present at the reading, though there is no doubt from Lloyd's evidence that that ceremony did take place; Lloyd, who gives honourable and fair evidence, is of opinion that the deceased was capable; but there was no probing of his capacity, still less was there any thing to prove volition and intention either then or afterwards to Lloyd, who was wholly uninformed that any benefit was conveyed to Henry Wyatt by this instrument. This appears from his answer to the forty-second interrogatory:—

"Respondent called at Clopton House, and there saw the deceased alone in or about the month of January, 1823. The deceased said upon that occasion that he should like to go to London. Respondent told him that if he were the deceased he, respondent, would go to London during the cold weather, and enjoy the company of his friends, and return to the country in the spring. The deceased had told [458] respondent that he found Clopton House very cold, and he expressed a strong inclination to go to London. Respondent said, what he has deposed, to the deceased, partly in consequence of his having understood from Henry Wyatt some time after the execution of the codicil that it was beneficial to the producent; and respondent therefore encouraged the deceased's idea of leaving Clopton House for a time, that he might have some intercourse with his family or friends. The deceased certainly replied that he should like very much to go to London. Respondent believes that such was the wish of the deceased at that time; and respondent has declared, and it is the fact, that he thought either Mr. Clopton had communicated that conversation to Mr. or Mrs. Wyatt, or that it had been overheard; for the next time he met them he observed a marked difference in their behaviour to him, the respondent, which he could attribute to nothing else."

This evidence does create a pretty strong suspicion that these subsequent attentions were for the purpose of keeping possession of the deceased; for possession and custody may exist without actual control and coercion.

It only remains to examine the recognitions that have been relied upon; and it is to be observed that, under the circumstances of the present case, mere remote references to something which by construction may be supposed to shew a kindness and intention to benefit Henry Wyatt will not be sufficient—there must be some direct reference to, and explanation of, [459] these testamentary acts, something going distinctly to their nature and contents in order for such circumstances to supply the want of instructions and the absence of explanations at the execution; less than that will not be sufficient to satisfy the demands of the law and to overcome the suspicions attaching upon these transactions.

Two witnesses, and two only, have been relied upon as speaking to any thing of the sort—Thomas Hunt and William Lewes. Now Hunt speaks only to one equivocal declaration, not directly alluding to any will—which declaration might have been insincere—or might mean future intention—or may have been misapprehended or misrepresented.

On the second article he says: "Deceased frequently told deponent that he had every thing at Clopton he could wish, and was never more comfortable in his life. I go where I like—I have what I like, he used to say, and they are very kind to me." . . . "He one evening said, Harry and his wife do every thing to make me comfortable: they are the best friends I ever had, and it won't be the worse for them: I have not forgotten them."

Now when this might easily be misapprehended or be a mere momentary ebullition of gratitude, and when it comes from an intimate friend of Henry Wyatt—from one who has made himself so far a partizan in the cause as to send for an adverse and important witness, Robins, and talk to him in the way he himself admits upon the additional interrogatories, this declaration goes but a little way, or rather goes [460] no way at all, to supply the want of instructions and overbalance the other defects and suspicions of the case.

The other witness is Mr. Lewes; he presents himself under circumstances exciting some degree of caution—he could not be examined under the commission because his place of residence could not be found—from embarrassed circumstances he could not be communicated with directly even by letter—a letter could only be sent through the intervention of a third person, a confidential friend—he has not been cross-examined, for he would not originally stay to be cross examined, and he has not been reproduced (vide supra, p. 94, et seq.). Mr. Henry Wyatt however appears to have been extremely anxious that his deposition should be received, thereby raising something of an inference that he expected him to speak to facts to which no other witness could depose; though several other friends and visitors have been examined to the same articles of the allegation, yet to them nothing of the kind was ever said, not even to Mr. Lloyd, though he had attested the codicil and held something of a confidential conversation with the deceased the following winter on his expressing a wish of going to London; but no recognition nor declaration was made to him or to any other person. Lewes does speak more strongly than others, and to some circumstances exclusively. He is a sportsman, coming from Carmarthen for a few months in winter to the neighbourhood of Stratford for the sake [461] of hunting—and, as such, visiting Henry Wyatt, who was fond of the same amusement; they were very intimate; Lewes went to Clopton House very frequently; he speaks strongly to general capacity—to Mr. and Mrs. Henry Wyatt's attention, but adds with cautious discrimination "that he never saw any thing, on their part, like fawning, or any attempt unduly to ingratiate themselves; and to his frequently visiting him in his little room." On the thirty-first article he thus deposes: "During the days deponent was at Clopton in the summer [of 1824], the deceased was living in the room below stairs; he did not then take his meals with the family, or indeed leave the room at all: deponent was alone with the deceased several times: sometimes Henry Wyatt was with them: deponent was with him both mornings and evenings.". . . "Henry Wyatt used to go to deceased in the evening, and deceased was pleased to have him there with him, and there they have chatted together, and very pleasantly too. Deponent has seen Henry Wyatt take a glass of spirits and water there with the deceased in the evening:" all this would be gratifying to the deceased without doubt; and the whole of it occurs in the little room which served the deceased for all purposes.

On the thirty-second article he says: "The deceased seemed perfectly satisfied with every thing, and expressed himself so. 'Where you go,' said he, 'do you ever find more comfort than there is here, good cooking, famous wine, and the like.'" These indulgences again, to which he was rather addicted, were all calculated to [462] make a pretty strong impression on a poor, weak, inert man who had not mind enough to resist fraud and influence, nor to have any will of his own.

Further on—"Deponent remembers one day the deceased asking him what he thought Wyatt's income was? deponent said he did not know: deceased said he did not think his father could give him much; but no matter, he said, he'll have enough one day." This must "have been during the former part of his acquaintance with him, as he believes" [this is not a very probable conversation to have originated with the deceased]; "but there was a former occasion, and it was the first on which deponent heard deceased speak upon the subject. Deponent had bought of Henry Wyatt a rather valuable chesnut mare: deponent told deceased of it. What (said he)! has Henry sold his favourite mare! deponent said, 'Yes, he has.' The deceased said no more then; but after dinner he renewed the subject, inquiring of Henry Wyatt if he had sold the mare. Wyatt said 'he had.' Deceased asked 'why?' Wyatt replied, 'I wanted the money, Sir.' Deceased said, 'It is a pity you sold her;' and turning to deponent said, 'If he wants money now, he won't want it when I am gone.'" [This is one of the recognitions.] "At another time he said, 'I have made Henry quite independent of his father and every body else;' and again he said, 'His father has not much to leave him, but I have taken care of him.' To the particular times he cannot depose: he frequently spoke to deponent to that effect." [The de-[463]-ceased, who is a very silent man, talks, according to this witness, frequently on this subject.] On the thirty-third—"The deceased told him his sister was older than himself; and on one occasion he said, 'She won't survive me, I am a good man yet.' He said once that his sister, as deponent understood him, had brought up two bastards of a farmer; one, he said, had married a Sir Somebody (deponent forgets the name); the other, he said, had married Mr. Severne; and, he said, they should not have his money; but using gross expressions—'damned nasty stinking bastards:' when in particular he said this, deponent cannot remember."

Upon the evidence of this witness there arise some important considerations: upon two points in particular—the recognitions. The first is the recognition made upon the sale of the chesnut mare. This is either true or it is not true; if not true, there is an end of the credit of the witness, and he alone deposes to it; the deposition is suspicious in its whole tone: if true, it is exposed to a suspicion that the matter was fraudulently held out in order to work upon the deceased—it was "rather a valuable chesnut mare," so that no great price was given—she was a favourite, but so distressed is Henry Wyatt that he is obliged to part with her, because "he wanted the money." Was that true, or is it liable to the suspicion of being a false pretence, in order to work upon the deceased? Now it appears by the accounts that, of the rents becoming due after Michaelmas 1820, only £250 had been remitted before the [464] deceased went down in June, 1822, and only £650 in the whole. Three half years had intervened—Lady-day 1821, Michaelmas 1821, Lady-day 1822. By the accounts exhibited, No. 5 and 6, the whole rents due at Michaelmas 1819 appear to have been remitted when the account was settled in June, 1820, and the whole rent due Michaelmas 1820 had been remitted when the account was settled in July, 1821—and yet in June, 1822, only £250, and in August only in the whole £650—so that of the rents due Michaelmas 1821 (supposing nothing to have been received on the half year, Lady-day 1822) there was a balance in Wyatt's hands of about £900—it could hardly therefore be true that he was obliged to sell the favourite chesnut mare "for want of money." This story lies consequently under a considerable suspicion of being either the invention of the witness, or the circumvention of the executor in order to work upon the deceased's weakness.

The other circumstance is still more suspicious, that "his money should not go to those damned nasty stinking bastards;" for the witness undertakes to give the very words—though he will not venture to fix time or place—whether up stairs, or below stair in the little room. Now no other witness deposes to any allusion respecting the Severnes as bastards. Yet the executor has pleaded it as a fact, has inserted it in his interrogatories, has introduced into his answers that the deceased alluded to the farmer's bastards, when he gave instructions for the codicil: it is put prominently forward in order to account for cutting off the sister. Now that [465] they are bastards is not the fact—neither Mr. nor Mrs. Severne are illegitimate—there is no evidence that either of them was ever reputed or even supposed to be bastard. Mrs. Barbara Ingram, the cousin, who is very intimate and nearly connected with them, never heard it suggested—on the twenty-first interrogatory respondent answers: "She does not know, has never heard, and has no reason to believe, that either Samuel Amy Severne or his wife is illegitimate or reputed so to be."

The real history of Mrs. Severne is stated in Mr. Severne's evidence upon the twentieth interrogatory: "Respondent did intermarry with the daughter of a gentleman farmer of Barton and Long Compton, an estate in the former of which was his own property. The father of the respondent's wife and her mother also died when she was young, and she had been under the care of the late Mrs. Ann Ingram and of the producent, who were then living together at little Wolford. Mrs. Ann Ingram was not a lady of considerable fortune; she had a moiety only of the little Wolford estate, and Mrs. Barbara Ingram, the producent, was at that time and until the death of her brother, Edward Clopton, a lady of small fortune. 'Neither the respondent nor his family have derived any property real or personal from Mrs. Ann Ingram or the producent, except that Ann Ingram left him a gold cup.' Mrs. Mary Ingram did die on the 14th of December, 1824. She by will bequeathed to him and his children specific legacies to the amount of about £2800; and in the October preceding [466] her death gave his eldest son an estate worth £700 per annum." Here then is the real fact proved: and as to this declaration, it either was or was not made—if not made, there is an end of the witness—if made, how came the deceased thus impressed that if he left any thing to his sister it would go to Severne and "the nasty stinking bastards?" There is no trace in the evidence of any anger or disaffection towards Mr. Severne before the deceased arrived at Clopton House; even afterwards no other witness hears of it than this Mr. Lewes; but Henry Wyatt makes it his case, and his witness deposes to it. Does not this circumstance create a new suspicion that this was an artifice resorted to in order to render the deceased more subservient to the wishes of Henry Wyatt; and in order that, if his torpid understanding and dull attention should catch the object of this codicil when the execution should be gone through, his mind might be impressed with a feeling which would induce him to acquiesce in its contents? His angry "Yes, yes," is not inconsistent with something of the kind.

But there are two other circumstances still further exciting suspicions of circumvention and imposition.

The first is—that of the rents received from Michaelmas 1820 to November, 1824, the time of his death—four years—only £650 is remitted to the bankers to be invested according to the arrangement; and Henry Wyatt sets up a donation of these rents by the deceased in his life-time, because, not having remitted them, he was bound in some manner to account for the [467] omission of following up the arrangement. In support of such a donation there is not a scrap of paper—no written authority to Henry Wyatt to retain it; no letter from the deceased to the bankers explaining why further remittances were not made; even Henry Wyatt omits to send, as on behalf of the deceased, any such explanation—at least there is no suggestion to that effect in the interrogatories. Any explanation attempted in the life-time of the testator would, perhaps, have been dangerous; it might have led immediately to some inquiry into the matter, and to an investigation of this pretended donation and of the state of the deceased by the sister, or by her friend, Mr. Severne, on her account. Silence was safest: so here is no declaration to any person; a gift by parol only is alleged, and to it Henry Wyatt alone is privy. The amount is £5000 or £6000—four years' rent—Wyatt rests upon the donation—he will not charge himself with those rents in his inventory. What! does an attorney and agent, with an old man seventy-two or seventy-three years of age, living in his house, in his possession, entirely separated from his own family, who has never done any one act of business respecting the management of his estates since he came into possession of them, accept the rents and profits of these estates—£1500 a year—and apply them to his own use under an asserted gift by parol, and yet expect that the law will not attach great suspicion to such a transaction, and to all other transactions between him and the deceased respecting his [468] property? The answer is too obvious, and the fact is not without its weight.

But the remaining and final circumstance is still more direct in its inference—the conduct of Henry Wyatt on the death of Mr. Clopton. The deceased died on Saturday, November the 20th, at 5 o'clock. On Sunday, the 21st, Henry Wyatt writes a letter to Mrs. Ingram of Thenford, the cousin of the deceased, desiring her to communicate to Miss Barbara Ingram, who resided with her, the death of her brother—the party deceased—Mr. John Clopton. By the evidence of the apothecary it appears that the deceased had been confined to his bed near a month, and had been in danger a week, if not a fortnight; yet no sort of communication was made to the relations—to the sister and cousin—who were residing within twenty-five miles of Clopton House, at Thenford, where also their friend Mr. Severne was, who might have gone over to see the deceased: but on the Sunday evening after the death Wyatt writes, announcing the death of Mr. Clopton after a week's illness, and stating that he was sensible to the last. This is not very correct conduct: it is suspicious, both as to the concealment and as to the falsehood in respect to the length of the illness; but on that very Sunday evening he sets off for London, is sworn to the will the next morning—Monday—gets probate under seal on the Tuesday morning, goes immediately to the bankers and obtains possession of the money there: but that is not all; he hastens, without a moment's loss of time, to the Bank of England, and attempts to have all the stock transferred [469] into his own name, but some difficulties occurring there, he does not succeed, and that object is frustrated. This may by possibility have been the mere haste and eagerness of the heir, or it may have been that aware that, at all events, the possession of the property would give him considerable advantage in any subsequent contest about his right to it, he endeavoured to secure every thing before the family could interpose: but this conduct has a still more unfavourable aspect, and carries with it a strong appearance of a consciousness of fraudulent circumvention, and that these testamentary instruments will not bear investigation. Snapping a probate (as it is called) is always considered to create a suspicion of fraud. In the case quoted it is stated by Dr. Calvert that Sir George Hay, in Ousley v. Wells (vide supra, p. 398), laid the foundation of fraud in the executor amusing the next of kin in order to prevent the taking of administration till he had obtained probate—"it shewed a mala fides:" here it is stronger; he writes on Sunday evening; he knew the state of the cross-posts, and before it was possible that the sister could enter a caveat, he gets his probate; but not his probate only; he has got all the ready cash, and he would have got a transfer of the funded property if it had stood in the name of Clopton instead of that of Ingram.

Under these several circumstances of suspicion—for I carry it no higher—the proof of the factum is insufficient. The capacity of the deceased, though not intestable, was so far weak [470] and inactive as to require a cautious examination of any testamentary act, and proof beyond a mere formal execution—direct proof that the deceased clearly understood and freely intended to make that disposition of his property which the will purported to direct. Added to the difficulty arising from this weakness, it is a will in favor of an agent and attorney, in which case the law is jealous of influence on one side and of blind confidence on the other: the instructions, instead of being given by the deceased, come from the parties benefited, and the will is prepared under Richard Wyatt's directions, the codicil by Henry Wyatt himself: the execution of both instruments passes in the presence of the executor—is a mere formal transaction without any thing to probe the capacity or to supply the want of instructions: the suggested recognitions are insufficient in themselves, and were made, if made, at a time when the deceased was in possession of the executor, under his influence, and exposed to any impressions that might be made upon his mind.

I am, upon the whole, of opinion that the executor's case is not sufficiently established against all the presumptions and suspicions that attach to it. The Court therefore pronounces that the executor has failed in the proof of the will and codicil; but, as actual fraud has not been established, I shall give no costs.

[471] IN THE GOODS OF HUGH ROSS. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 2nd Session, 1828.—The Court will not (on affidavits of capacity and final intention, and on consent) decree probate in common form of a paper writing in extremis, and confused, where the interest of minors and of an infant is affected.

On motion.

Hugh Ross, late of Bloomsbury Square, died on the 30th of October, 1827, leaving a sister, six nephews, and a niece (children of two deceased brothers) who would be entitled to his personal estate in case of an intestacy. Three of the nephews were minors, and the niece was an infant. On the day of his death the deceased, in the presence of three of his friends (one of whom was Mr. Roberts) and of his medical attendant, expressed a wish to make his will, and requested Mr. Roberts to prepare it from his dictation, which Roberts did, and then read the will over to him. The deceased approved it; and, in answer to a question "if he had any thing more to add," replied, "No, that is all." A pen was then placed in his hand, but he was prevented by bodily weakness from signing the paper, and shortly afterwards died. These four gentlemen had made an affidavit of the facts; and that they remained with Mr. Ross till his death: they also stated their full belief of his capacity, and that he perfectly understood the contents of his will.

The paper, after enumerating property to which the deceased considered himself entitled, and [472] giving various legacies; among others, £500 to each of his three eldest nephews—James, Alexander M'Kenzie, and Hugh, with his gold watch and appendages to Hugh, bequeathed "to Mrs. Hugh M'Intosh twenty guineas, and the remaining sum to his nephew Hugh Ross, on his attaining the age of twenty-two years." It then appointed an executor, with £30 for a ring, and gave to Mr. Roberts fifteen guineas for a ring and seals; and there were some other small legacies; but there was no residuary clause.

The personal property was about £2500.

The deceased's sister, and the three minors, and the infant, whose interests were alone affected by this paper, consented to probate in common form: the consent of the infant was by her mother and guardian.

The King's advocate moved for probate.

Per Curiam. When this paper was written the deceased was in extremis: the paper itself is confused: it would be dangerous, on a mere affidavit of capacity and final intention, to decree probate of it in common form, especially as it affects the interests of minors and an infant, whose consent is not sufficient.

Motion rejected.

[473] AKERS v. DUPUY. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 2nd Session, 1828.—Administration durante minoritate formerly granted to the mother, having ceased by the minor's death, and the mother having thereby become joint residuary legatee with another minor, administration de bonis non decreed to her; one executor having renounced and the other, who was abroad, being cited.

On motion.

Edmund Fleming Akers died on the 16th of February, 1821; and of his will and codicils appointed Richard Walter Forbes and Isaac Dupuy executors and residuary legatees in trust. The deceased left a widow and one child, an infant, who was to take two third parts of the residue of the testator's personal estate upon his attaining the age of twenty-one; the remaining third was left to a grandson when he should attain the same age. Forbes renounced probate and administration, and Dupuy, being abroad, was cited, after which administration was granted to Mrs. Akers, the widow (as the mother and guardian of the infant), for his use and benefit until he should arrive at twenty-one. The infant died in 1822: by his death the administration ceased, and the widow became entitled to a share of the lapsed residue; and, in order to supply a personal representative to the testator's estate, she had caused a second decree to be served on the agents of Mr. Dupuy (resident in the West Indies) and on the Royal Exchange.

Upon an affidavit to this effect Dodson, for the widow, applied for administration with the [474] will and codicils annexed of the unadministered effects of Edmund Fleming Akers.

Per Curiam. The widow is now a residuary legatee; the grandson is stated to be still a minor—about ten years of age; so that a third part of the residue is not yet vested. Let administration pass to the widow.

Motion granted.

IN THE GOODS OF LIEUTENANT-COLONEL READ. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 2nd Session, 1828.—The Court at Madras—the competent jurisdiction—having granted probate to the widow as universal legatee and constructive executrix of an informal paper, in which character no security is required: this Court, considering that under the circumstances the widow may be called on to prove the paper per testes, or that the grant may be appealed from, will only decree administration with the paper annexed to her, as relict and principal legatee, on giving security.

On motion.

The deceased was Deputy Quarter Master General of the forces in India. On the 17th of September, 1827, probate was granted at Madras to his widow as the sole legatee, and as constructive executrix of his will. The will contained these passages:—

"The little property I possess being in household goods, plate, carriages, horses, &c. I give, after all my just debts in Madras are paid, to my dearly beloved wife Lydia to apply and dispose of as she may think proper."

And concluded in these terms:—

"I refrain from separating into small parcels the little property that may arise from the sale of my effects, but wish my dear and affec-[475]-tionate wife may enjoy the whole, after, as I before said, my just debts in Madras are paid."

Lushington moved for probate as granted at Madras.

Per Curiam. The deceased died on the 21st of August, 1827, leaving a widow and two daughters by a former marriage. The will, of which probate is asked, is not executed, nor is the date, except of the year 1827, filled up; blanks being left both for the day and the month: there is also the word "witnesses," but of course it is not attested.

This Court however must presume that the Court of competent jurisdiction at Madras acted properly in granting probate of this paper as a valid instrument, and had evidence before it accounting for the want of execution and other imperfections: but I think it is very doubtful whether, according to the true construction, the widow is "sole legatee and constructive executrix:" for the deceased, when he wrote this will, was not, as it seems, apprized that he had any property in England to dispose of, whereas he had £330 in his agent's hands. It is possible that the wife may yet be called on at Madras to prove this will in solemn form of law, or that, from the decree already made there, an appeal to the King in Council may be prosecuted by the daughters of the former marriage. My difficulty therefore in granting probate to the widow as "constructive executrix" is, that she would in that character be exempted from [476] giving security; but I see no objection to allow administration with the paper annexed to pass to her as "relict and principal legatee," on her giving security. There is some difficulty in varying the form of the grant, but yet there is still greater difficulty the other way.

It is not fully decided whether this Court is bound, in all cases and under all circumstances, to follow the grant of probate made by a Court of competent jurisdiction. India stands in a very peculiar relation to this country, and instances are every day occurring when this Court is called upon to decree probates on exemplified copies of wills proved in that country, not always in the forms nor according to the rules which are recognized by our domestic tribunals. The more numerous however these instances are, the more important becomes the consideration whether some remedy should not be provided, and whether the object would not best be attained by a short act of Parliament. It may be said that there is an appeal to the King in Council from the decisions of these various Indian Courts: it may often however happen that but a very small part of the property is in India where yet the party may be domiciled, and then, according to the present practice, the probate in India would still regulate the grant here. In such cases therefore the party, in order to obtain that to which he is justly entitled, and which he would naturally obtain if this Court might follow its own rules, would be compelled to go to a large expence in appealing to the Privy Council from the irregular decision of a Court that has only original jurisdiction over a [477] small part of the effects, but which, by a sort of courtesy, eventually regulates the whole. It is an evil for which, I think, some legislative remedy should be provided, and which I recommend to the consideration of those gentlemen at the Bar whose attention may have been more immediately directed to such matters.

In the present case I decree administration with the will annexed to Mrs. Read as the relict and the principal legatee, the usual security being given.

IN THE GOODS OF WILLIAM HINCKLEY. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 2nd Session, 1828.—Administration with a will (in which was no executor nor residuary legatee) annexed decreed to two aunts of the deceased, legatees in the will, and daughters of the grandmother—the next of kin—she being ninety years of age, and incapable.

On motion.

Lushington moved.

Per Curiam. The deceased's will contains no executor nor residuary legatee; it has only bequeathed some small legacies. He died in February last, and has left a grandmother and two aunts—her daughters. The aunts, as legatees, now apply for administration with the will annexed; and they state, in an affidavit jointly with a medical man, that the grandmother is ninety years of age, and incapable of taking the administration. Upon this affidavit the Court grants the administration to the aunts, who are interested as legatees and as the next of kin of the grandmother.

Motion granted.

[478] IN THE GOODS OF THOMAS VANHAGEN. Prerogative Court, Easter Term 2nd Session, 1828.—A paper having an attestation clause in the plural number, but only one witness and the date of the year written on an erasure (on affidavit of the executor to a recognition and from the attesting witness to the time and intention of executing), probate of such paper, in common form, decreed, though one of four persons entitled in distribution refused to consent; but had entered no caveat.

On motion.

Thomas Vanhagen died on the 10th of January, 1828. His will, in his own handwriting, was dated on the 9th of October, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-three, and was attested and signed as follows:—

In the presence of us who have at his request signed our names as under. } THOMAS VANHAGEN. (L.S.) JOHN WEAKLEN.

The deceased left his property to his widow, who, with three sisters, was alone interested in case of an intestacy: two of the sisters had signed a proxy of consent, but the other refused. The widow and Mr. Hine—a solicitor and son-in-law to the deceased—were the executors; and Hine had made an affidavit as to a recognition of the will of the testator a short time previous to his death.

Lushington moved for probate to the executors, pointing out the informality that there was an attestation clause in the plural number, with only one subscribed witness.

[479] Per Curiam. From the appearance of the paper, and from the position in which the names of the deceased and of the witness are placed with relation to the attestation clause, it would seem that the deceased, at the time that these names were subscribed, had no intention of having more than one witness.(a) The chief difficulty is that the executors have not brought in an affidavit of the attesting witness; that the deceased intended what was done at the time the witness subscribed it to be an effectual execution of the paper as his will: for I observe that the word "three" is written on an erasure. On a satisfactory affidavit upon this point the Court will decree the probate, since no caveat has been [480] entered by the sister, who declines to give her consent; and a recognition of the will is sworn to by the executor.

On the 3rd Session, an affidavit from the attesting witness having been filed, fixing the date of the will and stating his belief that it was the intention of the deceased to execute it at the time it was subscribed, the Court decreed probate to the executors.

Motion granted.

PICKERING AND PICKERING v. PICKERING. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 3rd Session, 1828.—Administration de bonis non with a will annexed, in which was no executor, granted to one of two legatees, a decree with intimation having issued in their joint names against the residuary legatee; the sureties justifying in the amount of the surplus beyond the interest of the one legatee or (on a proxy of consent from the other) beyond their joint interests, and an affidavit of no outstanding debts being made.

[Applied, In the Goods of Elliott, 1879, 3 L. R. Ir. 147.]

On motion.

Charles Pickering died in 1814. He left a widow, a son, and two daughters, Sarah and Sophia Pickering. By his will he made his wife universal legatee for life,

(a) In the Goods of George Wingfield Sparrow. Easter Term, 3rd Session, 1828.—Probate in common form decreed of a paper with an attestation clause in the plural number and only one witness, on affidavit of an implied recognition.

On motion.

The deceased died in April, 1828. He left a will and codicil. The will was regularly executed; but the codicil, dated in February, 1824, which he had written at the foot of the will, with a clause of attestation—"in the presence of us"—was only attested by Mr. Denton, the deceased's solicitor. He was dead; but an affidavit was exhibited by Mr. Briggs, his executor (who was also a solicitor, and who had found the will and codicil among Denton's papers), stating that Mr. Sparrow had in February last, some time after the death of his solicitor, seen and inspected these testamentary papers, and had left them in his possession, saying "he would call again, and alter his will and codicil;" but he never came.

The Court upon this affidavit, on motion by Lushington, granted probate of the will and codicil.

Motion granted.

and upon her death he gave to each of his daughters £1000, and the residue to his son; but appointed no executor. On the 3d of May, 1814, the widow took administration, with the will annexed, in the sum of £3500; and upon her decease the son, being on military service in the East Indies, was cited with a decree to shew cause why administration de bonis non should not be granted to Sarah and Sophia Pickering, [481] jointly, as legatees. This decree with intimation was duly served.

Haggard now prayed the administration to be decreed to Sarah Pickering, singly, upon a statement that, since the issuing of the decree, the other sister had been, and still was, dangerously ill. He further moved, after mentioning that the testator's debts had been discharged, that the sureties might justify in the amount of the residue only, first deducting the amount of the legacies to the two sisters.

Per Curiam. The Court will allow this administration to pass in the form now asked; but it will first require either a proxy of consent from the sister, or else that security should be given to cover the £1000, the amount of her interest, as well as the surplus. An affidavit should also be exhibited that there are no creditors.

Motion granted.

[482] COOPER v. DERRIENNIC AND OTHERS. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 3rd Session, 1828.—A legatee, whose legacy had been paid him, having been examined without releasing, allowed to be reproduced on his and the executor's giving mutual releases, and on the latter depositing in the registry, to abide the issue of the cause, a sum sufficient to cover the legacy.

On motion.

John Courtoy died on the 8th of December, 1818. On the 7th of January, 1819, his will and codicil were proved. On the 3d of November, 1827, a decree issued, under seal of the Prerogative Court (at the instance of William Henry Cooper, executor of the surviving executor of Courtoy), citing, among others, Mary Derriennic (resident in France), the sole person entitled to the deceased's estate under an intestacy, to see the will propounded and proved in solemn form of law. Upon the return of the decree the will and codicil were propounded in a common condidit, and the three subscribing witnesses examined. On the first session of Easter Term an appearance was given for Mrs. Derriennic, and the cause was concluded: it was then discovered by the proctor for Mrs. Derriennic that William Giles, the deceased's attorney, drawer of, and a subscribing witness to, the will, under which he had a legacy of £300, had been examined without giving a release. The legacy with interest had been paid to him in April, 1824, under an order of the Court of Chancery; and he stated, in his affidavit, "That at his production and examination as a witness in this cause, the circumstance of his being a legatee in the will was omitted to be [483] mentioned or alluded to by him or by any other person; and that in consequence thereof no release or discharge in respect thereto was then given; but that neither at the time of his production or examination as a witness, as aforesaid, had he any interest whatever under the will or codicil propounded, or any claim upon any person whomsoever touching the said legacy."

An application was now made to the Court to rescind the conclusion of the cause in order that William Giles might, on giving a release, be reproduced as a witness, and again repeated to his deposition.

In support of the motion Lushington and Addams, who mentioned the case of Peachey and Merricks v. Woodyer, before Dr. Calvert, as decisive of the question.(a)

(a) Prerog., 18th June, 1788. The editor has been favoured with a notice of this case. It was a cause of proving in solemn form the will of Charles Moxon: and was promoted by Dame Elizabeth Peachey and Elizabeth Merricks, the cousins german and only next of kin of the deceased, against Richard Woodyer, the executor: and at the hearing an objection was taken by Dr. Wynne and Dr. Scott to the testimony of Ann Ives (a legatee under the will, who had received her legacy and given a release to the executor), on the ground that she might be compelled to refund her legacy; that the release came from the wrong party; that it should have been given by the executor in order to release the witness from all future possible demands.

Dr. Harris and Dr. Nicholl, on the other side, argued that the executor could never compel Ives to refund;* that the legacy had been paid for the purpose of Phillimore and Haggard contrà.

[484] Per Curiam. The Court granted the motion, remarking that interrogatories on the part of Mrs. Derriennic might be administered.(b)

The following order was made:—

The Court rescinded its order assigning the cause for sentence on the second assignation, and gave leave that William Giles be reproduced for the purpose of being re-sworn and re-repeated as a witness; a release under the hand and seals of the said W. Giles and W. H. Cooper, and also the sum of £400, to abide the issue of the cause, being first brought in.

Note.—This sum of £400 was deposited in order to obviate any possibility of claim by the residuary legatee under a prior will, in case the will propounded should be set aside.

[485] IN THE GOODS OF CHARLES BRODERIP. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 4th Session, 1828.—Probate, in common form, of two papers (one unfinished) granted on a proxy of consent and on affidavits accounting for their state, and shewing that the deceased intended them to operate.

On motion.

The deceased died on the 14th of April, 1828, a bachelor, leaving two brothers, William and Francis Broderip, his only next of kin, and the sole persons entitled to his personal estate in case of an intestacy.

The deceased had occupied apartments at the Salopian Hotel, Spring Gardens, for upwards of three years previous to his death; and on the 9th of April, while in bed, he requested Mr. Williams, his intimate acquaintance, to give him pen, ink, and paper for the purpose of making his will, by which he said "he should secure to Colonel Joseph D'Arcy the whole of his property by constituting him sole executor and residuary legatee." The deceased, having written his will to the extent of nearly two sides of a sheet of letter paper, was obliged from exhaustion to stop, observing, at the time, "that he should complete it when his strength was sufficiently restored:" he then sent for Mrs. Holland, the mistress of the hotel, and her daughter; and upon their coming to his bedside he requested them to bear witness that the paper, which he had just written in the presence of Mr. Williams, was his will; that he then deposited it in a purple portfolio, and that [486] he appointed Colonel D'Arcy sole executor and residuary legatee. Upon their quitting the room he requested Williams to commit to paper the purport of such his communications, and to insert some directions as to his funeral; when this was done the deceased further begged him to take it down stairs, to read it over to Mrs. Holland and her daughter, to obtain their signatures, and deposit it with Mrs. Holland, as instructions for her till the arrival of Colonel D'Arcy from Ireland. It appeared further, that on the 12th of April the deceased read over what he had written on the sheet of paper to Mrs. Holland and her daughter, repeated his intention in respect to Colonel D'Arcy, and expressed his conviction that the paper would take effect as his will. He made similar declarations to the waiter of the hotel.

Lushington, on an affidavit of the above facts, and on a proxy of consent from the deceased's brothers, moved for probate of the two papers, as together containing the making her a witness, and that she had performed her contract by being a witness: the executor had therefore received his consideration.

The Court (Dr. Calvert) admitted the evidence, and observed it was usual so to do, though the books rather incline the other way.*

(b) Prerog., 10 February, 1827. In Booth and Hannam v. Hurd, on its being alleged that Charles Read, an executor, had renounced previous to his examination as a witness; the Court on this day permitted a release to be brought in of his legacy of £100 as executor (bequeathed to him if he undertook the execution of the will), and on the same being brought in, that he might be reproduced as a witness, and again repeated to his deposition.

In Callow v. Mince (2 Vern. 472) a witness was examined before the hearing whilst she was interested, but after the hearing she released her interest, and was examined again before the master. Her depositions before the master were allowed to be read. See also Needham v. Smith, 2 Vern. 463.

will of the deceased, to be granted to Colonel D'Arcy. The property, he said, would scarcely cover the debts, funeral, and testamentary expences.

Per Curiam. The affidavit fully states a case that would entitle these papers to probate if the executor should be called upon to prove them in solemn form of law; and with the consent of the two brothers, the only persons interested under an intestacy, the Court has no difficulty in decreeing probate to Colonel D'Arcy.

Motion granted.

[487] IN THE GOODS OF JAMES HARDSTONE. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 4th Session, 1828.—On renunciation of a co-executor the Court will not grant administration with the will annexed, without justifying securities, to the daughter —the residuary legatee—during the lunacy of the mother—the other executor.

On motion.

The deceased of his will appointed David Jones and his wife, Mary Ann Hardstone, executors and residuary legatees in trust; and his daughter residuary legatee. He died in 1826. Mr. Jones had renounced; and it appeared that Mrs. Hardstone was a lunatic under confinement, and that there was no committee of her person or estate.

Lushington applied for letters of administration with the will annexed to be granted to the daughter (during the lunacy of the executrix) without the sureties in the bond justifying. He admitted the motion was rather out of the usual course; but that to grant it would be for the benefit of the lunatic: he further stated that in consequence of the daughter's minority, which only very recently ceased, no one had been willing to administer to the effects, and that she was unable to procure the necessary affidavit of justification. The property consisted of a policy of insurance for £1500, and a sum due from the business, in which the deceased had been a partner.

[488] Per Curiam. It is quite impossible, under the circumstances of this motion, that the Court can deviate from its ordinary rules; nor, even if it had the authority, could it safely make the grant without requiring the securities to justify. Suppose, for instance, this young woman should marry and the whole property be dissipated, what remedy could be afforded to the mother? No reason is assigned for the renunciation of Mr. Jones, the executor; nor is the Court informed that any obstacle exists to the formal appointment of a committee, to whom the administration for the use of the widow would regularly be granted; or the administration might go to the daughter as residuary legatee, but in that case the sureties would be required to justify. At all events the Court is bound to reject the present application.

Motion refused.

IN THE GOODS OF JOHN DUNN. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 4th Session, 1828.—The deceased having, between instructions for, and the execution of, his will, delivered to his solicitor a letter of testamentary import to be put with his will; probate thereof decreed, as together with the formal instrument containing the last will of the deceased.

On motion.

John Dunn, late of Bedford Street, Covent Garden, died on the 22d of April, 1827. He left a son, a major in the Army, and two daughters. On the 7th of February preceding he called at the house of Mr. Ottywell Robinson; and gave him verbal and written instructions for his will: a draft was accordingly prepared, read over to, and approved of by, the deceased. On the 6th [489] of March the deceased delivered to Mr. Robinson a paper sealed up in the form of a letter and superscribed, "Major Dunn, by favor of O. Robinson, Esq., Argyle Street," which he desired might be put with his will. On the 11th of April the deceased executed his will; when it was sealed up and, together with the letter, enclosed in an envelope by Mr. Robinson, in whose possession it remained until the testator's death; when the same was opened by Mr. Robinson in Major Dunn's presence, who himself read the letter, but without imparting to any one its contents. Major Dunn, the sole executor and residuary legatee under his father's will, proved it on the 13th of October; the letter, however, he did not prove, though it contained bequests of different annuities, which he regularly paid.(a)

(a) The letter began thus:—

Bedford Street, 28th Feb. 1827.

My dear Son,—You will find I have left you my all, pray God send you may make good use of the same; and I trust for my sake you will be kind to my brother

In the month of December Major Dunn was accidentally killed: he died intestate, leaving a widow and one infant; and on the 9th of January, 1828, letters of administration of his effects were granted to the widow, who had since taken administration (with the will annexed) de bonis non of John Dunn, as administratrix of the residuary legatee therein named.

[490] Lushington prayed the Court to admit the letter to probate, as a codicil, though of a date anterior to the will.

Per Curiam. It clearly was the intention of the deceased that this letter, written prior to, but delivered for the purpose of being put with, the will, should form part of his testamentary disposition. The executor followed its directions without taking probate of it, but that would not be a safe course for his widow, who has only a joint interest with her child in the effects of her late husband. I shall therefore revoke the present administration de bonis non, and decree to Mrs. Dunn a de bonis non administration with the formal instrument, and also with the letter annexed, as containing together the last will of the deceased.

EDWARDS AND EDWARDS v. ASTLEY AND OTHERS, AND v. H. M. PROCURATOR-GENERAL. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 4th Session, 1828.—The presumption of law that pencil alterations are deliberative, may be strengthened by circumstances; such as, that the paper was originally carefully drawn up, and shews the deceased to have been a very precise man, while the alterations are incomplete and inaccurate, rendering the sense imperfect and the meaning doubtful.

[Referred to, Francis v. Grover, 1845, 5 Hare, 47.]

Fitz-William Rosier was the party in this cause, deceased; and the question that arose upon his will was whether certain pencil alterations were cursory and deliberative or final.

A decree had issued citing Mrs. Astley as residuary legatee, and also citing different legatees; the decree was further served upon the King's proctor, as it was alleged that the deceased left no relation.

Lushington and Dodson for the executors, asked probate with all the pencil alterations.

[491] Phillimore and Nicholl contrà, for Mr. Rosier, a legatee.

The King's advocate on behalf of the Crown.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The paper propounded in this case is drawn up with great form and accuracy: each legacy is first expressed in words at length and then carried out into two columns, one specifying the amount of the stock (for the property is almost exclusively stock), the other—of the annual interest: each column is cast up at the bottom of the page and carried forward: the pages are numbered and the words "in continuation" written at the top of each—and this plan is pursued throughout the whole instrument. Nothing then can be done with greater care, and the paper on its face exhibits in strong colours the cautious character of the deceased.

The will, as appears at the end, was originally intended to have been executed on the ninth of August, but the words "ninth day" are struck through, and the words "twenty-sixth day" substituted. The clauses "witness my hand" and "signed in the presence of each other" appear to have been written at the same time that "the ninth of August" was written: he afterwards signed his name and subjoined his place of abode; and from the appearance of the writing I infer that this was done when he altered the date—viz. on the 26th, though, as I have observed, originally proposing to execute it on the ninth—and the conclusion I draw is that when he [492] so formally signed it, not in the presence of any person, he had abandoned his purpose of having witnesses. That he wished the paper to operate in some form or other there is no doubt: indeed the only party claiming under an intestacy—the Crown—offers no opposition to the probate.

The real and only question then is whether the instrument is to operate without and my two sisters, and allow them each twenty pounds per annum during their life. Should Joseph Ramsey my nephew be living in my service when I am no more do what you can for him. You will find a deed with Mr. Binns wherein I am bound to give Mrs. Limbrey seventy pounds during her life.*

—or whether the Court is to pronounce for it with—the pencil alterations. Part of those alterations is proved by the servant, Turner, to have been made on the first of September, 1827, the deceased having died on the fifth. And I see no reason to doubt but that they were all made subsequent to the 26th of August, 1826; it seems most highly improbable that they were there at the time of the execution, whenever that took place—and certainly there is no proof that they then existed. The conclusion deduced from probability is confirmed by a conversation between the deceased and his intimate friend, Mr. Shepherd, on the 15th of August, 1827, in which, speaking of the general contents of the will, he used this expression—"That he had made some alterations which he believed would not be material and that no difficulty could arise from them." Now I think the alterations to which he thus refers on the 15th of August could not be those in pencil; but there are some trifling alterations in ink to which the remark would apply: from being a man of such accuracy he might be under some alarm even respecting these slight erasures; though not material, it was natural enough for him to tell Mr. Shepherd that he had made them: but it is quite impos-[493]-sible to conceive that if these pencil alterations, which constitute the whole difficulty of the case, were then made, he should not have anticipated some confusion arising from them.

It is not unimportant that, in this conversation with Shepherd, the deceased expresses no dissatisfaction at what he has done—no opinion that his residuary legatee would have too little—but just the contrary—he had left her £10,000 stock—her children £24,000 stock—and he added "there would be some pretty pickings for Mrs. Astley after all;" so that on the 15th of August he had no thought of diminishing the legacies in order to increase the residue.

The question then is whether the alterations in pencil were final and decisive, or only deliberative and for further consideration: it must be remembered that they were made by this very accurate man, labouring under an acute and excruciating disorder—"an affection of the bladder of a most extensive nature" (as it is described by the medical man, Glen)—in the most depressed state of body, and within a short period of his dissolution; that when Glen was first called in, the deceased had symptoms of apoplexy, which were only prevented by cupping and other remedies; that the usual effects of this complaint, especially if attended by great pain and exhaustion, are confusion of mind and forgetfulness. All these circumstances tend to support the presumption in favour of the will as originally executed: for primâ facie all pencil alterations are deliberative, and for this obvious reason; if they expressed [494] the final intention of the deceased, why did he not resort to a more durable material? This presumption in the present case is further strengthened by the fact that there are some alterations in ink, and there was no reason why he should not have employed the same material; he was in his own house, undisturbed, with every convenience at hand, engaged on the paper for four hours, and having it by his side for five hours more: surely if he had made up his mind he would have resorted to ink. This presumption, like all other presumptions, may be still further strengthened by circumstances; for instance, if the interlineations and obliterations have rendered the sense incomplete and the papers unintelligible, it would require pretty decisive evidence to convince the Court that they were intended to be final, more especially by a person of extraordinary accuracy when in health.

Here, on the second side, the bequest to Swanton is struck through in such a way as to become unintelligible—not as to the effect, for the legacy would be pretty much the same as originally given, but as to the correctness of the language; it stands thus: the name and title "The Rev. Francis Swanton" is crossed out; and yet immediately afterwards "the said Rev. Francis Swanton" is twice repeated when there is no longer any such person; for the name has previously been struck through. Then again at the end of this bequest the words "together £600 3 per cent. Reduced Bank Annuities" are crossed out in the same manner: this is not at all intelligible; I cannot see why it was struck [495] through; the whole bears the character of confusion of mind.

On the third side, in the legacy to James Rosier, the variation is much more material. In the marginal columns the figures 1000 and 30 are struck through, and 500 and 15 are interlined, while the body, where are the dispositive words, remains unaltered: to which is the Court to adhere? Here again is something of a wandering and confused mind.

In the next clause there is a more extraordinary alteration. £1000 was given by the original dispositive words to each of James Rosier's children, and the sums carried out into the respective columns were 10,000 and 300. The body is now changed by an interlineation to 500 each, while in the margin the figures, instead of being 5000 and 150, are 500 and 15. This again shews confusion, and that he meant to revise, and is uncertain and unintelligible: an accurate man, if he had made up his mind to these alterations, would not have left them in that state. Then in the last clause of that bequest the words "lapse legacy but be equally divided among the survivors" are struck out, and the clause would now stand "I desire that the £500 3 per cent. Reduced Bank Annuities shall not be considered as a," which is perfectly unintelligible and a total want of sense. If any of the parties are dead what is to be done? are the legacies to lapse or not? Now originally, as I have said, after he had made the bequests and carried them out into the marginal column, he cast them up at the bottom of each page; but though the particular [496] bequests are here altered, yet the total is not. All this bears the character of wandering—it is a sort of day-dream, of waking confusion, to which persons in that state are very apt to be subject.

Again, on the fourth side, besides that what relates to the money being the separate property of the Misses Edwards and their sister Mrs. Paget during coverture is struck out; an interlineation of a legacy to their mother occurs; that insertion has more the appearance and stamp of consideration and fixed intention: because at the bottom of the page, in order to include it, he alters the total casting up from 78,000 to 79,000, but even here there is confusion, for where it is separately written at the side the figures are only 79: and moreover he does not add the dividend of this £1000 to the sum total of the interest, it remains £2547, 10, instead of being £2577, 10. Even when he has altered 78 to 79 he does not carry it on to the next page; there the sum still remains 78,000. This shews it was not finished but left incomplete.

Again, what becomes of the alterations in the former pages; for if they were permanent, the casting up in page 3 should, instead of 71,000, be turned into 61,000; or supposing the latter 500 to have been an error for 5000, then it should have been only 65,500 instead of 71,000; yet the total of that page is suffered to remain 71,000 and to be carried on and included in the next page, even where he changes the casting from 78,000 to 79,000.

All this shews either confusion of mind, [497] which from his long illness and the near approach of death might well be the case; or it shews that these were mere passing ideas for further consideration, and left in an incomplete and unfinished state, and afterwards abandoned altogether. This construction is further confirmed by what passed on the 4th, the day before his death. Shepherd and Glen had a conversation with him; he mentioned his executors, he told them where his will was: I do not infer from that that he intended it to operate with these alterations; if he had, he would so have expressed himself to Mr. Shepherd; but there was nothing of the sort; no allusion nor reference to them, no wish to finish them, no declaration that he had made and wished them to be acted upon in the state in which they were: "he hoped his testamentary dispositions would be satisfactory to his friends." Just, however, as Glen had left the room the deceased recollected himself, and when Shepherd had called him back the deceased said, "he thought he had not left sufficient for his servant Philip Turner; he wished him to have £500:" and he had before on the 15th of August mentioned to Shepherd that he intended to give him this increased benefit. If the alterations were not deliberative, and if he had not purposed again to revert to this instrument, he would have made this addition to Turner's legacy when engaged in the paper for four hours on the 1st of September: but he neither does that, nor does he on the 4th say one word about the pencil alterations, and therefore it is to be inferred that, incomplete as they are, he had abandoned them [498] altogether, and probably forgotten their existence. This is the legal presumption, and this is the probability of the fact deducible from the circumstances of the case.

Upon the whole, the paper appears to have been originally drawn up with great care and attention. The Court has every reason to feel certain what the intention was on the 9th of August—finally confirmed when he subscribed it on the 26th of August, 1826; but it has no satisfactory information that the changes which in the wanderings of illness, on the 1st of September, 1827, he projected, were any thing more than transient and deliberative. The Court therefore pronounces for the paper without the pencil alterations.

IN THE GOODS OF DONNA MARIA DE VERA MARAVER. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 31st May, 1828.—Probate of the will of a married woman, a native of and domiciled in Spain, granted according to the law of Spain, to one of her sons as executor, on affidavits as to the law of Spain, and the identity of the parties.

On motion.

The deceased, a native of Spain, died at Seville in November, 1820. On the 22d of November, 1815, she executed her last will and testament; and therein, after stating that she had particularly expressed to Don Martin Saravia, her husband, every thing relating to her will (since, "in consequence of her numerous occupations, time did not permit her to ordain her last [499] will and testament so extensively and with such formality as was required"), she gave to him her right power and faculty in the most ample way according to law, either should he die before her or survive her, and in case he should be prevented from doing so, she then conferred the same power upon their lawful sons, collectively or individually, to declare her last will and testament, and order what she commanded. She appointed her husband and her sons executors.

In the month of April, 1821, Don Saravia, the husband, attended before the proper authority in Seville, and accepted, declared, published, and formalized the will of his late wife; and ratified her appointment of executors. He died in August, 1827. Upon his death a power of attorney, by which Messrs. Mastermans had, since 1819, received the dividends upon certain stock (now consisting of more than £3000 new £4 per cent. annuities) standing in the name of Donna Maraver (wife of Don Saravia), ceased; and in order to sell out that stock and receive the dividends that had accrued since the death of his father (Don Cayetano Saravia), one of the sons and a surviving executor had come to England for the purpose of proving the will.(a) Affidavits were exhibited as follow:—

[500] "Appeared personally Don Cayetano Saravia of Seville in the kingdom of Spain and (by the sworn interpretation of William Renell of London, merchant) made oath that by the laws of Spain, with which at least, in so far as they relate to the matters hereinafter mentioned, he, this appearer, is well acquainted, the fortune or property of a Spanish lady on the occasion of her marriage (unless she expressly declines having any settlement) is inventorized and valued, and such inventory and valuation is signed by her intended husband and the amount thereof remains vested in the wife, and must at her decease be made up and paid by the husband to her executors or heirs; that the husband and wife, during their joint lives, are with respect to their property in a state of co-partnership, and the husband, in case of his wife's decease, is also answerable to her executors or heirs for a moiety of such profits or increase of their joint property (called Gananciales) as may have arisen during their cohabitation; that the wife has full power and authority to make her will as a feme sole, or, as is frequently the custom in Spain, to empower any other person to make and declare the same for her; but in either event, if she leave a child, she cannot bequeath to her husband or to any other person a larger proportion than one fifth of her estate, and the remainder thereof must descend to her children: but that if she has no child she may bequeath her property to her husband or to others as she may choose. That in the event of a wife dying intestate the whole of her property, real and personal, [501] would go to her children, or in default of them, to her next of kin, to the entire exclusion of her husband. That the deceased, Donna de Maraver, in conformity with such laws, had and enjoyed a considerable fortune as a feme sole notwithstanding her coverture; and in November, 1815, duly made and executed her last will and testament in writing, and appointed her said husband to make and declare the same; that the utmost extent of the power which could be derived by him in consequence of such appointment was that he might annul, alter or revoke so much of the said will as related to the disposition of one fifth part of her property; but that having once made, declared and formalized the instrument to be the last will and testament of the deceased, he could not afterwards in any manner alter or revoke the same." The affidavit further stated "that Don Saravia had declared and formal-

(a) It appeared that Don Cayetano had a power of attorney from his co-executors authorizing him fully to act on their behalf, and to take any measures that might be requisite for receiving the effects of the deceased in England, and to appear for them in any Court for that purpose. This power of attorney was before the Court.

ized the instrument executed by his deceased wife to be and contain her last will and testament, and had confirmed the nomination of his sons as executors." (a)[1]

There was also an affidavit, as to the identity of Don Cayetano Saravia, from the Messrs. Renell of London, merchants, to whom about the end of March last he brought letters of introduction and recommendation. In conformity with the directions of the Court, when this case was first mentioned, the principal clerk in the [502] house of Masterman and Co. made an affidavit that Masterman and Co. had been satisfied (a)[2] that Don Cayetano Saravia, the present applicant, was authorized to receive the dividends that had become due upon the stock in the name of Donna de Maraver; and they had accordingly paid over the same.

Upon these affidavits and documents Addams moved for a general probate to Don Cayetano Saravia.

Motion granted.

KING AND THWAITS v. FARLEY. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 31st May, 1828. —A testator having ten years before his death, when in perfect health, executed a will and subsequently a codicil conformable to his ascertained affections, and 2½ years before his death, after a paralytic stroke producing at least great bodily infirmity, having executed a second codicil materially departing from those instruments, and six months before his death a third codicil revoking the 2nd and reverting to the former disposition—probate of the will, 1st and 3rd codicils granted—there being no satisfactory proof of a change in his affections, and the evidence of volition and capacity being at least as strong in support of the 3rd as of the 2nd codicil.

This case was argued by Lushington and Dodson for King and Thwaits, the executors; and by King's advocate and Nicholl for Miss Farley.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The deceased, George Lowdell, died on the 2nd of March, 1827, leaving one brother and the children of another; but he seems to have kept up no intercourse with any of his relations. His property, though the amount of it does not exactly appear, was considerable and of various kinds.

The present question arises on two codicils, and the Court must in some measure consider the factum of both. The former is revocatory [503] of part of his will; the latter, except as to a few small legacies, revokes the former and reverts to the will. The will is dated on the 6th of March, 1817, is all of his own handwriting, is carefully and formally drawn, is signed and sealed, and is attested by three witnesses, his neighbours at Great Bookham, one of them Bennet Hollobrook, who afterwards appears to have been his intimate friend: it appoints Watts, Lintott and Willard, his executors; it directs the payment of his debts; it gives legacies to servants and some others out of his long annuities, and then disposes of the rest of the long annuities; it gives legacies to other servants in addition to their wages; it bequeaths certain sums in trust for charitable purposes; it leaves his medical books and instruments to Mr. Baker; it gives certain joint property specifically to Watts: then, after enumerating several estates, it bequeaths them specifically to Mrs. and the two Miss Thorntons as joint tenants, and also gives them the residue as tenants in common: "The rest and residue of my property of what kind soever and wheresoever, I give to and bequeath to the said Sarah Thornton, widow, Elizabeth Mary Thornton and Mary Thornton spinsters share and share alike as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants to hold to themselves their respective heirs administrators and assigns for ever according to the nature of each respective estate or property."

Whether this latter part and these specific bequests constitute the bulk of his property, or whether the specific bequests exceed the re-[504]-sidue, I am not informed; but however that may be, the Thorntons are especially benefited. Mrs. Thornton afterwards died in the deceased's life-time; her third of the residue would consequently lapse and go to the next of kin.

This will, so carefully and deliberately made, leaves no doubt what the testamentary intentions of the deceased were in 1817; the Thorntons then were the objects of his bounty; the Farleys, of whom we afterwards hear, were not even mentioned; his medical friend and neighbour Mr. Baker, had his professional esteem and regard; his old and intimate friend Mr. Hollobrook is one of the attesting witnesses of this will as well as of the last codicil. The will is in no degree in contest between the parties; here then is a safe and solid foundation of testamentary intention; a point of support on which to rest—a solemn declaration, which is in accordance with the deceased's history.

He was of a very advanced age—above eighty; had formerly been a medical practitioner in the borough, but for many years had resided at Great Bookham in Surrey; he had been married, but his wife had been dead several years without issue: during her lifetime and after her death he had been particularly intimate with the family of the Thorntons, who resided at Kennington. Mr. Thornton died leaving a widow and two sisters; one of whom afterwards married Mr. King, an executor; and the deceased, when he came to town to receive his dividends, used frequently to stay at their house at Kennington for a week at a time; and they were accustomed in the summer to spend some [505] weeks with him at Bookham. Under this long intimacy and no intercourse with his own family it is not extraordinary that they became the principal objects of the deceased's bounty, and accordingly these three ladies were his residuary legatees.

In the beginning of 1819 the deceased had a violent attack of paralysis, which nearly deprived him of speech and of the use of his right side; his testamentary capacity however must be considered to have remained, because there is a subsequent codicil not questioned. This codicil, dated on the 9th of November, 1822, revokes the appointment of Willard and Lintott, and substitutes William King (who I suppose in the meantime had married Miss Thornton) and Thomas Thwaits as executors, and gives to each of the latter £100: it is signed and sealed; and the name is so well written that he can hardly have been obliged, at that time, to use his left hand: it is attested by whom? by the Rev. William Farley, curate of the parish; by Hollobrook; by Bradbury, the tailor; and also by Baker, the surgeon. The validity of this codicil not being impeached, testamentary capacity up to that time, November, 1822, must be admitted; and here are in confirmation of it the Rev. Mr. Farley himself, Mr. Hollobrook, and Mr. Baker, besides Mr. Bogue, the drawer, and Bradbury, the attesting witness. It is, as executors under that paper, that King and Thwaits are parties before the Court opposing a codicil of December, 1824, and setting up a still further codicil of November, 1826.

To the end of 1822, then, the deceased (as [506] must be presumed) continued competent to the performance of a testamentary act notwithstanding the paralytic affection, and at all events the intention of giving the Thorntons, not only the property specifically bequeathed to them, but also the undisposed residue, remained unchanged: while on the other hand there is no intention, manifested up to this time, of benefiting the Farleys.

In March, 1823, he suffered a second paralytic attack; and from that period, if not before, his bodily infirmities were very great; he had lost the use of his right side and hand—he could barely sign his name, and that with his left hand; his speech was almost entirely gone—he could only utter monosyllables—yes and no: as persons in that state usually are, he was very irritable and nervous—irritable at being misconceived or not understood—nervous, so as to be in tears, when any agitating matter was going forward. Whether his condition was much changed by this second seizure from what it was after the first is not very clearly ascertained. Four years elapsed between the first and second attack, and four years more from the second to the time of his death; and it is to be observed, as a matter of experience in this Court, that when witnesses come to speak to the condition of a person some time afterwards, they are apt to confound what passes at different periods. It was however within the latter period—after the second paralytic stroke—that both the instruments in dispute in this cause were made.

On the 29th of December, 1824, a codicil was executed by the deceased and attested by three [507] witnesses, revoking the residuary bequest to the Thorntons, and giving to the Rev. William Farley £100; to Mrs. Bogue £200, and to Jane Farley the residue. On November 18, 1826, another codicil was executed by the deceased and attested by four witnesses, revoking the codicil of December 29, 1824, again giving to William Farley £100; to Mrs. Bogue £200; and to Jane Farley, instead of the residue, £200; and otherwise confirming the will of 1817—a confirmation this of his testamentary bounty in favour of the Thorntons. Each of these instruments must be proved, for if neither is proved, the will of 1817 with the codicil of 1822 remains unaltered.

So far as respects the capacity of the deceased, these two codicils stand upon nearly equal ground: no material change in his condition had taken place—he was much in the same state in December, 1824, as in November, 1826, and he lived near four months after the latter period: true, he had lost the use of one side and could only utter monosyllables, but to the end of his life he was drawn about in his pony-cart, wherever he directed: he signed letters and drafts, he counted money, he understood questions and answered them, he played at cards; he certainly was in a very miserable state of body, but his mental faculties were not gone, he was capable of volition and intention; but it would require very clear proof of intention to support the first of these two codicils. If Baker is right, he had not capacity at either time, and then neither paper ought to be established; but that is not an opinion supported by a just view [508] of the facts, nor one on which, I presume, Miss Farley will much rely.

What, then, is the proof to establish this codicil of December, 1824, and to take away the residue from the Thorntons, to whom he had been so long attached? Mr. Farley had been curate of Bookham about eleven years—he kept a school there—and his sister resided with him: as a neighbour he attested the codicil of 1822, but his name does not occur in the disposition then made. During the latter years of the deceased's life (for so it is laid in the plea) Farley and his sister visited him, shewed him kind attentions, played at cards with him, and Miss Farley gave him her trumps. Hence, though the deceased seemed fond and pleased, though there was a growing partiality, particularly towards Miss Farley, yet all the intimacy arose, and the whole regard was acquired, after this poor creature became a complete paralytic. These kindnesses might account for giving them little legacies, as he had done to others; and here are two documents, E and F, which seem as if such a thing was intended. Paper E contains a list of sums from £100 to £1000: it is headed "Mr. Farley," and thus proceeds:—

Legacies to be paid in	3 months + 6 months
£100	12 months
Mr. Farley +	one hundred pounds
Mrs. Bogue +	two hundred pounds three hundred pounds
+	£400 Miss Farley.

[509] The remainder of this paper is immaterial. This instrument therefore proves that at the time it was drawn up he was unable to express or explain himself in any other way than by a cross, but it also proves that he did intend to benefit these parties to a certain extent, and consequently paper F, a draft of a codicil, is prepared in exact conformity with E; but it has no date, and does not appear to have been executed—

"This is a further codicil to the will of me George Lowdell of Great Bookham in the county of Surrey Esquire I give and bequeath unto the Reverend William Farley of Great Bookham aforesaid Clerk the sum of £100 Also I give and bequeath unto Jane Farley of Great Bookham aforesaid Spinster Sister of the said William Farley the sum of £400 Also I give and bequeath unto Elizabeth the wife of James Bogue of Guildford in the county of Surrey Gentleman the sum of £200 which said legacies of £100 £400 £200 I direct to be paid within 3 months after my decease And in all other respects I ratify and confirm my said will in witness &c."

There is not in the cause any account whatever of these preparations for a codicil: the Court is left quite in the dark when they were drawn up—why they were not executed—how and for what reason the deceased's purpose was changed and so material an alteration made. Mrs. Sheriff, his housekeeper, went with him in his pony-cart to Bogue's for the purpose, as she understood, of giving legacies to the Farleys; this is conformable to the last codicil and does [510] not support the codicil of December, 1824; and though these papers are strong to shew that the deceased intended to give away from the Thorntons pecuniary legacies, there is not the slightest symptom that a thought of revoking or transferring the bequest of the residue had ever shot across his mind.

To account for this departure from the original disposition of the testator's property, Miss Farley has introduced in her plea many charges of violence and of ill treatment on the part of the Thorntons towards the deceased, and has alleged a great quarrel in consequence: but it does not appear from the evidence that there was any great quarrel with which the codicil of December, 1824, had any connection—there was no separation—there were little bickerings, such as were natural with an irritable, penurious, obstinate, old man, between eighty and ninety, labouring under great infirmities and wearying out his attendants; but nothing that did not soon blow over, nor was the intercourse ever broken off. It is true that at one time the deceased gets up after he has gone to bed and insists on Peter's sleeping in his room instead of Quelet; he stands on the stairs in his nightshirt; they endeavour to persuade him to go to bed again, but persuasion being of no avail they carry him back: this is merely out of kindness properly exercised—a very fit interposition; but it does not shew that the deceased was not a free agent at other periods and on other matters. Again, it was said that the deceased, being very penurious, wished to reside at Kennington with the Thorntons, and that they de-[511]-clined to receive him; that in consequence he was exceedingly angry and offended; but the story is so blind and dark that it does not render probable this important variation: if it were true to the extent represented, if his affections were completely alienated and transferred to Miss Farley, he would have broken off all communication with the Thorntons and revoked the specific bequests as well as the residue, but no such thing; his intimacy still continues and the specific bequests remain part of his will.

If there is nothing then à priori to render the alteration probable, what is the proof of the factum? All that has been done in support of it is the production of the attesting witnesses—three tradesmen at Guildford called in by Bogue and who see the deceased subscribe—but nothing more. The codicil is not read over in their presence and the deceased scarcely utters a word.

This is a total failure of proof: it would be quite contrary to all experience and practice to pronounce this sufficient proof. If a man is in full possession of his faculties and the execution takes place in the presence of three witnesses, the presumption is that he knows and intends what he is doing; but when it is the act of a man in such a state and at variance with all his former ascertained intentions, such evidence weighs nothing at all. Bogue alone could have proved what would have been satisfactory to the Court, but Miss Farley has not ventured to produce and subject him to cross-examination: she has been content with her own cross-examination by one single interrogatory, and that is so general that it amounts to nothing; he [512] merely says that he drew the codicil from instructions given by the deceased and was satisfied that he intended to make this disposition. In ordinary cases perhaps this might be sufficient; but as the deceased was in so wretched a condition it was necessary to lay the circumstances before the Court to shew that such means were used that the deceased could not misapprehend the nature and purport of the instrument. The proof then in support of the codicil of December, 1824, supposing there were no revocatory codicil, is extremely slender, considering the infirmity of the deceased's faculties and the strong presumption against the revocation of the disposition contained in the will of 1817 as already set forth. It is pleaded that in 1825 the deceased delivered this codicil to the brother, William Farley; of that no evidence is offered; they have not ventured to produce him, though he has no greater interest under one codicil than the other: the history therefore of this codicil and of the possession of it is much in the dark.

In the summer of 1826, Mrs. Sheriff's health having been much impaired by nursing the deceased, she was absent for six weeks or two months; and Miss Thornton came to the deceased's house to superintend the family during her absence. Miss Farley, who was acquainted with this codicil of December, 1824, seems to have interfered in the domestic arrangements and to have had some quarrel with Miss Thornton, because Mrs. Sheriff states on her return she found matters in confusion. This part of the history is left rather in obscurity: [513] how the existence of this codicil was first known either to Thornton, or to Sheriff, or to the deceased himself, there is no evidence, but the fact is quite clear that there was a considerable quarrel between the Farleys and Miss Thornton: how brought about does not appear—whether the deceased remembered it and repented of the codicil, or whether it was suggested to him; but not only did intercourse with the Farley's cease, and were they excluded from his house, but in the autumn he was anxious to do something about the codicil of December, 1824, and Peters, his servant, deposes that the deceased desired to be driven to the house of Mr. Hart: and while it is pleaded by Miss Farley that custody and controul were both exercised over him, the fact is clear that he drove out in his pony-chaise as before, that he passed Farley's door constantly and never called, and that (with the exception of the Farleys) his friends and neighbours —different families—visited him as before: so that he was neither kept at home in custody nor controlled as to where he should go; and the evidence is pretty strong that he was at no time a person who would readily submit to be controlled.

It is quite manifest that he became much dissatisfied with Bogue, and very anxious about some new testamentary act after finding out the contents of this codicil: he seems to have supposed that Mr. Bogue had at least misapprehended his intentions, if not too readily furthered the Farley's wishes; but assuming that he well knew and understood the contents of that codicil, and that it was executed under some [514] temporary impression, and that of this there was full proof, is it at all extraordinary that he should revert to his former will? Such a return would be much easier of proof than the former departure: it was natural enough that on reflection or explanation, or even on remonstrance, he should gladly and readily revert to it.

Accordingly on Saturday, October 24, he set off in his pony-chaise and made his servant drive him to Dorking to the house of Mr. Hart—a solicitor residing there—a witness produced by Miss Farley, and who has acted fairly and given fair evidence. The deceased could not articulate nor make himself understood further than that his visit had some reference to his will, and the interview ends by a proposal from Hart to call on the deceased at Bookham the following day. This visit to Dorking is not immaterial as shewing that the deceased had an intention to make some alteration when not in the presence of those usually about him, and that he was not a mere instrument in their hands.

On going the next day to Bookham and meeting Mr. Thwaits, Hart had no better success, and made but little progress in understanding the deceased. There the matter rested for a time; but Bogue, having been staying a few days with the deceased at Bookham, before he went away on the third of November, delivered to him copies of all the codicils he had ever drawn for him; and on the 16th of November Hart, being sent for again, went over to Bookham; and he did then arrive somewhat nearer to the deceased's wishes. A draft of the will of 1817 was produced [515] and read over to the deceased: when they came to the residuary clause he was asked if he had made a codicil giving Miss Farley the residue, and if it was agreeable to him; he appeared affected; he shook his head and cried, "No, no." Here then, from Miss Farley's own witness, is pretty strong evidence that the deceased—unless he was idiotic, which is contrary to all the evidence—was dissatisfied with the codicil of 1824; and that if he had possessed the power of utterance he would have got it revoked when he first went to Hart's. Hart then proposed, and the proposal was acceded to and adopted, that Bogue should attend on Saturday, November the 18th, as well as Mr. Baker, the surgeon, and Mr. Thwaits, the executor, all disinterested witnesses in respect to this codicil.

Accordingly on the 18th of November they met, and Mrs. Sheriff and Miss Thornton were also present. The papers D, E, F, and G, copies of the several testamentary instruments, were then produced, and Hart read to the deceased G, the copy of the codicil of December, 1824. He deposes that "the deceased listened very attentively till he came to the clause giving the residue to Jane Farley; the deceased then shook his head and hands, and, in a crying tone of voice, said, 'No, no,' and appeared to be affected and in tears." This is Hart's own account, and if the deceased had any intellect and was not completely deprived of understanding, this evinced a wish and intention to revoke that disposition of the residue. Mr. Hart very properly does not trust to his mere reading; he repeats it in the way of explanation, and again [516] asks "if it was the deceased's intention to give the residue to Jane Farley." "The deceased again shook his head, cried, and said, 'No, no,' appearing much hurt." Hart then enquired "where the codicil was;" and being told that it was in the hands of Jane Farley, asked the deceased "if it was his wish the codicil should be obtained from her. The deceased immediately nodded assent: deponent said he and Bogue would go to her; deceased again nodded, and, as deponent thinks, said, 'Yes, yes, yes.'" Here is the absence of speech, but here is intelligent assent and dissent, approbation and disapprobation, as to what is read, to what is explained, and to what is proposed: he understands the drift of questions. Hart and Bogue go to Miss Farley and demand the codicil; she denies having it; the brother is present; but I will not rest on this part of the case; the codicil cannot be obtained, and they return without it. The Rev. William Farley overtakes and enters the house with them, and begins making an accusation against the parties present. A great altercation and much noise ensue; the poor speechless testator can do nothing but shed tears, and Farley at length retires. Hart expresses a wish to decline making the codicil, and goes away as he deposes, "having previously stated to Mr. Bogue that he or any other person who understood the deceased better might do so if they thought proper;" so that he does not protest against the deceased's capacity, and caution those present not to proceed; on the contrary, his objection only arises from his doubt of understanding the deceased; [517] and he quite negatives the very plea of Farley by whom he is produced: for on the next article he states: "He cannot depose that the deceased was incapable of the management of himself and his affairs, and was not a free agent. . . . The deceased did not appear at all intimidated—not in the least; and his understanding appeared to be good then as well as on the previous occasions on which he had seen him; for deponent saw him on three occasions prior to the aforesaid 18th of November."

Here then is Miss Farley's own witness, and a person whose conduct appears to have been cautious and sensible, proving from the conduct of the deceased, understanding and volition, and confirming with his own opinion and from his own observation, that the deceased was not intimidated or imposed upon, but was both a free and a capable agent.

Mr. Bogue gives nearly a similar account, varying in some instances as to particular circumstances, but in nothing that affects the credit of either. Baker also in part agrees with one, in part with the other; but all concur in substance, especially on the important point of the intention and conduct of the deceased. Bogue's evidence is, in some respects, even stronger than Hart's. For instance, he says the deceased himself pointed to Hart and the deponent as the two persons to go and demand the codicil of Miss Farley—that the deceased waived his hand to Farley to quit the room; and in some few other particulars: but it will be sufficient to revert to him for the sequel, to [518] observe what precautions he took after Hart's departure to ascertain the volition and capacity of the deceased.

Bogue deposes "that when Hart had left the room either Mrs. Sheriff or Miss Thornton or Mr. Baker, or they conjointly, requested deponent to make a new codicil revoking that of the 29th December, 1824."

There was no impropriety in their then requesting Bogue to make the codicil, for they had been present in the room all the time and knew what the deceased's wishes were. Bogue at first declined, because he thought he had offended him: they at length prevailed on him; and this is the account he gives of the transaction: "Deponent, taking either the copy of the codicil of the 29th of December, 1824, already on the table, or the draft of it, which he had brought with him, said to the deceased, 'Do you mean to revoke the legacy to the Reverend William Farley of the sum of £100:' to which the deceased answered distinctly 'No.' Deponent then asked him 'whether he wished to revoke the legacy of £200 to deponent's wife.' 'No.' 'Whether he intended to revoke the bequest of the residue of all his property to Miss Farley;' he replied in a distinct manner 'Yes.' 'Whether he would not give her something.' 'No.' Miss Thornton then asked the deceased to give Miss Farley £200, upon which he said 'Yes,' or by a sign signified his assent. She then asked him, 'Whether he would not leave something to his nephew:' to which he answered 'No.'"

[519] If a will can be made by interrogatories—unless there be something in law to prevent instructions being received in this manner—here is the strongest proof of volition, discrimination, and capacity, particularly, taking it in conjunction with the fact that the deceased's mind had been previously known. Bogue then asked the deceased, "Whether Thwaits should continue in the room while the codicil is prepared;" and he answered "Yes:" and in this there was no impropriety: Thwaits was a friend of the deceased's and perfectly disinterested. Bogue continues: "While he was drawing up the codicil he asked the deceased whether he intended to revoke the appointment he had by a prior codicil made of the deponent as an executor; the deceased answered thereto by taking the very codicil containing such appointment and throwing it into the fire. When deponent had finished the draft he read it over to the deceased, and asked him 'whether it was right:' the deceased said 'Yes.' He afterwards read the copy all over to the deceased, and put the same question—to which the deceased replied 'Yes.'"

So here are two readings over. The witness then speaks to the execution of the codicil and to the testator's capacity: as to his capacity, in these terms:

"The deceased was unable to converse: he only uttered monosyllables or little more; but he had every faculty, as deponent believes, except the faculty of speech; that he recognized every person who came into the room; [520] and nodded when they inquired after his health."

At least this is as good evidence as on the former codicil, and his reverting to the disposition of the will is more natural than the departure from it. But I do not wholly rest on Bogue for this part of the case; here is Baker, the medical attendant, as I have already noticed, who, after speaking to the facts, says:

"He believes it was the deceased's intention to make an alteration in the disposition of the residue of his property, and to revoke the codicil of the 29th of December, 1824, and that the deceased understood and approved of the codicil of the 18th of November, 1826; but he does not believe that the deceased was on that day of sound, perfect and disposing mind, memory and understanding."

This opinion will not much serve Miss Farley's case: but looking at the facts stated by Mr. Baker, on which the Court must form its own opinion, the intelligence and volition seem sufficient for giving effect to the particular transaction. Considering the former disposition, his long affection for the Thorntons, his quarrel with and estrangement from the Farleys in the summer of 1826, it was to be expected that he would revert to his original purpose. His old and intimate acquaintance, Mr. Hollobrook, corroborates this detail of the facts:

"Bogue read the codicil in the hearing of all present, and then asked the deceased, 'Will you leave Miss Farley £200?' to which he answered in a firm tone 'Yes.' 'Will you leave Mr. Farley £100?' 'Yes.' 'Mrs. [521] Bogue £200?' 'Yes.' Bogue then enquired 'Whether he wished to leave any more:' to which he answered, 'No:'" that is, then, reverting to the will. The witness continues, "That on the day and at the time of the execution of the codicil the deceased was of sound mind, memory and understanding, and, as far as his mind was required to act, was as capable of doing that or any other serious act requiring thought, judgment, and reflection as ever he was."

Now, upon the evidence already quoted, there is sufficient for me to pronounce that the codicil of 1826 is proved: there is no clandestinity in the transaction: Hollobrook, who attested the will of 1817, is, the day before, requested to attend for the purpose of being a witness. Mr. Baker is also appointed to be present, and Bradbury is asked to be a witness: there is no appearance of any urgency in any part of the business. The Court ought also to recollect that the deceased was not then at the point of death; he lived four or five months longer, Miss Thornton staying with him, he acting as before, driving out in his pony chaise, signing letters, signing drafts, playing at cards.

Upon the whole, there can be no doubt that before his mind was in any degree affected, viz. when he executed the will in 1817, it was the fixed and decided intention of the deceased to give the bulk and residue of his fortune to the Thorntons; and that before any alteration was made in that disposition he had suffered two severe paralytic attacks. The codicil made in favour of Miss Farley is not sustained by any satisfac-[522]-tory evidence of a rational change of affection or of intention in that respect; but assuming that the evidence is sufficient, the codicil revoking the altered disposition of the residue and reverting to the former intention is at least as strongly, in fact much more strongly, sustained.

The Court therefore only grants probate of the will of the codicil of 1822, and of the codicil of 1826: but, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, I shall not give costs.

[523] BROWN v. BROWN. Arches Court, Trinity Term, 1st Session, 1828.—To found a sentence of nullity by reason of impotency, the impediment must be shewn to have existed at the marriage, and to be incurable: impediment not proved incurable.—Semble, that an impediment not natural but supervening is no ground of nullity.

[See further, 2 Hagg. Ecc. 5.]

This was a cause of divorce, by reason of cruelty and adultery, promoted and brought by Elizabeth Brown, wife of John Brown, of St. Ives in the county of Huntingdon. The marriage took place on the 3d of November, 1825, and on the 12th of October, 1826, the parties separated.

A libel consisting of twenty-two articles, with two exhibits annexed, was admitted without opposition. To this libel a negative issue was given, and three witnesses were examined as to the fact of marriage. An allegation (of eleven articles with an exhibit) on the part of John Brown was after debate admitted as reformed. It alleged that although a marriage was in fact had and solemnized between the parties, they never lived and cohabited as man and wife, "by reason of some natural impediment and incurable malconformation and [524] bodily defects which cannot be removed by the art or help of physicians and surgeons [as by the judgment and inspection of matrons and other lawful proofs to be made in this cause will manifestly appear]." (a)[1] The prayer of this allegation was, "That the marriage might be pronounced to have been and to be absolutely null and void from the beginning." On behalf of Mrs. Brown this allegation was counterpleaded and contradicted: and witnesses having been examined on both sides, the cause at petition of both proctors had been concluded as to the fact and validity of the marriage.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. Mrs. Brown was past the age of child-bearing at the time of the marriage: therefore the primary and most legitimate object of wedlock, the procreation of issue, could not operate; and a man of sixty who marries a woman of fifty-two should be contented to take her "tanquam soror." But here there is a failure of proof on both the points which it was incumbent on the husband to establish: first, that there was an impediment to consummation existing at the time of the marriage; and, secondly, that that impediment was incurable.

It was pleaded, indeed, in the husband's allegation that the disease was natural and incura-[525]-ble: had it been stated that though incurable it was merely a supervening defect—the not unusual attendant of advanced age, and in a woman past child-bearing—I do not know that the Court would have admitted the plea at all: for I have yet to look for an authority that would set aside the marriage, even if these facts, now insisted on as sufficient to found a sentence of nullity, were held to be proved. But, in my opinion, they are not proved: more especially as to the disease being incurable. Mr. Copeland, ten months after the marriage, afforded her some relief; the cure was in progress when he ceased to attend her; and Mr. Okes, a surgeon of Cambridge, and two experienced women, who both have had large families, are of opinion that the obstruction is removed.

Without therefore deciding any thing as to the other branch of the case, I shall confine the expression of my opinion to this: that the husband has failed to prove the disease incurable: and shall leave the wife to proceed with the suit for adultery, recommending however that the parties should come to some arrangement. The legality of the marriage is established by the Court pronouncing that the husband has not proved his allegation.

[526] HAWKES v. HAWKES.(a)[2] Arches Court, Trinity Term, 2nd Session, 1828.—Alimony pendente lite is usually about one fifth of the annual income: but the proportion may vary according to the circumstances of the parties.

[Referred to, Francis v. Grover, 1845, 5 Hare, 47.]

This was a cause of divorce brought by the husband against the wife. The present application respected an allowance of alimony pendente lite.

The King's advocate and Haggard for the husband.

Lushington and Pickard contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The husband's income is admitted to be nearly £1700.

(a)[1] The passage between brackets was struck out before the plea was admitted: the Court observing that, as it appeared from the allegation Mrs. Brown more than once since the marriage had submitted herself to the inspection of surgeons, the Court would not direct a further examination.

(a)[2] Vide supra, p. 194.

Now, though the wife during the pendency of the suit must be presumed not to be guilty, yet she is not to live exactly in the same way as if she were exempt from any imputation: she is as it were under a cloud, and should seek privacy and retirement. These Courts have in such cases been generally disposed to consider as a fair medium about one fifth of the net income, but they have allowed their decisions to be regulated by, and to vary according to, circumstances: the husband, for instance, must have a larger proportion if his rank and condition require more to support them. Here the income arises out of pay; and consequently, first, it is of uncertain duration; the Court would therefore not grant so large an [527] allowance as if it proceeded from substantial property: secondly, it is given him expressly to compensate his services and to meet his expences (which must be heavy) as an officer—a captain of cavalry on an East India station: this furnishes another reason why a smaller proportion should be allotted. Again, he has three children for whose maintenance and education he must necessarily make remittances to this country—that is always a further circumstance that operates in the consideration of these questions.

It appears that, previous to the wife's alleged misconduct, the husband allowed £400 per annum for the maintenance of his wife and children: my mind has been fluctuating between £200 and £250 per annum; but I have decided on allowing her £250, considering that, during the progress of the suit, there has been no appearance of a disposition to proceed vexatiously: on the contrary, by admitting the answers of the husband's attorney, his brother, to the allegation of faculties, much delay which would have arisen, since the husband is in India, has been prevented. I allot alimony at the rate of £250 per annum from the return of the citation.

On the third session the Court pronounced the case fully proved, and signed the sentence of separation.

[528] DURANT v. DURANT. Arches Court, Easter Term, 3rd Session, 1826.—In a suit for divorce brought by the wife, repeated and profligate adultery being proved on the part of the husband (who, however, had to maintain and educate twelve children), permanent alimony at the rate of £600 per annum (in addition to £120 per annum separate property) out of a net income of £4000, allotted from the date of the sentence, three years before; the cause having in the interval been carried by appeal to the Delegates, but remitted, no steps being there taken by the appellant, and the remaining delay being occasioned by his absence from the kingdom.

[Discussed, Dempster v. Dempster, 1861, 2 Sw. & Tr. 438. Qualified, Collins v. Collins, 1884, 9 A. C. 205. Explained, Russell v. Russell, [1895] P. 315: affirmed, [1897] A. C. 395.]

This was a suit of divorce instituted by Mary Ann Durant against George Durant, her husband, by reason of his adultery.

The King's advocate and Haggard now applied to the Court for an allotment of permanent alimony under the circumstances stated in the judgment.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The present application is for the allotment of permanent alimony. The suit has been long depending—the original citation having been taken out from the Consistorial Episcopal Court of Lichfield and Coventry in January, 1820. The husband, who had an interest in bringing the question to a speedy hearing, as during the pendency he had to pay his wife's costs and alimony, is the person who in every stage has opposed the most vexatious delays. The case came up here by appeal on an interlocutory matter (see 1 Add. 114); there was also an appeal to the Delegates on an alleged grievance; and the cause being remitted, a final sentence was given here in [529] Easter Term, 1825; (a) from this judgment the husband again appealed, but took no steps in the Delegates—did not even print the process: the cause was accordingly a second time remitted to this Court in December, 1827; and the present application has not been sooner made, because the husband has been resident abroad.

It is impossible to conceive a case in which a husband could have treated a wife more injuriously, or have conducted the suit more vexatiously: he has thrown every possible impediment in the way of her obtaining justice; he has evaded every attempt to bring the question of alimony before the Court. The only way has been to allot certain sums by way of alimony—the whole, taken together, has not exceeded £140 a year—which, and £120 a year of her own, make the total amount of the income she has been receiving £260; but this is now brought still lower by the reduction of the five per cents., in which stock her small property was invested.

Out of this pittance she has been obliged to incur very considerable expences: being in very delicate health, she has been compelled to resort to the sea and to have the benefit of medical attendance, and, in addition to this, she will have to defray some extra costs in this protracted litigation.

The husband, it appears, is a gentleman of considerable fortune and consequence at Tong [530] Castle in Shropshire, where he possesses the manor and estate, and might move in the most respectable society. Though his wife has borne him fourteen children—twelve of whom are now living—yet he has been guilty of the lowest and most profligate adultery. Notwithstanding these circumstances the Court must not allow any indignant or vindictive feelings to operate in allotting to this lady her permanent alimony. It must take all the circumstances coolly and impartially into consideration.

An allegation of faculties having been given in, the husband's answers were taken; but, as they were not satisfactory, witnesses were produced to prove the annual value of the estates. Many of the tenants and occupiers of particular farms were examined, but the principal witness was Bishton, a surveyor, well acquainted with the property: it is not, however, necessary to ascertain very precisely the exact amount, a general rough guess, coupled with other considerations, will be sufficient. The annual value, according to the survey of Bishton (exclusive of timber amounting to £36,000) is £6380; according to the husband's answers £4400: and the particular witnesses make it more than the husband but not quite so much as the surveyor. If, deducting outgoings (but not the ordinary repairs nor improvements,(a) as I suppose the surveyor, in estimating the estate, would consider these), [531] mortgages, interest on debts, and his mother's annuity, I take the net income from the estates at £4000; it is the utmost that the husband can be supposed to possess. Here are twelve children, sons and daughters, some growing up, whom it is necessary to maintain, educate, and advance in life: a part of the income must necessarily be expended in meeting these demands. Possibly, if the wife has a liberal allowance, she would gladly take some of the children, particularly the daughters, and the Court would gladly remove them from the contagion of the father's example; but it can neither direct nor calculate upon that. The wife, however, is entitled to be subsisted in a state of comfort and respectability consistent with her station in society. The misconduct of her husband is not to deprive her of that to which she would be entitled as his widow (for she is to be looked upon as a widowed wife) and as the mother of this large family. It does not, however, appear if any nor what settlement was made for her in case of her widowhood: but it is stated that an annuity of £400 is paid by Mr. Durant to his mother, Mrs. Chapman. She has, I presume, re-married, and may therefore have lost part of the provision she would have enjoyed had she continued unmarried—in her widowed state. Mrs. Durant too appears in very delicate health: but, considering the largeness of the family Mr. Durant has to provide for, if, in addition to her own £120, I decree £600 a year to be paid by the husband as permanent alimony, payable quarterly and from the date of the sentence in [532] this Court, it seems to me that I arrive at the fair justice of the case between the parties: I am the more cautious not to go too far, as Mr. Durant does not appear by counsel. The arrears are justly due, and, if she can recover them, will assist in discharging any debts she may have contracted, and will enable her to live in comfortable retirement adapted to the enfeebled state of her health.

KEMPE v. KEMPE. Arches Court, Trinity Term, 3rd Session, 1828.—Permanent alimony is always larger than alimony pendente lite: out of an income of £750, the husband having no state nor family to maintain, £250 allotted to the wife, she taking charge of their only child.

This was a suit of divorce, or separation à mensâ et thoro, brought by letters of request from the Court of the Archdeacon of Cornwall, and instituted by Elizabeth

(a) In his answers Durant estimated "annual repairs and improvements"—£500; and "abatement of rent per annum for lime and underdraining"—£400.

Kempe against John Arthur Kempe, her husband, by reason of his adultery. The marriage took place on the 3d October, 1826; and the cohabitation ceased in April, 1827.

Phillimore and Lushington for the wife.

The King's advocate and Addams contrà, submitted, in respect to an allotment of permanent alimony, that the property wholly came from the husband.

[533] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. It being admitted in this case that the guilt of the husband has been fully established, it is my duty to pronounce the sentence prayed by the wife, viz. a separation from bed and board on account of her husband's adultery. I proceed then to the consideration of the question of permanent alimony.

Undoubtedly the wife is entitled to a comfortable subsistence in proportion to her husband's income, and the allotment is always more liberal when the husband's delinquency stands proved than pending suit. In this case there is no reason why the allowance should be less than usual: the husband has neither state nor family to support; he is living in retirement on his half-pay and private fortune. His income is £729, besides personal property worth about £700, making altogether an income of rather more than £750 per annum. Alimony at the rate of £250 per annum will not be too much, as Mrs. Kempe is, I apprehend, willing to take the child. If she declines to take it, the Court may be induced somewhat to lessen this sum, but if the refusal proceeds from the husband; if he will not allow his wife the comfort of retaining her infant; the Court, though it cannot control a father's rights, would not be disposed to hold such refusal as a ground for reducing the allowance. His conduct has been highly reprehensible; he is not a very fit person to bring up the child under the tuition of the partner in his guilt—a girl, too, of low condition—his servant before marriage; and it is due [534] to the morals of society that a dissolute husband who so offends should contribute liberally to the support of an injured wife: and should also, at least, have no inducement to exercise his power as a father, by withdrawing the child from the care of the mother, and to bring it up in the scene of his own domestic profligacy. The child is under a year old, and as Mrs. Kempe has acted with great forbearance and very much with the feelings of a wife and of a mother on the occasion, the welfare of the child would probably best be secured under her maternal care.

I allot £250 per annum as permanent alimony, to commence from the date of the sentence: for though no alimony pendente lite was granted (because none was asked), the suit has not been long pending, and the present allotment is liberal. Besides, the question now solely regards the permanent alimony, and I should interfere with the usual course of practice if I decreed its commencement to date from an earlier period.

[535] GRIGNION v. GRIGNION. Arches Court, Trinity Term, 4th Session, 1828.—A sum of money being left to the executors, in trust to invest and pay the interest to A. for life, and after A.'s death to divide the principal among his issue on their respectively attaining the age of twenty-one, with benefit of survivorship till that age, A. being dead, his only three children majors, and the shares of two of them paid over, the Court will proceed, in a suit of subtraction of legacy against the executor, to enforce payment of the third's share, holding that the character of trustee is at an end, and that of executor alone subsisting.

[Referred to, Perrin v. Perrin, [1914] P. 137.]

On petition.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The facts and proceedings in this case were stated when the protest was argued; (a) but it may be convenient briefly to repeat them.

It is a suit for subtraction of legacy brought by Andrew Biggs Grignion, one of the substituted residuary legatees in the will of Reynolds Grignion against Claudius Grignion, the surviving executor. The citation was personally served on the 7th of February, 1828: an appearance was given, but under protest, alleging, "that Reynolds Grignion, the testator, died in 1787, leaving a will dated in 1785, of which Isaac Webb and Claudius Grignion were executors; and that he thereby bequeathed to his executors £120 and one fourth of the residue in trust; that the executors had proved the will in the Prerogative Court and invested the £120 and the fourth part of the residue in their own names as trustees; and therefore that the matter is not within the jurisdiction of this Court."

(a) Lushington in support of the protest; Addams contrà.

It was replied, "That after payment of the debts and other legacies, one fourth of the residue and £120 were directed to be placed in Government securities in the names of the [536] executors, the interest thereof to be paid to the testator's son Israel for life, and on his death the principal to be divided among his children on attaining the age of twenty-one; that Israel died in 1813, leaving three children, Jane, James, and Andrew, the party in this cause; that the executors paid Jane and James each one third on attaining their respective majorities; that Andrew Biggs Grignion attained the age of twenty-one on the twenty-first of June, 1827, but that the executor refuses to pay his proportion; that he therefore submits that the question is subject to the jurisdiction of this Court."

The question then is, whether this Court has any jurisdiction to entertain this suit: if it clearly has no jurisdiction, the Court would not suffer the parties to proceed and to incur unnecessary expence. It would stop without waiting for an injunction; but, if the point be at all doubtful, the Court would be bound to proceed; for to refuse the exercise of a jurisdiction, which is competent to entertain the suit, and to which a party applies, is a "sort of denial of justice."

Is there then any sound principle or authority clearly shewing that this Court cannot and ought not to entertain the case? Causes of subtraction of legacy are undoubtedly of the cognizance of this Court: the executor receives his authority from the ecclesiastical jurisdiction—a part of his functions (which he is expressly sworn to perform) is to pay the legacies; if he omits to discharge this duty the jurisdiction from which his authority emanates is [537] naturally resorted to, in order to compel him to proceed. This Court then enforces payment where the legacy is subtracted. It is true that Courts of Equity exercise a concurrent jurisdiction; the principle upon which that concurrency has been assumed is that all executors are in the nature of trustees; the legal property of the effects is in the executor and must be collected by him, though he holds these effects in trust for the legatees. Speaking with all possible respect of past times, there does seem a little of refinement and fiction even in the foundation of this concurrency of jurisdiction; but that is now a point perfectly settled. It is equally settled that if there is an unfinished trust, or if the interests of third parties are to be protected, Courts of Equity have not merely a concurrent but an exclusive jurisdiction. On that ground, if in this case any proceedings had been attempted during the lifetime of Israel Grignion, the legatee for life, or during the minority of his children, this Court would have refused to entertain the suit; there being ulterior interests to protect, to which a Court of Equity, being the guardian of all trusts, could alone be competent. On the same principle, if a legacy is given to a married woman, this Court is incompetent, because it cannot compel the husband to make a settlement; it can merely enforce payment: so also at one time Courts of Equity required legatees to give security to refund, and on that ground they granted injunctions, though that ground would go nearly to annihilate this jurisdiction altogether, and to assume an exclusive jurisdiction: but [538] now Courts of Equity have themselves abandoned that rule of requiring legatees to give security to refund; and therefore allow these Courts to compel payment.

Now, what is the case in the present instance? The legacy is given to the executors in trust for Israel for life; then to his issue, with benefit of survivorship, till they attain the age of twenty-one, but, having attained that age, to each of them absolutely share and share alike. It is hardly necessary to read the will itself, but I will advert, for greater certainty, to the part which applies to the present question:

"And as and concerning the £120 and the remaining fourth part of the residue of my personal estate given to Isaac Webb and my son Claudius in trust—I do hereby declare that the same are and is so given to them upon trust that they shall and do place, lay out invest and continue the same at interest in or upon some or one of the public funds or government security, and also shall and do from time to time for and during the term of the natural life of my son Israel Grignion pay the yearly dividends interest and proceeds thereof unto my said son Israel or authorize and suffer him to receive and take the same when and as they become due and payable to and for his own use and benefit." [So it is given to Israel for his life.] "And as to the said sum of £120 and the said last mentioned fourth part of the rest residue and remainder of my personal estate and effects and the stocks funds or securities in or upon which the same shall or may be so placed laid out [539] or invested my will and mind is and I do hereby declare that the said Isaac Webb and my said son Claudius their executors and administrators shall and do from and immediately after the decease of my said son Israel stand be and continue possessed thereof interested therein and entitled thereto in trust for all and every the child and children of my said son Israel equally to be divided between them share and share alike to be paid and transferred to them respectively when and as they respectively shall attain the age of twenty-one years."

These trusts are now all at an end. Israel is dead leaving three children; all have attained the age of twenty-one; each is entitled to his third; there is no resulting trust to be executed; each has a vested absolute interest in his legacy, to receive it and do what he pleases with it. Nothing remains to be done but to enforce payment. The executor, though not expressly called a trustee in the will (a fact that makes no real distinction), has had both characters, his function as trustee has been finished, his duty as executor remains, namely, to pay the legatees. This seems to be the substantial good sense and plain reason of the matter, stripped of refinement, and fiction, and technicality. As executor he is sworn to pay the legacies: this is a legacy now become absolute and due, simply to be paid; the executor subtracts it, he refuses payment: has this Court then the jurisdiction to enforce the duty which, when the office was committed to him, [540] he swore to this Court to discharge? or is it clear that a Court of Equity would grant an injunction to restrain this Court from proceeding?

The authorities quoted do not satisfy me that an injunction would be granted; the trusts under this will have never been subjected to the enforcement of any Court of Equity; there have been no proceedings had so as to put any other Court in possession of the case, supposing it a question of concurrent jurisdiction; the two elder children have been paid each one-third, so that there is not any question of construction: none is alleged. It was thrown out in argument, but it is not alleged in the protest, and perhaps need not be noticed, that there may be behind a question of the legitimacy of this younger child: but surely a question of legitimacy, of all others, is not one which the Court Christian is not competent to entertain; the point, however, is not raised for my consideration: but do the authorities shew that a Court of Equity would enjoin under the circumstances of this case? if they do, and clearly, this Court would not proceed.

The general proposition is that Courts of Equity have the exclusive jurisdiction of all trusts: the answer is, here is no trust remaining; here only remains the duty of an executor, the payment of a legacy absolutely vested in the legatee. Mr. Toller's book (a)[1] is only of authority so far as it is supported by the cases to which [541] it refers. In the case quoted from 1 Barnewall and Cresswell,(a)[2] it appeared upon the face of the writ de contumace capiendo that the suit had been brought against the party in the character of trustee: therefore the Ecclesiastical Court had no right to proceed; and he was discharged out of custody. Here the suit is brought against Claudius Grignion in his character of executor.

The next case is Stonehouse v. Stonehouse (1 Dick. 98). The whole of that report are the following words:—"Injunction granted to stay proceedings in the Spiritual Court for payment of a legacy until the hearing, and plaintiff to speed the cause." This is the whole; there was a suit depending, because the order was to stay proceedings till the hearing: such an order would be a matter of course. There might be existing trusts to execute, respecting which the suit in equity was depending; it might be a question of assets and of account; it might be a legacy to a minor or to a married woman: that case is much too blind, and not at all sufficient to influence me. On the present occasion it is not alleged that there is any suit in any other Court.

Smith v. Kempson (2 Dick. 769) is of the same sort. It is an injunction to stay suit for a legacy till the hearing, while there was a proceeding in Chancery between the executors for an account to ascertain assets. The same observations apply to this case as to the last; it was a very good [542] reason to stay proceedings that a suit was depending in another Court, where a question of accounts was under investigation. The decision in that case does not lead me to apprehend that this Court would in the present instance be prohibited, for it does not determine that the Ecclesiastical

(a)[2] Ex parte Jenkins, 1 B. & C. 655.

Court had no jurisdiction, only that the suit must be stayed there while the Court of Equity is proceeding in it for another purpose.

There are two cases in Price's Reports: The Attorney General v. Lady Louisa Manners (1 Price, 411), and Hill v. Atkinson (3 Price, 399). The question in both was whether money paid into the bank in trust for legatees was liable to the legacy duty and to what duty. There was no question of jurisdiction or injunction; they bear very remotely, if at all, on the present question: if at all, they bear adversely on this protest; for it was not held that the money was appropriated. The latter case is also reported in Merivale (2 Meriv. 54), and upon dismissing the petition (which was merely as to the payment of the legacy duty) the Lord Chancellor observed: "In the case of The Attorney General v. Lady Louisa Manners it was the opinion of the Barons that an executor, who is also a trustee, shifting a legacy from his hands as executor into his hands as trustee, does not thereby appropriate the legacy." So that merely investing in the funds, according to the opinion of the Ba-[543]-rons of the Exchequer, does not alter the character; but if paid into Court under a decree, and the trusts declared (this is the distinction), it would be an appropriation. That case goes thus far; that where there is a double character of executor and trustee, an investment under an interference of the Court is an appropriation: but in neither, as I have said, was there any question discussed as to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction.

The more direct and most important case is an Anonymous case, before Lord Hardwicke in 1738, reported in Atkyns (1 Atk. 491). It is expressly under the head "Injunction:" in which the counsel for the plaintiff, in shewing cause why an injunction should not be dissolved, relied on the case of Knight v. Clark, cited in Noel v. Robinson (1 Vern. 93), where the Lord Chancellor (Nottingham) said, "There was a difference between a suit for a legacy in the Spiritual Court and in this Court; if in the Spiritual Court they would compel an executor to pay a legacy without security to refund, there shall go a prohibition." The ground there is, then, that the Spiritual Court would not require any security for refunding, which in those days the Courts of Equity did. "Lord Hardwicke continued the injunction till the hearing, because the plaintiff is an executor in trust only, for where there is a trust, or any thing in the nature of a trust, notwithstanding the Ecclesiastical Court have an original jurisdiction in le-[544]-gacies, yet this Court will grant an injunction, trusts being only proper for the cognizance of this Court." Now if this meant that an injunction would be granted wherever the executor, though not expressly appointed a trustee, yet in effect was acting in trust for the legatees, this would tend to destroy the jurisdiction of this Court in all questions of legacy. But the Lord Chancellor proceeds: "Since the case in Vernon the rule is now varied, for legatees are not obliged to give security to refund upon a deficiency of assets." The rule, therefore, in a Court of Equity does not vary from the rule of this court in that respect. The reporter adds, "His Lordship mentioned a case where an infant was entitled to a legacy upon her marrying; the husband instituted a suit in the Ecclesiastical Court for it, which he might do, but upon the executors bringing a bill, and suggesting this matter to the Court, an injunction was continued to the hearing." In that case there was a ground for the injunction, because this Court could not compel the husband to make a provision suitable to the rights of the wife, and it was therefore necessary to resort to the Court of Chancery.

This is the whole of the case, and it leads to these results: that where there is a trust, or where the Ecclesiastical Courts cannot do justice, as happened while the demand for security to refund was the practice of the Courts of Equity, or where a married woman is to be protected, or where there are proceedings in account to ascertain assets, or where there is [545] any thing in the nature of a trust to be executed; an injunction will go—but not, as I understand, where there is the bare duty of an executor to perform—to pay legacies: for that would in all cases give an exclusive and not a mere concurrent jurisdiction.

In the present case, in my view, the simple duty of executor remains to pay the legacy. there is no longer any trust but that which belongs to all executorships. I have considerable doubts whether any Court of Equity would enjoin, and perhaps have reason to think that they would not. Times are changed—a more liberal and enlightened view of questions of jurisdiction is taken: on the one hand, these Courts have no disposition to encroach—ampliare jurisdictionem; on the other hand, Temporal Courts have no jealousy—no wish to resort to fictions and to technicalities:

they look (where not bound by former decisions directly in point) to the real substance and sound sense of the question—to that which is really most beneficial to the suitors —the public—and subjects of the country. There is quite as much business in all Courts as, under the increase of wealth and population, the institutions are able to discharge. The original jurisdiction in cases of legacy, to enforce payment and to compel executors to perform their duty, was in these Courts: Temporal Courts, however, interposed by injunction or prohibition when those Courts were already in possession of the cause, or when the powers of the Ecclesiastical Judge were defective or insufficient: but I find no [546] case in which Temporal Courts have stopped these Courts where no trust was existing (beyond the mere technical trust of executorship) which remained to be executed, where no legatee was to be protected by any special power, where a Court of Equity had not already been resorted to and was not in possession of the case.

The present case, as far as appears and is stated in the protest, is a mere subtraction of legacy—is a suit simply to enforce payment. The party who applies may have reasons for resorting to this jurisdiction—by the very fact of his suing here it must be presumed that he conceives it would be a more convenient and beneficial jurisdiction for him: whether he judges rightly it is not for this Court to decide; nor, unless it clearly appeared that the Court had no jurisdiction, has it any right to refuse to entertain the suit; it would be a denial of justice.

Thinking, then, that at least it is a matter of doubt whether Temporal Courts would stop this suit by injunction, I hold it proper to over-rule the protest. At the same time I should much regret misleading the parties and involving them in unnecessary expence, by taking an erroneous view of the subject through an insufficient acquaintance with the rules of a Court of Equity. I should therefore strongly recommend to the party who institutes the present proceeding (being now possessed of the view taken by this Court) to resort to the best advice he can respecting the rules of Courts of Equity. If under [547] that advice he should be satisfied that an injunction would be granted, he may immediately declare that he proceeds no further in this Court.

In respect to costs, it seems proper to reserve that consideration till the cause is finally disposed of.

Protest over-ruled.

[548] IN THE GOODS OF WILLIAM CRINGAN. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 1st Session, 1828.—A person dying in Scotland having by his will directed that the legatees should appoint two persons to execute his testamentary bequests, probate granted to the nominees as executors.

On motion.

The deceased, late a surgeon of H.M. Twenty-fifth Regiment, died in Scotland in January, 1828. By his will, dated "Antwerp 1st June, 1815," he bequeathed to his mother the interest of all his money for life; and at her death he gave to each of his brothers £100, and to each of his sisters £200: the remainder of his property he directed to be equally divided among his brothers and sisters and their lawful heirs. The deceased appointed no executor nor residuary legatee; but the last direction of the will was in these terms:—

"It is left to the Legatees mutually to appoint two intelligent and trust worthy persons to execute this deed, and I would earnestly recommend the money to be either placed in the English stocks or lent on good landed security with a guarantee for the regular payment of the interest."

The deceased left a mother, three brothers [549] and three sisters; all of whom (with the exception of two of the brothers in Canada) had, by their proxy, appointed "Thomas Hutchinson of Terswaldsmains, near Dumfries, and John Halliday of Sanquahar, merchant, to act as executors under the will of William Cringan, and to take probate thereof." The substitution of these persons, it appeared, had been admitted by the Court at Dumfries upon the appointment, solely, of the brothers and sisters in Scotland.

The property in this country was a sum under £200 due to the deceased for pay.

Addams moved for probate to the executors substituted by the majority of legatees.

Per Curiam. The provision in this will, as to the appointment of executors, I am informed, is not very unusual in Scotland; and had the Commissary Court at Dumfries, which has allowed the substitution, decreed probate, I should have had nothing to do but to follow the grant on the production of an exemplified copy. However, understanding from the deputy-registrar that instances have frequently occurred of granting probate to persons nominated by those authorized by the testator so to nominate, I shall allow this decree to pass as prayed.

Motion granted.

[550] In the Goods of William Holder Jerram. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 1st Session, 1828.—Probate, in common form, of a paper with an attestation clause and no witness, decreed to the only person entitled under an intestacy, on affidavit of recognitions of it, as his will, by the deceased.

On motion.

The deceased died on the 27th of March, 1828, a bachelor. His will, written very fairly with his own hand, was dated on the 20th of January, 1825, and signed; but below the signature was the word "witness."

From a joint affidavit made by a brother and sister of the deceased it appeared that in January, 1827, the deceased informed his brother that his will was in a secret drawer of his writing-desk, which he then shewed him how to open, in case of his death; and having produced his will, he replaced it. It further appeared that about a fortnight prior to his death the deceased told his sister "he had made his will;" and that on the day after his death it was found by her in the secret drawer of his writing-desk. The deceased's father, who was also an executor, had been sworn to administer the effects under this will; and Dodson now moved that probate might pass in common form.

Per Curiam. The circumstances in this case fully rebut the presumption of law; and the father, the only person entitled under an intestacy, has been sworn as executor of the will.

Motion granted.

[551] In the Goods of Elizabeth Wenlock. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 1st Session, 1828.—A paper manifestly unfinished and imperfect cannot be proved on mere affidavits of finding, hand-writing, and the non-existence of any other testamentary paper.

On motion.

Elizabeth Wenlock, late of Brightlingsea, near Colchester, died on the 27th of March, 1828, a widow, leaving three nieces and two nephews, her next of kin, and the persons entitled to her personal estate in case she should be pronounced to have died intestate. These parties (if alive) were stated to be in obscure stations, and the whole of the deceased's property was of the value of £120.

At her death was found a paper, beginning thus—"This is the last will and testament of me Elizabeth Wenlock:" it concluded with appointing her cousin, Mrs. Hodder, of London, and Mr. Root, schoolmaster of Brightlingsea, "to be my whole executrix and executor of this my last will and testament, in consideration of which I beg his acceptance of five pounds." This paper was in the deceased's hand-writing; but it was not signed, nor dated; and there was no residuary clause: it was, however, stated to contain an entire disposition of her property. Mrs. Hodder was duly sworn as executrix: and [552] probate was applied for in the Prerogative Office, on an affidavit that the paper was in the hand-writing of the deceased. When the probate was presented for the signature of the deputy-registrar he directed an affidavit to the effect that no other paper of the deceased's of a testamentary import had been found.

William Root of Brightlingsea, schoolmaster, and Mrs. Hodder, the executors under the paper in question, accordingly made an affidavit, from which it appeared that, on the 21st of December, 1827, the deceased left with Root the said paper, and requested him to prepare from it a more formal will, which he did; that on the 13th of March, 1828, the deceased told Root that "as her father had recently died, she could not execute the will in the form it then stood; nor until she had ascertained what property she really had to dispose of;" that upon this occasion Root gave the will he had prepared to the deceased; after which he never saw, nor heard from, her; that upon her death this instrument prepared as a will was found among the deceased's papers, but probate of it had not been asked, "because they believed that the deceased intended the paper which she delivered to Root should operate and take effect as her last will and testament in case of her death without executing one of a more formal nature."

Dodson now moved for probate of the paper in the hand-writing of the deceased.

[553] Per Curiam. This motion certainly affects me with some degree of surprise and alarm on account of the irregularity of the proceedings. The deceased died on the 27th of March, 1828. A paper is brought to be proved which, on the face of it, is unfinished, and more like a draft than a will. It has no concluding words, no date, no signature; and yet that paper is carried to the Prerogative Office for the purpose of probate in common form. This must have been done by a mere clerk, it could not have been by the proctor himself, an experienced practitioner.(a) But the Court is sorry to find that even a clerk should be so ignorant as not to know such a paper could not pass in common form, on a mere affidavit of hand-writing. What appears more extraordinary is that the clerk of the seat considered the probate of this instrument as a regular grant. I should wish to be informed who was the clerk of that seat; he ought to have known better; or if he was not better instructed, he should have carried the paper to the acting deputy-registrar, and requested his instructions thereon; but no such thing; it is laid before the deputy-registrar for his signature as a perfectly regular document. Fortunately, when [554] papers are carried to the deputy-registrars for their signatures, they are very exact in looking to the nature of the grant, and on the present occasion the imperfect state of the paper was discovered.

It is, however, a serious hardship that all responsibility should rest on them, for in a great press of business it is possible that an irregular probate might inadvertently pass them unnoticed; but it is hardly possible such a thing should occur if the public had, as they are entitled to have, a guarantee for the regularity of the grant in the careful examination of the proctor in the first instance; of the clerk of the seat in the second; and, ultimately, of the deputy-registrar.

It is stated that the deputy-registrar merely directed an affidavit as to the finding of the paper; this must, I think, have been a misapprehension, even from the face of the instrument itself, which is unsigned, undated, unconcluded, and appoints no residuary legatee. What now turns out to be the case upon the affidavit? that it was only a draft which was carried to Mr. Root to enable him to prepare a regular will. He, at the time, suggests an alteration, which is acceded to by the deceased; and Root prepares the will for execution. The matter, however, does not rest here: the deceased comes again, says, "No, I cannot execute this will in its present form; my father is lately dead; I must sell out some stock to pay his funeral expences and some debts; I don't know what property may re-[555]-main:" she then takes the will away with her, and leaves the draft; so that it appears probate of this paper, abandoned by the deceased, was on the point of passing in an ordinary way. This, of itself, is sufficient to excite considerable alarm; and still more so when I look to the statement that there are several next of kin—persons in very low and obscure stations of life—who, though they are the parties legally entitled to take the property, yet have not been informed of these applications for probate. Every practitioner here must be aware that an unfinished paper cannot take effect on a mere affidavit as to finding and hand-writing. If no other paper exist, that fact alone will not render such an instrument as this valid without some circumstances accounting for its imperfection, and without first citing the next of kin. It is then quite impossible that this motion can be granted; and I direct that inquiry may be made who was the clerk of the seat that would have allowed the probate to pass; and that he may be desired to act with greater caution for the future.

Motion refused.

(a) The proctor stated that he was, at the time, absent from town: and in an answer to a remark of the Court as to the motion being still persisted in, replied, that it was done partly to satisfy his client, who, as executrix, had been at expence respecting the funeral; and partly to afford himself an opportunity of explaining the matter to the Court: but that he had no hope that the Court would grant the motion.

[556] YOUNG, OTHERWISE MEARING v. BROWN. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 1st Session, 1828.—A testator, while at variance with his relations, having made a will in favour of a stranger in blood, being afterwards reconciled to his family, and his full capacity down to his death being admitted; a subsequent will in favour of his family (produced shortly after his death from the custody of the drawer, who took nothing under it, nor was acquainted with those benefited by it; the factum whereof, though occurring in secret and in a strange manner, was proved by the drawer and two unimpeached witnesses) pronounced for; and the executor of the former will condemned in £20 nomine expensarum, he having directly alleged the second will to be a forgery; but succeeded in shewing the drawer to be of doubtful character.—Dissimilitude of handwriting is very weak and deceptive evidence, and of slight weight only against evidence of similitude; but against positive evidence of witnesses attesting and deposing to a signature, as actually made in their presence, it can scarcely have any effect.

This case was argued by Phillimore and Addams for Mr. Young, and by Lushington and Dodson contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The evidence in this suit is sufficient to satisfy my mind. It is not a case involving a variety of circumstances inferring doubtful capacity, nor circumstances from which mere fraudulent circumvention is to be presumed; but it turns on a plain broad fact whether the instrument was executed by the deceased, or is an absolute fabrication and forgery. The case assumed that shape from its very commencement; for when the instrument was propounded in the condidit, the first article of the allegation opposing it contained a direct averment that the paper was not signed by the deceased, nor was his act, though it was admitted that at the time of the date he was of perfect capacity.

The history of the party and of the transaction may bear materially on the probability whether it was or was not his own act.

[557] The deceased's name was James Brown Unwin, and he died suddenly of apoplexy on the 20th of July, 1827, though seized two days before with cholera morbus; he was the only child of Walford and Elizabeth Unwin, and having been born in 1787 or 1788, was about 40 years of age: his mother's sister married one Kings, a coachmaker, and the two sisters afterwards lived together with their husbands in Duke Street, Bishopsgate; but Kings, for the last five years, resided in Southampton Street, Pentonville. About 1796 Richard Salter Young, then an infant of eighteen months (whose child he was does not appear), was placed at nurse with Mrs. Unwin; he was seven or eight years younger than the deceased, was brought up as one of the family, called Mr. and Mrs. Unwin father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. Kings' uncle and aunt; he and the deceased called each other brother, and they went to the same school. The deceased was afterwards apprenticed to Messrs. Savage and Taylor, apothecaries in Bishopsgate Street, and when out of his time was, principally by the assistance of Mrs. Kings, set up in business first in Widegate Street, Bishopsgate, from whence he removed to Bethnal Green Road: he took this brother, if so I may call him, to assist in his shop, not as an errand boy, as Brown pleads (though when the errand boy was absent he did occasionally carry home medicines), but in compounding drugs and in the ordinary business of an apothecary's shop. The deceased married a wife rather of an unfortunate temper; she brought about a [558] quarrel between the deceased and all his family, and having also taken a dislike to this lad, he and the deceased were at length forced to part; the immediate complaint of the wife seems to have been, that in weighing out three pennyworth of senna he had given too much weight: but it clearly results from the evidence that the separation took place, not on account of the misconduct of Young, not from an alienation of the deceased's regard, but owing to the influence of the wife. In consequence, about 1811, Young took to a seafaring life—went first as a surgeon, then engaged in the Mediterranean trade, and is now master of a vessel. The deceased continued on ill terms with his own family, and on that account Young's only communication, when in England, was with the father and mother and the Kings, and for fourteen or fifteen years or longer he had no intercourse with the deceased.

While matters were in this state the deceased, alienated from his own family through the wife, made two wills. The first, dated on the 28th of September, 1814, is all in his own handwriting and attested by three witnesses: it gives nothing to any part of his own family, but leaves every thing to his wife, and appoints her the sole executrix. The second, dated on the 10th of February, 1819, gives to his wife the furniture, &c. absolutely, and every thing else for life, with remainder to John Brown, son of the Rev. William Brown; and appoints his wife and William Brown executors. Thus his wife and his friend Brown's family are alone bene-[559]-fited by the will of 1819; his own family and all his other friends are excluded, and that will was deposited with Brown. As executor of this will of 1819, under which his son is solely benefited (for the wife is dead), Brown now opposes a later will—the will in question in this cause.

Subsequent to the will of 1819 a material change of circumstances took place. The deceased's wife died about three years before him, and his mother appears to have died still earlier: his father, Walford Unwin, an old man of 74, who had lived with the Kings, and was entirely supported by them till the death of the deceased's wife, was, on that event, very naturally and very properly taken to reside with the deceased: the latter had quitted business, had agreed for the purchase of a cottage at Warminster, and was preparing to go and reside there.

That he should therefore continue to adhere to this will of 1819, giving every thing to John Brown, and leaving his own father wholly unprovided for, now that his wife was dead and his father had been taken to reside with him and was wholly dependent upon him, was not only extremely unnatural and improper, but highly improbable. In addition, he had taken offence at William Brown; he mentioned to some of his friends that Brown had insinuated that an improper intimacy existed between him and his housekeeper: he was much hurt; he felt it as an insult: and though this breach appeared in a short time to be made up, and though they were again outwardly friends, yet he said "he [560] should not forget it"—it rankled in his bosom: the way in which he mentioned it to Pocock, who was a gardener and saw him frequently, is this:

On the sixth article "the deponent says that the deceased and the articulate William Brown used to be very intimate; they were of the same party in parish disputes; but about four months or so before the deceased died there was a question in the parish about the appointment of a mistress to the workhouse, on which they took opposite sides, and a quarrel followed. Deceased told deponent that Brown, in the course of the dispute, had insinuated something improper about him and his housekeeper, which he could not stomach, and that he never would forgive him so long as he lived; that he ought not to have used him so; he had been such a friend to him. Deponent told deceased they should forget their disputes as soon as they left the vestry; but deceased said 'it was quite impossible; Brown had hurt him here, pointing to his breast, and he never could forgive him.' Before this deceased used to talk with deponent about William Brown as one of his friends."

Now though the deceased does here express himself so strongly, yet their differences were partly reconciled; still, however, he thus mentions the subject to Bigg:

"The deceased was giving deponent an account of what had passed at the vestry, and the deceased said, 'Bigg, Brown has injured me, and I won't forgive him; he has insinuated [561] that I and my servant maid are thick together.' The deceased was very much excited at the time, and in a great passion; but deponent knows that deceased and Brown were reconciled after this; and very shortly too, for a few days afterwards deceased dined at Brown's house—at least he told deponent so; and deponent joked him about his having said he never would forgive Brown, and about his having made up his quarrel so soon, and the deceased said between joke and earnest, 'Ah, but I shan't forget it.'"

The plain fact is that it was a quarrel which very much hurt the deceased, who at the time was highly indignant, but as he had always acted with Brown in parish matters, he did not entirely break off nor discontinue his intercourse with him: but this quarrel had its effect. Besides this, it is in evidence that though he was anxious that young Brown should succeed well in business as an apothecary, yet he made some little complaint of his want of attention to him. Hardingham says: "The deceased used to complain that John Brown did not call upon him, and had forgotten him." So there are some symptoms of dissatisfaction with the principal legatee.

In this situation of circumstances his old friend, his quasi brother, Richard Young, who had been excluded from his society during the lifetime of his wife, was in London, and an accidental meeting took place between them in May. All their former feelings and affections seem to have revived at this meeting; they spent a [562] long evening together, smoked their pipes, took their wine freely, talked over former days, and, as is not very extraordinary, their meeting ended in intoxication. Hardingham found them smoking together in the deceased's garden, perceived they were on interesting topics, and soon retired: "The impression on the deponent's mind was that they were on the most cordial terms, and there appeared to have been an old and strong friendship between them." In continuation of this history, Pocock—who was very intimate with the deceased, had a garden ground adjoining his premises, and had allowed the deceased to open a door of communication into it for his own convenience, for he was something of a tulip fancier—states: "He remembers very well that about the latter end of May, before the deceased died, he came through deponent's garden; sat down at the door of the house and complained of a headache, and said 'he had had too much the night before; that a friend had come to see him whom he had not seen for sixteen years; that that friend (whom he called "Dick") had lived with him when he was in business; but that they had separated through the interference of his, the deceased's, wife.'" The deceased then gives him an account of the quarrel about the senna, which the witness details.

Here then is not a mere accidental meeting, but a complete renewal of their boyish attachment, though it was the only interview. The deceased and the Kings, from some difference about a money transaction, were not upon very [563] cordial terms, and did not see much of each other; but there had been no absolute quarrel. Mrs. Kings also, from knowing the deceased had some propensity to drinking, on hearing of this interview, and of the intoxication that ensued, advised Young not to go again, though several messages were sent to him from the deceased by his father. Now this renewal of the early affection, in addition to the circumstances respecting his father and the Browns, renders it not improbable that the deceased should make a new disposition, such as that contained in the will propounded.

That will is dated on the 18th of June, 1827, and bequeaths all his property to Richard Salter Young in trust to pay to his father, Walford Unwin, an annuity of £100; to his housekeeper, Hannah Turner, an annuity of £10, to whom is also left the cottage at Warminster (describing it as in Devon instead of in Wiltshire, an error to which I shall presently refer; in this cottage it appears Hannah Turner had some interest; I remark this because it shews the accuracy of information respecting the deceased's affairs); to William Gale, weaver, £50; to Charlotte Gale, his daughter, £200; the residue it gives to Young and appoints him executor; it is signed, sealed, and attested by three witnesses.

This is the will and such is the disposition it contains. Connected with the circumstances, it carries with it every presumption in its favour, and except that the mode of preparing it is rather singular, and that the person employed [564] to prepare it is, to no inconsiderable extent, attacked in credit, there would be nothing extraordinary in the case; for the time and manner of its appearance is the natural sequel of the mode of execution: but, on the other hand, the difficulty of supposing this a fabrication and forgery appears to be much greater than those objected in opposition to the will.

Plaisted, the drawer, is an old attorney, in embarrassed circumstances, and not in the most respectable practice. Witnesses have been produced against his character: five would not believe him on his oath—one of these only knew him in his youth—a second forms his opinion only on what he has heard; and some by their own shewing do not stand much higher in credit than Plaisted himself would, if their depositions were believed. On the other side, there are witnesses who entertain a favourable opinion of him—particularly Mr. Bates, a silk-weaver, who appears respectable and a man of property, and who has had some considerable experience of Plaisted's integrity. However, Plaisted is not omni exceptione major, and the Court would hear him with caution; particularly if speaking to that which was matter of opinion or which might be easily misrepresented—such as capacity, volition, or affection—but here the sole inquiry is a broad simple fact, whether the will was or was not executed at the asserted time: he says "he had a speaking acquaintance with the deceased for twenty years," and that accounts for the deceased employing him; though it has been observed that this was very singu-[565]-lar; and it has been asked, why he should not employ the vestry clerk, Brutton. If it were necessary to explain this, there are some manifest reasons: Brutton was in the constant habit of seeing Brown; it was not singular that the deceased should be unwilling to employ any person through whom it was possible that Brown might be made acquainted with the change in his testamentary intentions: but he certainly was unfortunate in his selection of an attorney, for the individual was not the most respectable.

"He had been acquainted with the deceased for about twenty years, and in the habit of conversing together. About the middle of June, 1827, he met the deceased in or near to Gracechurch Street, who, after talking on some common topics, spoke to him about his will: deponent recommended him to make it immediately, on account of the bad results he had seen from delay." There was another reason perhaps: however he thinks it a good opportunity, and he takes the deceased with him to the Temple, where he knew Mrs. Cobbett, who had the care of some chambers, and she lends him a room. Plaisted states that "as they proceeded to the Temple in a hackney coach the deceased communicated to him, verbally, the disposition he wished of his property, so that he was at once able to write it out fairly, and fit for execution;" he also says "that while he was preparing it he read over each passage; and finally the whole together, previous to the execution."

[566] This is in substance Plaisted's account of this transaction: and considering that he had passed most of the last twenty years in a gaol, and was in a state of great poverty, it is not extraordinary that he should be anxious that the job should not escape him, and that he should propose an immediate execution; and as he says he was going to the Temple on other business, that accounts for his carrying the deceased to this woman's chambers rather than to his own office in Millman Place. The chief objection is, the paper itself is so correctly written that it has not the appearance of being composed without a draft, but rather of being a fair copy; but I am not able to say that this experienced practitioner of 64 years of age might not have prepared it off hand; and if his skill was adequate to the task, his penury would urge him to get the business thus far advanced, as it would entitle him to his fee, though he states he was not paid at that time: but even admitting that the Court cannot with safety rely on Plaisted singly, what is there to shake the credit of the other two witnesses, Mrs. Cobbett and Mrs. Craddock, who heard the paper read and with Plaisted attested the execution? and if their statement cannot be gainsaid, Plaisted's evidence may be blotted out of the case. The story they tell is quite plain, and the account given of Plaisted's acquaintance with Mrs. Cobbett, of his taking the liberty of applying to do the business in these chambers, and of the circumstances that brought Craddock there, is perfectly probable and natu-[567]-ral.(a) If either of these women are not what, upon interrogatories, they represent themselves, it might have been disproved after publication.

Now Craddock particularly fixes the time in confirmation of the instrument: she says "she called on Mrs. Cobbett when she came to London occasionally: that about a fortnight before last Fairlop Fair, which is held on the first Friday in July, about twelve o'clock of the day (but of the day of the month or week she has no recollection) she called on Mrs. Cobbett at her rooms in the Temple; that after she had been there about half-an-hour, two persons—quite strangers to deponent—came to the door: one was a little man, the other was a remarkably tall stout man; [568] and she thinks the smaller was called Plaisted." She then speaks to the execution of the will.

This witness, then, fixes the period by her reference to Fairlop Fair, which will bring the time back to the 18th of June, 1827.

(a) Mrs. Cobbett deposed "that she was introduced to Plaisted about September, 1826; and that she employed him to recover a small debt; that she never saw him upon any other occasion before the latter end of June last, in the forenoon of the day, when he came with a stranger to her apartments in Fig-tree Court, and asked her if she would let him come in and do a little writing, and she allowed him to do so; that the stranger and Plaisted conversed, and the latter wrote; that after they had been so engaged about an hour and a half, Plaisted asked deponent 'if there were any clerks,' and being told, 'None in the chambers,' he asked her and Mrs. Craddock (for they were both in the room, Mrs. Craddock had called in) to witness Mr. Unwin's will, pointing to the stranger, to which they consented, and Plaisted read the will over in an audible and distinct manner." On the fourth interrogatory she said: "She is employed by Mr. Walker to wait upon him and take care of his chambers: that she has been acquainted with Mrs. Craddock about five years, who had formerly lodged with respondent; but had since her marriage lived at Stratford in Essex."

It is said however they do not identify the deceased; but what reason is there to suppose that this paper was fabricated on the 18th of June? The deceased was then in good health—only 40 years of age—yet the Court is to believe that some person who represents the deceased and not the deceased himself executes this will! Can anything be more grossly improbable? but if this is a forgery, who are the parties? how was it contrived? what evidence is there to support the charge? when completed? Plaisted has no interest under the document, no inducement to fabricate it, if so inclined, no sufficient knowledge of the party and of his connexions to invent a disposition so natural and a description so exact in all its parts—for placing Warminster in Devonshire must be through Plaisted's ignorance or oversight, and the error might have easily escaped the deceased's notice on reading it over; for it is mentioned that he held his hand up to his face and appeared depressed in spirits—a feeling which the seriousness of the occasion might naturally produce, and which would not render him very accurately attentive to mere words of description. If Plaisted was the fabricator, he must have had some instructor as well as employer—Who are they? Young did not know [569]—never saw—him. Nor is there any proof that the other parties ever knew or saw him.

But further, the two women have been separately and unexpectedly called upon by interrogatories, not put to Plaisted, to give a minute account of the person and dress of the deceased, and they quite agree in that account. The description of him is singular; in person, they state him to be remarkably large—in dress, something like a clergyman. The very object of putting these interrogatories was to contradict the witnesses, if their statement had been incorrect and false, by an exceptive allegation, and thus diversity would have been proved. None such has been offered; and I take it therefore to be a true description. I presume he was a very large man, and that he was usually dressed as these women represent; and thus the identity is established in confirmation of Plaisted. If, then, this was the deceased who executed this paper, there is an end of the question. The two women at least are not discredited, the capacity of the deceased is perfect: here then is an execution by a capable testator, and not only that, but the instrument itself contains a disposition quite natural and probable.

These three witnesses speaking positively to the fact of execution, it is in vain for Mr. Brown to resort to that weakest and most deceptive of all evidence—dissimilitude of handwriting. If such evidence may have some slight weight where the case for its affirmative proof depends on handwriting, still, against the [570] positive evidence of witnesses attesting and deposing to a signature as actually made in their presence, it can scarcely have any effect. Here are a variety of exhibits produced in the deceased's handwriting, but in many of them there is manifestly a strong dissimilitude from each other. Here are several witnesses who disbelieve the genuineness of the handwriting. Here are several intimately acquainted with the deceased's character who do not hesitate to say it is genuine. Those who disbelieve, principally rely on the signature alone, and give their reason, "because in the signature the names are at length, whereas the deceased used only to sign the initials of his Christian names." In signing his name at public meetings, or to printed cards, or the like, every person (and the deceased does so) signs in a hurry and in the shortest way: a surrogate probably signs a jurat differently from what he would subscribe a bond or a deed or his own will. The deceased's papers, too, fell into Brown's hands, and he has had an opportunity of selecting those where the initials alone occur; but witnesses prove that the deceased did sometimes sign his names at length to a lease; or the like. It does so happen that here is one document which could not be kept back—the will of 1814—and it does also happen that the signature has the Christian names written at length. Nay, further, that it has rather a peculiarity—a comma or dash between each name, exactly as the will in question; so in the second will, and in the books before me, there is the same comma be-[571]-tween the initials. This takes away almost entirely the little weight which might belong to opinion of dissimilitude, and shews that those opinions were founded upon reasons which fail in fact, and that this species of evidence is of the most fallacious description; but to this is added, in the present case, the evidence of the two women proving that the will was signed in their presence, and by the deceased; no doubt therefore can be entertained of its genuineness.

I will, further, just observe on the manner in which the will was produced. It was left in the possession of Plaisted; he probably might have two reasons for retaining it—first, he had not been paid his fee for drawing it; and, secondly, he might hope that a more formal and full will would be desired, and he might be unwilling to lose the opportunity of a second job. These would naturally operate; because I cannot lose sight of the fact that Plaisted was a needy man, and would take every care to realise whatever little profit he might have the prospect or opportunity of making. The fact that Plaisted (who had only a speaking acquaintance with the deceased and who had never seen his father, family, or Young) had the will in his possession accounts for its non-production immediately on the death; but it was produced very shortly after, and almost as soon as the other. Plaisted, on the 7th interrogatory, has committed himself as to the time of learning the deceased's death and the delivery of the will: he says "he heard of the death one Sunday (August the 19th) while dining at Bates', [572] and on the Saturday following found out Young and then saw him for the first time and delivered to him this will." He thus fixes himself on the interrogatory—and is this true or untrue? Bates corroborates him, though not exactly as to the day:

"In the beginning of August last—he thinks it was the 12th, but he is sure it was on a Sunday—Plaisted was dining with deponent, as he frequently did on a Sunday, but never on any other day; while talking after dinner, Plaisted asked deponent 'if he knew a man of the name of Unwin in his parish:' deponent said 'he had known him, but that he was then dead some weeks.' Plaisted was very much surprized; and, upon deponent's telling him that the report in the neighbourhood was that Unwin had left all his property to a Mr. Brown, Plaisted said that was not the case, for he had himself in his possession a will of the deceased, which gave his property in another way."

Now this is a full, at least a sufficient, confirmation of what was got out from Plaisted on interrogatories, when examined several months before. Plaisted having got the clue, finds out Young and the parties interested, and the will is delivered up in a manner quite natural and probable; and on this point he is thus confirmed by Mrs. Kings; for she states: "She cannot remember the precise day, but it was about three weeks after her nephew's (the deceased's) death, that Plaisted called on her in the afternoon, and asked 'where he could [573] find Mr. Mearing (the party in the cause)?' Plaisted was then quite a stranger to deponent; when he had inquired where Mearing lived, he said, 'I'll tell you what my business is with him, I have a will of a Mr. Unwin, and Richard Salter Young is the executor of it.' Deponent was much surprized at hearing him say so, and offered to accompany him to Young's lodgings."

This satisfactorily accounts for the will not being sooner produced, and repels any unfavourable inference on that score—nay, confirms in the strongest manner the truth of the earlier history and the genuineness of the transaction. It is true that at the funeral Brown read the will of 1819, but it appears from the evidence of Hardingham and William Kings, "that he was aware or expected that there was a will of a later date;" for, immediately on the death, he had made inquiries, and Gale then told him it was probable that there was such a will in existence, in consequence of the declarations of the deceased that he would take care of his father and housekeeper.

It has been asked how Brown got this information: it might have been mentioned by the deceased to Gale, his intimate friend, and so might have come round: however that may be (as I set out with remarking), the notion of fabrication is attended with such difficulties as hardly to be overcome: nothing could be more probable or less extraordinary than that he should have made this new will, and, moreover, the factum is established by direct and positive [574] evidence; I therefore pronounce for the will of June, 1827.

I have great doubt whether I should rest here. Brown, the executor of a former will, does not stand on the exact footing of a next of kin, who has by law a right to the succession unless the deceased has directed his property should go in a different course: but Mr. Brown's interest is derived alone from the act of the deceased, and, if deprived at all, he is deprived of that which the deceased no longer intended him to possess: Brown never, after the wife's death, and the consequent renewal of affectionate intercourse, could have thought the deceased would leave his father destitute. Besides, he has made charges of fraud—I should hardly then arrive at the justice of the case if I were to allow him to escape without the payment of some costs—but as he certainly has succeeded in damnifying the character of the drawer, I shall, in pronouncing for the will of 1827, only condemn Brown in £20 nomine expensarum: this will sufficiently mark the sense of the Court.

[575] In the Goods of Samuel Harvey. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 2nd Session, 1828.—An engrossed copy of a will having been read over to, and approved by, the deceased, who intended to execute it shortly afterwards, but was prevented by death: probate in common form granted (with consent of the only person interested under an intestacy) of one of the originally engrossed sheets and of two fairly copied sheets substituted for, and (except as to some clerical errors not affecting the disposition) corresponding with, the sheets approved by the deceased.

On motion.

Dodson, upon affidavits, moved for probate of a paper, without date or signature, under the circumstances stated by the Court.

Per Curiam. Samuel Harvey died on the 4th of May, 1828, leaving a brother—the only person entitled to his estate in case of an intestacy. The deceased by his will, dated the 14th of January, 1825, after bequeathing £1000 4 per cents. to Harriet Boroman for life—then to her children—gave the residue to his brother, and appointed him an executor. Mrs. Boroman died in the deceased's lifetime, leaving ten children; and on the 8th of April, 1828, the testator took his will to his solicitor, and directed him to prepare a new one, and thereby to give—£100 to each of Mrs. Boroman's children, the residue to his brother, and to name him an executor as before. On the 16th of April he called to execute this will, when it was read over to, and fully approved of by, him: but he said he should postpone the execution of it till all the children were christened, which he would give directions to be [576] done. The execution being thus delayed, and there being in the first two sheets (for the will consisted of three sheets) several clerical errors, not affecting the disposition, and also an unnecessary clause respecting real property, of which the deceased had none, the attorney took the opportunity of having those two sheets reingrossed fair for execution. The children, it appears, were christened on the 20th of April; and the deceased died fourteen days afterwards, but without having executed the new will.

Probate is now asked of the substituted sheets, together with the remaining original sheet. In respect to these substituted sheets they would be valid as copies, for one of the original sheets is not forthcoming. The disposition of the property is clearly, in substance and effect, the same as the will of 1825; and the brother too—the only next of kin—is willing that probate shall pass. The Court, therefore, directs the grant to go to the executors of the will, without date or signature, and with the substituted sheets.

Motion granted.

[577] Williams, formerly Cook v. Goude and Bennet. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 2nd Session, 1828.—When the opinions of persons apparently intending to depose fairly are contradictory as to capacity, particularly if facts shew the deceased was occasionally capable, the Court will infer a fluctuating capacity. The will of a person in such a state, of which probate was taken out four months after the deceased's death and not called in for two years and a half, pronounced for; there being satisfactory evidence of instructions, and of capacity at the time of the factum; the disposition contained being consistent with his affections, and its variation from a will executed before his mind became impaired being accounted for by a change of circumstances.—The influence to vitiate an act must amount to force and coercion destroying free agency; and there must be proof that the act was obtained by this coercion.—A legatee performing the duty of an executor in proving a paper is entitled to his costs out of the estate.—Semble, that an executrix (the widow) who, after taking probate and acting for many months under a will, by which she takes a smaller interest than by a former will, causes the later will to be opposed by questioning the deceased's capacity, and then refuses to propound such will, is liable to be condemned personally in the costs of a substituted residuary legatee who propounds and establishes the will; and such refusal, being tantamount to renouncing, would justify the Court in revoking the probate, and decreeing the administration with the will annexed to such residuary legatee.

This case was argued at the sittings after Easter Term by the King's advocate and Dodson for Mrs. Williams: and by Lushington and Addams for Mr. Bennet.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This case presents itself to the attention of the Court rather in a peculiar shape—a shape which, at the outset, forcibly directs the Court in the view to be taken of the evidence. It may be proper to explain this peculiarity by adverting to some of the general facts before I proceed to the examination of the evidence, which more immediately regards the factum and validity of the instrument ultimately to be decided upon.

John Goude, the deceased in the cause, died on the 24th of June, 1822; he had originally been a sawyer in the dock-yard at Plymouth, and in 1792 married Margaret, now his widow, and one of the parties in this cause. He continued his trade for some time, but in addition took a public house, which was managed by his wife, whence they removed to an inn called the Cross Keys, and finally entered upon the King's Arms Inn, or Goude's Hotel, the principal inn, posting house, and coach office at Plymouth [578] dock, now called Devonport. Having some time before his removal to the latter house abandoned his trade of sawyer and assisted in conducting the business of the inns, he selected as his department at the King's Arms the posting and the coaches, seldom coming in doors, except occasionally to carry in the first dish at dinners; but the management of the internal or house concerns was left entirely to his wife, the more active partner. The deceased was a good-natured, easy, rather indolent man, who loved his joke; his wife a bustling, managing woman, and probably the profits of the business resulted in no inconsiderable degree from her exertions and care: indeed, not only the domestic management, but a full share and proportion of the domestic authority also were exercised by her. The husband had a sister married at Devonport to one Cook, the carpenter of H.M.S. "Temeraire," and this sister had three children, one of them, the present party, now Mrs. Williams. The wife also had a sister married to one Bennet, a shoemaker, residing and settled at Witney in Oxfordshire; and she had at one period seven children, but at the death of the deceased only six—one of whom, John Bennet, is a party to this suit. For some time the daughter of Mr. Cook lived at the inn as bar-maid; but in 1813, in consequence of a misunderstanding, she left the situation, and in the same year Mary Bennet, a daughter of the wife's sister, came to assist in that capacity: she fell into ill health—a decline—and in the spring of 1816 she died. It is quite clear that the deceased was very fond of her, [579] was very anxious about her health and for her recovery, and much lamented her death. In October, 1816, he adopted a nephew of his wife, Thomas Bennet, a lad of eleven or twelve years old—became fond of him, put him to school, and played with him when at home. It also appears that about this time there was a misunderstanding with the Cooks: the quarrel might be principally between the wives, but whether the husband participated in the feelings, or only acquiesced in the wishes of his wife, the fact is, there was no interchange of family kindness. The deceased might occasionally call on his sister, more especially to take leave of her when she was about to quit Devonport and go to Chatham; but there was no cordiality, nor the ordinary intercourse of affection after 1816.

In 1817, with matters in this situation—the sister's daughter having quitted her situation in 1813, no communication being kept up with the sister and her family, one of the wife's nieces having died in the deceased's house, a lad taken of whom he was fond, and, what is unequivocal, about twenty letters written by the deceased to Bennet and his family in 1815 and 1816, shewing the strongest friendship and regard for them—it is under these circumstances, I say, that the deceased sets about making his will.

The contents of that will it may be material to state. To his wife he gives £1000 absolutely, and the residue of his property for life; after her death he bequeaths the residue equally between the children of his own sister Cook, and [580] the children of his wife's sister Bennet: at that time Cook had three children, Bennet six; so that after the wife's death the Cooks had one third, the Bennets two thirds: of this will John Bone and William Glencross were trustees and executors; it is formally drawn up, regularly executed, and attested by three witnesses, another person of the name of Bone, Burnet and Hearle, of whom we shall learn more hereafter. The will, then, of 1817 (the validity of which is acknowledged) is very favourable to the wife and to her family: and though it does not cut off the sister's family, yet it gives no interest nor benefit to the sister herself, not even a slight legacy as a mark of affection.

Attached to this will is a sort of codicil or direction in the deceased's own handwriting, signed, and attested by four witnesses; and the executors are those of the will. It is in these words:—

"Plymouth Dock, 11th May, 1819.

"This is to certify that neither brother or sister nephew or niece or any other person shall enter these or any other premises where my wife Mary Goude shall reside, or call her to account for any property or demand any keys or any other thing I shall leave after my decease. After my wife's decease my will to be acted up to by my friends Messrs. Bone and Glencross."

This codicil, written before the capacity of the deceased is attempted to be impeached, shews his great affection for and confidence in his wife, how anxious he was for her comfort and [581] gratification, and that she should not be disturbed in the enjoyment of the property; and whatever may have been her influence over the testator, it is not suggested that it was of a nature to vitiate the act: indeed, it would be extraordinary if the influence of affection and of warm attachment is to take away the power of benefiting the object of that regard. The influence to vitiate an act must amount to force and coercion destroying free agency—it must not be the influence of affection and attachment—it must not be the mere desire of gratifying the wishes of another; for that would be a very strong ground in support of a testamentary act: further, there must be proof that the act was obtained by this coercion —by importunity which could not be resisted: that it was done merely for the sake of peace, so that the motive was tantamount to force and fear. I state the principles here, though they will be more applicable to a later part of the case: but to return to the history.

Thus stood matters in May, 1819, except that in October, 1818, the deceased had taken another son of the Bennets, an elder brother, John Bennet (the present party in the cause), to assist him in his business. In the beginning of June, 1819, the deceased had an attack of apoplexy: medical attendance was called in on the second of June, but it was not required after the 22nd. The effects of that attack must be examined more particularly hereafter, but it is proved that before the end of June he was so far recovered that he attended a meeting of coach contractors at Bath, and appeared quite [582] restored, at least in mind. Between that time and his death he went from home to various places, for we find him in London, in Sussex, in Cornwall, frequently on visits at Exeter to his friend Church, a witness produced by Cook, on a visit to his friends at Witney and Woodstock in October, 1820, in March, 1821, and in September, 1821; in October, 1820, accompanied by his nephew Thomas, who took this opportunity of seeing his own family for the first time since he went to Devonport in 1816; in September, 1821, accompanied by his other nephew, John, who was in ill health and went for a change of air; but in March, 1821, alone and unattended. These excursions were natural and beneficial to a person who had been once attacked by apoplexy; especially as these young men, the Bennets, were very steady, assisting him, when at home, in that department of the business which he himself conducted, and taking charge of it during his absence.

Here are various acts done respecting his property, various transactions of business both for himself and others; in October, 1819, he executed conveyances and signed drafts for the purchase of certain dwelling houses in Princes Street, Devonport; about the same time, October or November, 1819, he became a trustee of Jackson's marriage settlement, and that upon the particular application of the parties; in 1821 he gave his consent as surviving trustee to an alteration in the property, and went himself over to Exeter and to Budleigh in June or July to transact in that character the necessary business; he continued to attend coach con-[583]-tract meetings, to correspond, to sign returns and warrants; but—a still more material fact, because it bears a testamentary intention—he contracted to rebuild his inn: the contract was entered into in February, 1821—the work was set about immediately—the first stone was laid about April, 1821—the work was going on during the summer of 1821, and in February, 1822, he executed a power of attorney to sell stock for the purpose of meeting the expences of this building. His ordinary habits, so far at least as his body was concerned, were the same as before his apoplectic attack—he was about the stables and the coach offices, and went occasionally over to Torpoint, where he also kept carriages and horses to expedite the mail; how far his mind was equal to give directions, or how far these acts were indicative of capacity, I will presently consider.

So again, as a commissioner for paving and lighting the town, he continued his habit of attending the meetings as before—but his speech had become rather thick and he was, at least occasionally, heavy and dull—so that he took no part in the discussion and might have made blunders in balloting—at present, however, I am only noticing the fact of his attending. So likewise in respect to public worship, he continued his habit of going there and attended on Sunday the 24th of June, 1822—the very day of the second fit of apoplexy, which proved fatal. All these facts are incontrovertible: the state of his mental faculties and his testamentary capacity will be the chief subject of the remaining inquiry; but I [584] must first state the further testamentary instruments and the subsequent proceedings.

Here is a paper before the Court, dated on the 7th of June, 1822, in the handwriting of one of the nephews, but subscribed by the deceased:—

"King's Arms Hotel Plymouth Dock
"7 June, 1822.

"I hereby give and bequeath to Thomas and John Bennet (the offspring of William and Sarah Bennet of Witney Oxon) after the decease of my wife Mary Goude the inn and premises in which I now live, with the furniture, plate, carriages, horses and every other thing contained therein and belonging thereto, as also the carriages horses, &c. at Torpoint and elsewhere. Also the houses, 6 and 7, in Princes Street with the stables and premises at the back. Likewise the coach house and premises over the coach house in Princes Street and every thing thereto belonging."

The signature is, as before observed, by the deceased, and primâ facie the paper is his act, but it is not attested. Here is another paper originally of the same date, all in the deceased's handwriting, first signed on the 7th, but again signed and attested on the 11th of June: in substance this paper is the same as the one I have just read, but the commencement is different. It begins: "I Francis Goude do here-[585]-by give, &c." and at the end there is this clause:

"Signed by Francis Goude this eleventh day of June in the presence of William Glencross and G. W. Hearle."

Looking at the paper itself, without the evidence of the subsequent attestation, there are strong marks that it is the act of a free and capable testator, for it is his own handwriting—an easy running hand. It is stated that the wife declared this paper was written by the dictation of the nephew, word by word and letter by letter: Foot, an attorney at Devonport, thus deposes on the 11th article:

"On the 27th of December, 1823, Mrs. Goude unexpectedly called at his office, and told him she heard that deponent had been taking examinations as to the state of the deceased's capacity for the purpose of setting aside the will now in question on behalf of the Cooks, and that she was anxious to inform him in what manner 'the wills were prepared.' Mrs. Goude, referring herself to the paper in the handwriting of the deceased bearing date the 7th of June, 1822, said that Thomas Bennet drew up a paper (of which that of the 7th of June is a transcript) and submitted it to her for her approbation: that it being thought right by her and the two Bennets that the paper should appear to be in the deceased's own handwriting, she and the two Bennets took an opportunity in private of getting the deceased to transcribe it: she said that Thomas Bennet stood over the deceased, who [586] was sitting at a table, and dictated each word and the letters contained in each word to the deceased one by one; spelling the word for him and telling what letter to put next, and the deceased did so as he was desired, but it was accomplished with great difficulty."

Now this is the account that Mrs. Goude gave to Foot at the latter end of 1823: it is no evidence of the fact as against Bennet, more especially considering the time and circumstances under which that declaration was made, because it was at a time and under circumstances when she had an inducement and an interest so to declare; but the instrument itself falsifies the declaration: not only is it not an exact copy of the other paper—not only are the words and expressions in some places varied, but the writing itself is so free and continuous—so manifestly written, as it is termed, currente calamo, that it is quite incredible it could have been written by an imbecile and unwilling person, having the letters dictated to him letter by letter—being unable to copy on account of his idiotcy and fatuity, it is manifestly the writing of one possessing at least a certain degree of intelligence; and this story of the wife's is therefore in my judgment utterly false.

Passing by then for the present the evidence of the execution and attestation of this paper of the 11th of June, I will proceed to state the substance of the instrument now propounded. It is dated on the 14th of June, 1822, formally drawn on two sheets of paper, signed, sealed, and attested by two witnesses; it gives the [587] whole of his property to his wife for life—but for life only: the £1000 given absolutely to her by the will of 1817 is omitted, and therefore this instrument is so far less beneficial to her: it is an absolute loss to her of this sum—at her death it gives to his two nephews and his niece the Cooks £100 each—to William, Francis, and Charles Bennet £100 each, and to Sarah Ann Bennet £200; it bequeaths the residue to John and Thomas Bennet, and on the death of either of them without issue to the survivor; if both die without issue then to the other four Bennets; so that though the whole residue after the wife's death is to go to the Bennet family, yet the two nephews, John and Thomas, are selected for a much larger interest than the other four Bennets. Mrs. Goude, William Glencross, and John Bone are the executors of this will.

These are the contents, and the deceased died by a fit of apoplexy on the 24th of June, ten days after. Mr. John Bone, the executor, states on interrogatory, that on the day of the funeral "he read the will aloud in the presence of the party that had attended the funeral: he did not hear any remark or observation made on such occasion which expressed or indicated a doubt that the testator was not competent to make the said will at the period at which the same bears date:" this is not an immaterial fact in the cause.

On the 15th of October, 1822, Mrs. Goude was sworn as executrix, a power of being joined in the probate being reserved to the other two executors. On the 8th of March, 1823, about six [588] months afterwards, the two other executors renounced. Now I do not know in what way that renunciation was given; if in person, they must have sworn that they believed it to be the will of the deceased; if by proxy, then the proxy, unless specially framed, must have recited that it was the deceased's will.(a) So that after this renunciation Mrs. Goude became sole acting executrix of this will; she continued acting under it without any question being suggested till the latter end of that year, 1823, when either on some disagreement between her and the nephews, or on her attempting to sell money out of the funds too freely, a distringas was taken out to restrain her: then it was that Mrs. Goude found out that this will was good for nothing, that the deceased was incapable, and that it would be advisable to revert to the will of 1817, with the codicil of 1819, which were more beneficial to herself. The question whether the deceased possessed testamentary capacity or not, now became a subject of public discussion at Devonport, and on the 27th of December, 1823, Mrs. Goude paid the unexpected visit to Mr. Foot (who as a solicitor had taken up the cause of Cook—an old servant of his), represented to him the incapacity of the deceased, and told him the story about Thomas Bennet's dictating each word and each letter in the paper of the 11th of June, as already stated.

Still however the matter was not actively followed up: these parties did not feel their [589] courage and their sense of the justice of their case sufficiently strong to commence the suit; so that the probate was not called in till the spring of 1825, and then the wife brought it in, but refused to propound the will, though she had been sworn to and acted under it for two years and a half: Bennet, therefore, as the substituted residuary legatee, was obliged to propound it, and Cook (now Mrs. Williams), as the substituted residuary legatee of the will of 1817, opposed it. The suit—a very long and a very expensive suit—proceeded; and sixty witnesses have been examined, some at Devonport, and some (brought up on purpose) in London.

Before the first witness was examined three years and a half had elapsed since the death of the testator, and during a great part of that time this will and the capacity of the deceased had been a common topic of discussion at Devonport: here then is the explanation of what I meant by the peculiar shape in which the case presented itself for considering the evidence. Where a length of time has been suffered to elapse, witnesses even to facts will be inaccurate, and the Court must be prepared for variations in the relation of circumstances by the most credible and the most respectable, but what is the Court to expect upon matters not of fact, but of opinion, when parties have enlisted themselves as it were on one side or on the other? This case is peculiarly open to this inconvenience. In all cases of opinion as to capacity the Court invariably finds conflicting evidence; the person is seen at different times and under different circumstances: but on the pre-[590]-sent occasion the deceased's state of health would more especially lead to contradictory evidence. The very nature of an apoplectic habit is to produce fluctuation; it is a tendency of blood to flow to the head, necessarily affecting the brain and inducing lethargy. Cold, indigestion, fatigue, and various other causes will increase its operation and produce a more than usual dullness and stupor. Art, and sometimes Nature alone, will afford relief: bleeding, cupping, leeches, medicine, will restore activity to the brain; and it appears that in this case recourse was had to such and similar remedies. Lunn deposes thus: "One evening, a moonlight night in October next preceding his death, the deceased was standing at his inn door, when deponent, passing by, asked him how he did? deceased for a few seconds did not recollect him: at last he said, 'Is that Bill?' and in a silly half-witted manner" [that is his construction], "without other preface, said, 'They tell me I'm to be cupped to-morrow.'" If then, on a moonlight night, the deceased did not know Lunn, yet he remembers that he is to be cupped. Another witness, Bone, says: "After deponent ceased to attend, Mrs. Goude used herself to insist upon the deceased submitting to have a blister applied or to be bled with leeches."

These remedies would not have been resorted to unless they had afforded temporary relief and rendered the deceased different at different times; and almost all the witnesses describe him as subject to great fluctuation; sometimes he was dull and stupid, and hardly knew what [591] was going on, especially if there was nothing to excite him, as when he attended the commitees, at other times he was lively and boyish, sparring and playing at cudgels with this lad, Thomas Bennet, of whom he was so fond; sometimes he played his game at whist well, at other times he revoked frequently in the course of the evening: hence I am satisfied that the condition of the deceased varied materially.

There are a multitude of witnesses examined on each side to the article as to capacity—above twenty: there could be no difficulty in obtaining any number, for the deceased was the master of the great inn of the town, was constantly about the stables and coach office, and was living as it were under the public eye: but what does that very fact infer? that he was not in a constant state of stupor and imbecility. A great number of the witnesses however describe the deceased as being in a state of absolute fatuity and idiotcy; others assert that his mind was not at all deteriorated; others again take a middle course. Where opinions are so contrary, and there is no reason to suppose that they are not sincerely given, the Court can only reconcile them by supposing that his capacity fluctuated; but it may at the same time judge a little of the credit due to the different opinions, from observing how the facts are laid. Here is Cook's allegation stating a broad fact, which is either true or false. The fifth article pleads: "That in or about June, 1819, the deceased was attacked with apoplexy or some illness of that or a similar nature, so severely, that for the [592] space of about three months he was in a state of continued delirium and derangement, and being also at times violent, it was found necessary not only to watch him continually, but occasionally also to subject him to personal restraint." Again, in the tenth article: "The deceased was not at any period from and after the month of June, 1819, and more particularly during and after the winter preceding his death, of sound mind, memory, and understanding, capable of managing himself or his affairs, or of forming a judgment as to the disposition of his property by will, or of giving instructions for and making and executing his last will and testament or a codicil thereto, or of doing any testamentary act whatever."

Here then is made an assertion of actual derangement for three months, and of incapacity from that time till his death. This (if there be not some clerical error) is an assertion most directly falsified: for the attendance of the medical person ceased on the 22nd of June, and we find the deceased at Bath upon business and with his intellects quite perfect at the latter end of that month: here then is a completely false averment as to a matter of fact. Let us see again how the witnesses are carried away by their prejudices. Mr. Foot, for example, on the tenth article deposes that the deceased was for six months "quite an idiot;" and no doubt this was his sincere opinion; but on examining the grounds of his opinion the Court finds that he has literally none:

"He frequently saw the deceased in the course of the last twelvemonth of his life, and [593] within three or four months of his death, not frequently at the King's Arms, but generally out of doors, meeting him casually. Deponent commonly spoke to deceased when he met him, merely asking him 'how he did,' but not conversing with him: the deceased's memory appeared to be quite gone: from the vacancy of his look he does not believe he recognized him: the deceased, in his manner and appearance (for the last six months of his life) at the times deponent happened to see him, was quite an idiot;" and at the conclusion of his evidence on that article he says "his belief is founded on general observation of the deceased as aforesaid: he had not any opportunity of specifically determining on the powers of the deceased's mind during the time deposed of."

So that meeting this person in the street, merely from his appearance, without any opportunity of conversing with him or of ascertaining the state of his mind, Foot ventures to assert that the deceased was an idiot. This was the more incautious, for he himself has admitted that there were differences of opinion as to the testator's condition, and not, as was argued, that his imbecility was known to and believed by all Devonport. Dr. Magrath, on the 11th interrogatory, says: "As a reason for applying to respondent, Mr. Foot said that a difference of opinion had arisen respecting the capacity of the deceased."

Foot, therefore, instead of telling Magrath that he was a perfect idiot, says, as seems to be the truth of the case, there was a difference of opi-[594]-nion at Devonport: so there is in the evidence in this suit as in many others. Bone's evidence is still more extraordinary, and so utterly irreconcileable with his conduct, that I shall rely rather on the latter than on the former: he says on the fifth article: "The deceased was during the last year of his life in a state of absolute fatuity:" those are his words —yet this Mr. Bone, the medical attendant of the deceased, the executor of the will of 1817, who ought to have protected the interests of the Cooks under that will, after the funeral reads the will of 1822, makes no remark, suffers the widow to take probate, and again recognizes the validity of the latter will, by renouncing probate. It is true that the Cooks were at the time absent from Devonport, but they were natives and had long resided there, and must have had friends to apprize them of what was passing. "If the deceased were quite an idiot," as Foot represents, or in a state of "absolute fatuity," as Bone would make him—if he were incapable even for the last month (since he was about his inn-yard and the town, and at public worship as much during the last month as during the last year, his death being quite sudden from his second fit), it must have been notorious to the whole place; it must also have been notorious that his wife was committing a gross fraud: there could be no difference of opinion such as Foot mentioned to Magrath.

Without then minutely detailing the opinions of the witnesses on both sides and reasoning upon each, it is sufficient to state that here is a great conflict of opinion, which, I repeat, is no [595] novelty in such questions: some, as I have said, were of opinion that he was decidedly incapable; some, that his capacity was in no degree affected; others, that though capable, his mind was shaken: the just result is that his faculties were in a degree damaged and deteriorated, but that he was not intestable; that his capacity was so far impaired and fluctuating that the Court would require more than the mere fact of execution—would require satisfactory evidence of instructions, and proof of volition and intention.

In respect to the influence of the wife, there is little visible that would not equally apply to the will of 1817, or that was not equally in operation at both times: there was the general influence of an active, bustling, high-spirited wife over a good-natured, easy husband: in consequence of his attack it was necessary she should take a still more decided lead in the management of the concerns of the house: it was necessary she should, as a kind nurse and an affectionate wife naturally would, insist on his going to bed at his regular hour, on his not indulging too freely in liquor, on his putting on a blister or being cupped; when symptoms of a determination of blood to the head shewed themselves, it was fit she should desire he might not be contradicted nor irritated—and should encourage and press him to take little excursions from home to change the scene, and for the sake of exercise; but I can find no trace of any unfair importunity, on the part of the wife, to induce him to alter his will or to do any testamentary act. The general influence aris-[596]-ing from his affection and deference for, and from his wish, in the disposition of his property, to gratify and to please, a wife who was the principal means of acquiring that property, she undoubtedly possessed; but that, as I have already observed, will not vitiate the testamentary act; there must be proof of something amounting to force and coercion in the obtaining of the act itself.

Proceeding then toward the testamentary act itself: is there any thing in it inconsistent with the deceased's probable mind and wish? so far otherwise that the change of circumstances since the will of 1817 renders the alteration in the disposition quite natural. In 1817, though he was partial to his wife's relations, there was no particular branch of them that he should select to favour, and therefore he gives the share of the residue equally among the wife's sister's children: but now these two nephews had been with him for four years; he was very fond of them—he speaks of their conduct as being remarkably good and very steady; they assisted him greatly in the management of his concerns, and relieved him from what in his state would become irksome; he placed great confidence in them, and though he liked to be about as if occupying himself, yet it was natural that he should be pleased with these youths releasing him from a closer attention to the real burthen and labour of his business.

But the case does not rest here—and on mere inference. It is clear that he proposed to introduce these youths into the business and to make them his successors: he had already [597] allowed their names to be put on some of his carriages as a reward of their past and an encouragement of their future attention and steadiness: it is pretty clear, too, that the rebuilding of his inn was for their benefit and with a view to their succeeding to it after his wife—and this was not, as asserted, the mere act of the wife, for declarations to this effect came from the deceased himself; he had talked of retiring from business and going to reside at Witney: at his time of life and with his infirmities it was not likely that he, or his wife for him, should undertake the rebuilding of this great inn unless with a view to the interests of these young men. What, then, is the evidence on this head? it is a material part of the case in support both of capacity and of testamentary intention, and leading up to this new will.

The first witness is Ann Dawe—who was a bar-maid in the house up to 1820. She states "that Mr. Goude was always extremely fond of the two Bennets: she has many times heard the deceased talk about retiring from business: he said he should not have remained in it so long were it not that he wished the Bennets to be quite qualified to succeed him."

The next witness is Mr. Ratcliffe, a wine and spirit merchant: "The deceased was very fond of the Bennets: he was most partial to Thomas, the younger one, who was a very sharp boy: the deceased seldom moved without him: deponent has heard the deceased talk about retiring from business, and he gave it to be understood that the Bennets were to [598] succeed him: he cannot fix the time when he heard the deceased so express himself: he recollects having seen the names of both the Bennets painted on the Fly Coach which ran between Devonport and Exeter, coupled with the name of the deceased."

Isbell, a statuary, gives his evidence in these terms: "Accidentally coming to the deceased's inn about dinner time he has sometimes dined with the deceased and his wife and the two Bennets in the bar: the deceased treated John and Thomas Bennet like his own children: deponent, from general expressions used by the deceased, made up his mind that the two Bennets were to succeed the deceased in business whenever he retired."

Welch, the agent of an insurance office, thus deposes: "The deceased said he had some thoughts of pulling down the inn, and was in treaty with Mr. Coles for an adjoining house in order to have an archway, or carriage entrance to his inn. Deponent replied, 'Mr. Goude, had you not better at your time of life reflect before you enter upon such a business, especially as you have what is very handsome; and no children to provide for.' The deceased answered 'that he had nephews whom he should bring into his business.' The conversation then dropped, the deceased having in the opinion of the deponent given a very sufficient reason for undertaking the alterations proposed."

Bennet, the father of the party, though not entirely to be relied on, yet not wholly to be left out of the question, says: "The deceased was [599] very much pleased with the deponent's sons John and Thomas whilst they were with him: he always expressed himself to the deponent, both personally and by letter, as being much pleased with their steadiness and attention to his business, and used to say that it would be a nice business for them when he left it off."

A sixth witness, Mr. Waterhouse, the great coach proprietor living in Lad Lane, London, and therefore free from the party prejudices of Devonport, states: "That in or about July, 1819, the deceased, in speaking to deponent of the Bennets, described them as two nephews of his wife who were living with him, and that they were nice sharp lads, and very attentive and useful to him in his business: that on another occasion, a short period afterwards, the deceased spoke to him again of these two nephews, and of what he intended to do for them: he observed that, after taking care of his wife he had taken care, or should take care (deponent is not certain which), of her nephews."

Jackson, to whose marriage settlement he was a trustee, confirms the other witnesses: "He has repeatedly heard the deceased express his satisfaction with their conduct and attention, and say how well they conducted themselves: the deceased has mentioned to deponent that he intended to retire from business; he did not say when, but added that when he did he should leave his house and business to John and Thomas Bennet. The deceased, about the latter end of 1820 or beginning of 1821, obtained a renewal of the lease of his [600] house for the purpose of rebuilding and enlarging it; and he expressly told deponent at such time that he was doing it for the two boys."

Here then is a mass of declarations coming from the deceased himself, manifesting not only capacity, but an intention to select these two nephews as the principal objects of his bounty, and consequently to make a new disposition differing in some degree from the will of 1817, particularly as to the substituted disposition of the residue.

I come now, then, to the execution and attestation of the paper originally dated on the 7th of June, but which was again signed, and was attested on the 11th. Hearle, a bookseller, intimately acquainted with the deceased, his opposite neighbour, and one of the attesting witnesses, gives this account: "Early in June, 1822, the deponent received a message from the deceased that he wanted to speak with him: he accordingly went and found the deceased and his wife together in the bar parlour: he cannot now recollect whether Mr. Glencross was then there; if not, he came in shortly afterwards. The deceased himself produced to deponent and to Glencross a paper in deceased's own handwriting, and referring to it, said he wished deponent and Glencross to witness it: there was no other introduction of the business: the deceased then either read the paper over to them, or gave it them to read: he cannot recollect which, but he recollects the fact that, at such time, deponent knew the contents of the same. The deceased then [601] signed his name to the paper (which purported to leave his house, carriages, horses and furniture to his wife's nephews, John and Thomas Bennet), and afterwards deponent and Glencross. The deceased then requested deponent to take care of the paper, so he took it home with him, and enclosed it in an envelope and endorsed it as a codicil to the deceased's will: he so endorsed it, because in 1819 he and a Mr. Burnet witnessed the execution of a will made by the deceased, the tenor whereof he was not acquainted with, save that in the course of general conversation between the time of the execution thereof and of the paper or codicil aforesaid the deceased had several times mentioned that thereby he had left his property to his wife for life, and afterwards to his own and his wife's relations. During the time deponent and Glencross were with the deceased (as aforesaid) either deponent or Glencross recommended deceased rather to make a new will altogether, by which his intentions might be clearly ascertained, than to leave separate papers or codicils which might be contradictory to his will or one from another. No remark was at that time made in answer to such recommendation."

This is the account given by Mr. Hearle, and Mr. Glencross confirms it: "On the 11th of June, 1822, a message was brought to deponent, in consequence whereof he went over to the house of the deceased. He went into the bar parlour of the inn, and he found there (as he now best recollects and believes) the [602] deceased—his wife—the younger Bennet, and Mr. Hearle: deponent cannot recall to mind whether it was the deceased or Mrs. Goude who informed him of the business on which he had been sent for: he verily believes that the paper writing (to be deposed of) was taken —but by whom he cannot recollect—out of a bureau in the said parlour. The deponent cannot recall to mind the conversation that took place previous to the execution of the paper; but he recollects having expostulated with the deceased (and he believes on this occasion) on the subject of the disposition of the deceased's property to the prejudice of Mrs. Cook and her family; and that he also earnestly recommended the deceased to have his will drawn up by a professional man, which the deceased consented to have done, and he and Mrs. Goude authorized deponent to consult a professional gentleman on the subject: he so advised the deceased, not because he was aware there were other testamentary papers of his in existence (which he did not know), but because of the apparent informality of the paper then produced."

He says in a further part of his evidence: "The deceased on the 11th of June, 1822, was of sufficiently sound mind, memory and understanding, in the opinion and judgment of deponent, to give directions for the disposal of his property." This witness must be expected to speak cautiously, not only from the distance of time, but from the conversations at Devonport in regard to the capacity of the deceased. On a further article he says: "It [603] was either on the said 11th of June, or immediately afterwards (he rather thinks it was on the 11th of June), that he endeavoured to persuade the deceased to bequeath part of his property to Mrs. Cook and her family, who, on such occasion, gave deponent to understand 'that they had not behaved to him as they ought to have done, and they could not expect any thing from him.'" I may also notice that in the will of 1822 he does not give his sister, Mrs. Cook, even an honorary legacy, but passes her by altogether.

There are other parts of Mr. Glencross' evidence to which my attention has been called on both sides, but having considered them, I do not think they materially vary the effect of his deposition in chief.

This paper, then, of the eleventh of June and the evidence in support of it—the declarations of the deceased, at the time, of his intentions favourable to the Bennets and adverse to the Cooks—the intention also of having a more formal will prepared, are strongly introductory to the main instrument at issue: here is no appearance of any importunity or interference on the part of the wife—here is no appearance of fraud or clandestinity; Mr. Glencross was the last person to be sent for with such a view; he was the intimate friend of the deceased, the executor of the former will; he interfered in favour of the Cooks, though without success: and the facts which he states prove the deceased to have been a free and intelligent agent.

After what had passed on the 7th and 11th, [604] it was the natural and probable sequel that a formal instrument embodying the whole of the deceased's testamentary intentions should be executed. To save the expence of a lawyer, Mr. Hearle was requested to prepare a will, and he reluctantly consented. His account is: "Within a week (after the 11th of June) deponent, in passing through the inn-yard, was met by Mrs. Goude, who said 'she wanted to speak to him;' he accompanied her into the bar parlour where the deceased was: Mrs. Goude then asked deponent (no one else being present) whether he would draw up a will for the deceased according to the suggestion given them the other day; and the deceased then himself requested deponent to do so. The deponent said 'it was quite out of his line to draw wills, and as there was a good deal of property at stake, a professional man should be applied to.' Mrs. Goude replied 'that the making the last will (done by a lawyer) had cost so much money they would rather have deponent to do it;' he again declined; but the deceased and his wife again pressed him, and he at last promised to do it; deponent then asked the deceased 'how he wished to leave his property?' the deceased then answered 'that he wished his wife to have the enjoyment of the whole during her life, and at her death that it was to come to John and Thomas Bennet equally between them.'"

Now this comes entirely from the wife, and her benefit is much less under this will.

"Deponent enquired of the deceased 'who [605] he would name for his executors;' deceased asked him whether he would be one; deponent said he had rather not, but that as the deceased had appointed two very proper persons (Mr. Glencross and Mr. Bone) in his former will, he recommended him to name them again; the deceased said 'they should be his executors jointly with Mrs. Goude;' and upon deponent's asking him why he had not named his own relations, he answered 'that they had had enough already, and that they were not upon terms;' the deceased said he would leave £100 to each of his sister's children, which legacy to Margaret Cook, one of said children, at the suggestion of Mrs. Goude and the deponent, the deceased said he would increase to £200."

This certainly is a mistake of the witness, because only £100 is left to this Margaret Cook: there is £200 left to Sarah Bennet, which may account for his misrecollection. It removes one observation as to the influence of Mrs. Goude; but, at all events, is not sufficient to affect the credit of the witness. Hearle returns to his shop to prepare the will, in the course of which he is backwards and forwards communicating with the deceased. Thus, "finding the deceased had not provided against the lapse of the interest, deponent went over to inquire how, in case of the death of the Bennets, or of Mrs. Cook's children, their shares were to be disposed of. The deceased said, 'What was left to the two Bennets should go to the survivor in case of either dying in his [606] wife's life-time:' deponent asked, 'What if the one so dying should have married and left issue;' deceased answered 'that such issue should have the father's share, and that if both Bennets died in his wife's life-time, then what he had left them should go to the rest of the Bennet family:' the deceased at the same time said 'that the legacies left to Mrs. Cook's children should, in case of any of their deaths, come back to his estate; that is, should lapse.' Deponent cannot be certain during what part of the foregoing conversation (which all took place within three or four hours in the afternoon) Mrs. Goude was present: she was continually in and out, and when she was not there, deponent was the only person with the deceased. Two or three times John and Thomas Bennet came in, but they were by the deceased immediately ordered to leave the room. In the course of the same evening and following morning the deponent (with the assistance of a book which contained forms of wills) drew up, from his own memoranda of the instructions, the will; and after breakfast took it to the deceased, who, with his wife, together looked over the same, and both declared 'it was the very thing they wanted.'"

This witness afterwards goes on to the proof of the execution.

Unless, then, this witness is deposing with direct and wilful falsehood, here is full proof of instructions, approval, and execution, leaving no doubt of volition and testamentary capacity; Hearle could not be deceived—he had been [607] acquainted with the deceased for eighteen years—was his opposite neighbour, a respectable bookseller—had attested not only the paper of the 11th of June with Glencross, but the will of 1817. He speaks to capacity at the time of executing in these terms: "Deponent was very particular in satisfying himself, and did fully satisfy himself, of the perfect capacity of the deceased on the several occasions by him predeposed of, because between the period of the deceased executing a will in 1819, and deponent being called in to witness the codicil in June, 1822, the deceased had suffered a severe illness, the consequences of which caused temporary aberrations of mind; and this being known to deponent, he was very particular in assuring himself, which he did, that the deceased was quite free from any access of such complaint before he witnessed the said codicil, or took instructions for, or made, or witnessed the execution of the will aforesaid."

He is confirmed sufficiently to shew execution and capacity by the other subscribed witness, Symons, also a respectable person, a mercer, an intimate acquaintance of the testator, who has given his evidence with perfect fairness. There are those variations as to minute circumstances which a lapse of upwards of three years would naturally produce between honest witnesses, but Mr. Symons' evidence is quite effectual to that part of the transaction at which he was present. What he states previous to the execution is shortly this: "That on the evening on which the will was exe-[608]-cuted, Hearle called upon him and they went together to Goude's; that in the bar room they found the deceased, his wife, and a stranger; that in a few minutes they went with the deceased into a back parlour, Hearle bringing the will with him, who opened it and laid it on the table; that he does not recollect any conversation or remark upon the subject of the will previous to the signing; and that the will was not read in his presence." Here are certainly in this account some variations from Hearle, but not such as to affect his credit.(a) The witness then, after deposing that the deceased of (a) Hearle stated, "That about 9 o'clock in the evening, in consequence of a message, he went over to the deceased and found him, Mrs. Goude, and several friends in the bar parlour. Mr. Symons was either there at the time or came in shortly afterwards. . . . The deceased asked his wife for the will, or for the keys of the bureau wherein it was kept, and the deceased (bringing the will with him), Symons, and deponent went into the old back parlour: the deceased then told Symons (who appeared to be a stranger to the purpose he was come about) that he had sent for him his own accord signed each sheet (Hearle states that he had with a pencil written the names where the deceased and the witnesses were to subscribe); placed his finger on the seal of wax; repeated by Hearle's directions the form of publication; and that Hearle and himself then wrote their names, thus continues: "Immediately after the deponent had signed his name, he said to the deceased, 'Well, Goude, do you know what [609] you have done?' The deceased answered, 'Oh yes, man.' Deponent then said, 'Is it all right?' Deceased answered, 'Oh yes, my dear fellow, it's all right.' Deponent replied, 'So long as you know what you have done, it is of no consequence to me.' This short conversation took place in their way from the back parlour to the bar parlour, to which they returned immediately on the execution of the will being finished. After the will was so executed Hearle folded it up and took it with him back to the bar.". . . "At the time of the execution the deceased was of sound mind, memory and understanding: he founds his belief of his capacity on the manner and conversation of the deceased at the time of the execution of the will, and his behaviour and conversation subsequent thereto in the same evening; for deponent remained in the bar parlour for two hours more, and played a rubber with the deceased, during which time he discoursed rationally and sensibly, as much so as at any time during deponent's acquaintance with him."

This is the evidence of the factum and of the capacity, viz. these three witnesses, Glencross, Hearle, and Symons, speaking to these transactions on the 11th and 14th of June. There is no particular illness at this time, the deceased was going on just as usual, and Glencross, both in his evidence now and in a memorandum made at that time, records that on the 11th of June the deceased appeared in better health and spirits than usual; and here on the 14th, after the execution, he plays his rubber of whist with [610] Mr. Symons: he lives about ten days after, not in a gradually declining state, but on Sunday, the 24th, he goes to his usual place of worship, is suddenly struck with another fit of apoplexy, and dies; the funeral takes place, the will is read by Bone, no suggestion of incapacity is raised, the widow takes probate, acts under it for nearly three years, and if she had not been disturbed by the distringas it is probable that this suit would never have been heard of.

It will be obvious from what has been stated that the Court thinks itself bound to pronounce for this will. The substituted residuary legatee, Bennet, having performed the duty of an executor in proving this will, according to the ordinary rules of the Court is entitled to his costs out of the estate. If the costs are to be paid out of the estate they will in some measure fall ultimately upon him as substituted residuary legatee, though more immediately on the widow, the residuary legatee for life: she has acted a most improper part, and it is not improbable that she has been the occasion of this expensive suit: possibly in strict justice she ought to be condemned personally in the whole of Bennet's costs; at any rate, as she has repudiated the will by refusing to propound it; which must be considered as tantamount to renouncing probate, the Court is of opinion that it is warranted in revoking the probate granted to her, and may now grant administration with the will annexed to Bennet, the substituted residuary legatee, and decree his costs to be paid out of the estate. If the widow is content with that course I shall feel inclined not to carry my [611] sentence to the rigorous extent of condemning her personally in Bennet's costs, trusting that the decree I propose to make may be sufficient to check such a proceeding in future.

I therefore at present only pronounce for the will of the 14th of June, 1822, reserving the question as to costs; as to the probate taken by the widow; and to the grant of administration to a future day: but I must consider this as a most lenient course towards the widow.

On the 4th Session the Judge, on the motion of counsel, at the petition of the proctor for John Bennet, with the consent of Mrs. Goude, the widow, revoked the probate remaining in the registry of this Court heretofore granted to her, and declared the same null and void and decreed letters of administration (under the usual security) with the will of Francis Goude annexed, to John Bennet, the surviving residuary legatee therein named; and directed his expences to be paid out of the estate.

to witness his, the deceased's, will. . . . Symons read over the will to himself, and afterwards, as deponent now best recollects and believes, read the same aloud to the deceased."

[612] DODGE v. MEECH.(a) Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 18th June, 1828.—The asserted will of a person of fluctuating capacity (totally abandoning the principles of a former disposition made before the deceased's faculties were impaired, and long adhered to) pronounced against; and the executor, the person principally benefited, who, among other things indicative of fraud, had himself given the instructions, and whose son, a minor, alone spoke to the execution, condemned in costs.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This case is so clear that I can entertain no sort of doubt as to any part of my sentence, and I should not be justified in taking any further time or putting the party to any further expence in respect of this will. The facts of the case are these:

Joseph Dodge died on the 21st August, 1826: he had made a will in 1820, which he copied pretty closely with his own hand and re-executed in October, 1824. The contents of that will are not unimportant; they give the history of the deceased and of his family, and explain the grounds on which the Court will proceed to the decision of this question.

"This is the last will and testament of me Joseph Dodge formerly a linen-draper, but now retired from business and residing at Marston Magna in the county of Somerset I give and bequeath all my money securities for money and personal estate of every kind and denomination whatsoever unto my friends Benjamin Vowell of Sherborne wine-merchant Thomas Fooks of the same place gen-[613]-tleman and Thomas Vaughan Meech of the same place ironmonger but nevertheless upon and subject to the trust hereafter expressed and declared concerning the same that is to say after they shall have obtained payment of the securities and reduced the whole into money and shall have fully paid and satisfied all my just debts, funeral and other expences and the cost of proving and otherwise relating to the due execution of this my will and the several legacies following that is to say £200 to my niece Martha How daughter of my sister Martha Coombs £200 to my niece Betty Baker daughter of my sister Betty Lawrence £100 to my niece Julia Wetherall daughter of my late brother John and the like sum £100 each to her sisters Mary and Betty. £50 each to my nieces Betty Hester and Mary daughters of my brother William which I give them as a token of my regard persuaded that their father has made a comfortable provision for them and the sum of £1000 to Elizabeth Martin who now lives with me provided she shall continue to be so residing with me at the time of my decease but not otherwise then the trust as to all the remainder of my money and personal estate to distribute and divide the same to my nephews Benjamin Dodge son of my late brother Benjamin Robert and Joseph Dodge sons of my late brother John Dodge and to William Coombs son of my late sister Martha Coombs and Joseph Lawrence son of my sister Betty Lawrence in equal shares and proportions and I hereby nominate and appoint my said three [614] friends Benjamin Vowell Thomas Fooks and Thomas Vaughan Meech joint executors of this my will," &c. &c.

He signs this document; there is the seal, the usual attestation clause, and two witnesses: at the bottom is written, "That there may be no mistake you are to understand it is the sum of one thousand pounds I have here given Elizabeth Martin;" and on the opposite side are these words: "That there may be no mistake;" so that he is particularly anxious that Elizabeth Martin his housekeeper, whom he had bred up from a child of six or seven years of age, and who had lived with him above thirty years, should have this £1000; nor is this all: he had, as I have said, executed in 1820 a will nearly the same, prepared by his confidential solicitor and executor, Fooks, which having recopied as his new will he cancels, and in the following clause written at the bottom in his own hand he assigns the reason of taking this step: "I drawd out my will afresh because the name Betsy Martin was put in this will and it should have been Elizabeth Martin."

Now nothing can more strongly shew that the former will was confirmed and copied, that he was not acting under any hasty impulse of feeling, but that the will of 1824 was the deliberate expression of his wishes; it shews also what was his general intention as to the testamentary disposition of his property; it shews that he had a great number of nephews and nieces whom he meant to benefit in different [615] degrees and for different reasons; but William Dodge, the party bringing forward the present question, is not mentioned in this will, and takes no benefit under it. It is clear he had once been a favourite with his uncle, who conferred considerable benefit on him during his lifetime, and had turned over his business to him: William Dodge had not however conducted it with the same success as the deceased, nor in a manner likely to afford him much satisfaction; he was exposed to arrest, and was supporting his credit by accommodation bills; the deceased had also just before he re-executed this will given him up and discharged him of a bond for several hundred pounds which this nephew then stood indebted to him. These were the reasons why he was excluded under this will, admitted to be valid, unless revoked by a later instrument.

To this will there are several codicils, one dated on the 11th of January, 1822: "I hereby give unto Joseph Dodge son of my nephew William Dodge my watch and my large family Bible and the six volumes of Henry's Exposition upon the Holy Scriptures and I give unto William Dodge the son of my nephew William Dodge the eight volumes of the Rev. Mr. Romain's works.

"The Concordance return to Robt. Dodge."

There is another, dated on the 19th of October, 1824, which was originally signed on the 23rd of September: the date, I presume, was altered when it was witnessed by Hannah Taylor: "In addition to what I have already given to Elizabeth Martin (now living with [616] me) upon my will I hereby give her (if she lives with me till I die) all that is the whole of my household goods and furniture except one dozen of silver teaspoons." At the bottom is written—"I hereby give unto Jemima Gould formerly Jemima Maber one dozen silver teaspoons marked in the front J. D.

"October 19, 1824."

A further paper: "I hereby give unto Wm. Dodge son of my late brother Wm. Dodge the ten volumes of Dr. Hawker's Poor Man's Commentary upon the Scriptures.

"October 21, 1824."

Here are two further papers signed and dated: the first is dated January 27, 1825: "It is my desire and will that if I should be indisposed to act in life by any affliction I desire Elizabeth Martin may have the care of me but if Elizabeth Martin should not have the care of me, then allow her eight shillings per week for my life-time and at my death give her what I have given her upon my will."

This was after the deceased was ill, and after he had taken to the excessive use of intoxicating liquors, and after Gray had begun to attend him. It seems to refer to his illness and to express an apprehension that he should not be allowed to be attended by Martin: this is a little inconsistent with the averment that Martin was beginning at that time to use personal violence.

The other paper is after he got to Sherborne; and is dated March 8th, 1825: "If it should please God I should die in Sherborne as Mr. Vincent made my brother's coffin let him also make mine."

[617] Here, then, is this disposition of his property, most deliberately made and most firmly adhered to for five years, from 4th February, 1820, to March, 1825. The Court here gathering his intentions from his own acts and from these papers, all in his own handwriting, which speak much more decisively than mere depositions, can entertain no doubt what were his wishes; nor is there the slightest doubt that his faculties were unimpaired up to the end of January, 1824. To support a paper thus revoking and altering this will and substituting a disposition quite different from and the very opposite to it would require the clearest and most indisputable evidence.

William Dodge, the nephew, brings forward a will, or rather three wills, one dated in June, 1825; another on the 3rd of July, 1826; and a third on the 12th of July, 1826—the instrument propounded. It is singular that between the third and twelfth of July the annuity to Elizabeth Martin is increased: this, if the paper was fraudulently obtained, may be accounted for, because legacies are often introduced for the purpose of colour. Now what is the substance of the instrument propounded by William Dodge? "It bequeaths the whole of his property to him in trust—to pay Elizabeth Martin, if living with the deceased at his death, an annuity of £40 [under the paper of the 3rd of July, 1826, this annuity was £30]: it gives to Benjamin Dodge, son of his late brother Benjamin: to Robert Dodge, son of his late brother John: to Joseph Lawrence, son of his late sister Elizabeth—£100 each; these [618] legacies to be paid at the end of a year from the testator's death, with a direction that if all or either of them should die before entitled to receive their respective legacies, such share or shares to form part of the residue; the will then provides for the payment of the deceased's debts, and appoints William Dodge sole executor and residuary legatee." This is the substance of the will of the 12th of July, 1826: it is technically drawn up, signed, sealed; and there are two subscribing witnesses, to whom I shall presently refer.

There are here, then, three legacies given to three nephews out of the great number the deceased had; and, as I have said before, some such might naturally be introduced if fraud had been resorted to: but the great bulk of the property is given to William Dodge, who had nothing under the repeated testamentary acts firmly adhered to for several years. This, then, is a will completely the reverse of his former disposition, wholly abandoning its principle, and therefore requiring clear proof of capacity and execution. It appears, and is admitted by Dodge's own evidence, that, prior to the first of this second class of wills, the deceased had resorted to the immoderate use of spirits and opium, the effect of which was to reduce him to a state of utter incapacity—whether he was encouraged to these excesses by Martin, or whether she could not resist the deceased's determination to gratify this vicious taste, is not material at present.

Early in 1825 William Dodge, with the assistance of Gray, the medical attendant, and [619] with the approbation of Fooks, the confidential solicitor and executor of the former will, himself with force and violence removed the deceased (notwithstanding that he made all the resistance he could) from Marston to Sherborne, where William Dodge resided, and placed over him John Warr, who is described as a male nurse, and under his care in about six weeks the deceased recovered. The removal to Sherborne took place in February, 1825, and in June of the same year the deceased made a will: but it is admitted that at the latter end of that year there was a relapse, when a similar remedy was resorted to; and that in April or May, 1826, he was a third time in the same condition, when Warr was again called in to superintend him, and continued in charge till the eighth of July, 1826.

Here, then, are repeatedly states of incapacity; no matter by what name they are called—whether derangement, or being out of his senses; nor from what cause they spring: if, as it is asserted, from the ill-treatment, personal violence, or control of Elizabeth Martin, what does it prove but that he was in a state of incapacity and non-resistance? though the Court certainly is inclined that the charges against Martin are a little exaggerated. Here, too, are alleged intervals of capacity; here is control by William Dodge and persons authorized by him, he himself assisting in bringing the deceased to Sherborne; here is the deceased, in a state of nervous excitement, going several times a day to Dodge's house—a very small quantity of liquor affecting his senses, and pre-[620]-venting his acting rationally and with judgment—yet wine is occasionally sent to his lodgings by Dodge and his wife in pretty liberal supplies; here is a will, alleged to have been made during an interval of capacity, totally departing from the former disposition, and principally in favour of William Dodge; under such circumstances, unless the Court is prepared to give up all the principles hitherto acted upon, it must demand the most decisive proof of the complete absence of influence and excitement at the preparation and making of this asserted will: it must require unimpeachable evidence of unbiassed volition and of clear capacity: it must expect to be shewn instructions coming from the deceased himself, and an execution in the presence of witnesses above all exception. What, then, is the proof offered?

The will propounded is the last in date—that of the 12th of July, 1826. For this will, it is admitted that there is no evidence of instructions coming from the deceased; but that is not all—the will is prepared, as is fully proved, by instructions and directions from William Dodge, the executor, the party agent, the party benefited—it is executed, or rather the name of the deceased is got to it, without even reading it over to him: I am now assuming that it was signed by the deceased, but the only witness to that fact is the son of William Dodge, at that time a minor, who attests the will, and who is brought to depose that the deceased, in his presence and in the presence of his (deponent's) father and mother, subscribed the paper. This young man certainly has been placed in a most distressing situation. [621] The other subscribed witness, Miller, did not see the paper signed, and consequently it was not attested by him; but this was his habit, for there is another instance of similar conduct on his part: he is a man who has been in the habit of accepting bills of accommodation for William Dodge, who is indebted to him nearly £300; and is called in on two different occasions, and nominally attests what was not signed in his presence.(a)[1] It is quite clear that no argument can sustain such a document prepared and executed under such circumstances and supported by such evidence; the very transaction itself proves that the deceased was in a condition unfit to execute any will; he was in such a state of excitement that he would not wait a [622] few minutes till the other witness arrived, and Warr, it must be remembered, had only ceased his attendance a few days. The proof then, thus far, is utterly insufficient to support this will.

It has, however, been argued that it is supported by collateral evidence arising from affection for William Dodge, and from declarations in his favour: and Burrow's evidence has been referred to: "That the deceased, six or seven years ago [he was examined on the 9th of January, 1828] used to speak very affectionately of his nephew William Dodge, and said, when he departed, he should leave him his property." Can that be true at that time? If this declaration was made then before the deceased's incapacity, it is contradicted by his former acts, and could only have been made in order to deceive and mislead: if after, what reliance can be placed on it? Besides, other declarations are opposed which are equally forcible, and neutralize the effect of this testimony of Burrow.

Again, here is evidence of the similitude of the deceased's handwriting: but supposing that all this species of evidence was on one side, and that the witnesses united in stating their belief that it was his handwriting, that would only prove it was not a forgery—it would not prove his capacity. There is, however, strong evidence of dissimilitude from persons speaking to their belief that it is not the deceased's handwriting. The banker's clerk says it is so unlike that "had a cheque with such a signature been brought to him, he should have hesitated before he would have paid it." But I do not rely on this: assuming it to be his handwriting, there is not [623] evidence to support it. Burrow's opinion only goes to prove that it is not a forgery; (a)[2] and he speaks in such decided terms of the deceased's faculties that his evidence standing alone would induce a belief that the deceased never was incapable, though Warr was in attendance at the very time of which this witness is speaking.

If, however, abandoning the will of the 12th of July, Dodge reverts back to the will of the 3rd of July, the proof is no better: Warr was also then in attendance; if still further back, to the will of June, 1825, there are the same defects or even greater: not only are there no instructions, but it is not even now disclosed in whose

---

(a)[1] John Miller deposed: "He and William Dodge have always been on intimate terms; they reside not more than 50 yards from each other. On the 12th of July, 1826, Joseph (William Dodge's son) came over to him about 4 o'clock in the afternoon and said his father wished to see him; deponent went in about 20 minutes; Joseph Dodge shewed him into the little parlour, where deponent found William Dodge and his wife; there was a paper, pen, ink, and a candlestick on the table; William Dodge told deponent 'he had sent for him to witness his Uncle Joe's will—the old gentleman has been waiting for you some time, you know what a fidgety man he is, he would not wait any longer and is gone; here is his will—he wants you to sign it, and a blank is left for your name.' Deponent then examined the signature, and asked Dodge and his wife 'whether that was the deceased's handwriting;' they assured him that it was; and deponent being also acquainted with the deceased's subscription, had no doubt about it, and signed his name." On the 18th interrogatory: "Respondent, about a twelvemonth (as he believes) before the last will, attested a will of the deceased; the deceased was not present on that occasion."

(a)[2] Robert Burrow, of Sherborne, tailor, deposed: "That he knew the deceased for 14 or 15 years; that he often went to hear him preach; that upon an inspection of the names 'Jos Dodge' set and subscribed to the will propounded by William Dodge, he has no doubt whatever that the same is the genuine handwriting and subscription of the deceased; deponent has frequently seen him write his name exactly in that manner. Deponent saw the deceased during July and August preceding his death; on the 3rd of July, at the deceased's request, deponent witnessed his will; that a few days afterwards deponent conversed with him: and on both of these occasions deceased was of sound and disposing mind, and fully capable of giving instructions for and making and executing his will, or doing any act of that nature."

handwriting that paper is; and there again Miller attests without seeing the deceased sign. These two papers then are of no worth nor validity; these two noughts added to the other nought will not make an arithmetical number.

There are various other particulars which [624] throw a great cloud of suspicion over the whole transaction, to which I do not think it necessary to advert: it is quite sufficient for me to say that William Dodge has wholly failed in proving his case; and where, under such circumstances, a person will undertake to get a will prepared by his own agency, and have it attested by his own son, a minor, and by another who never saw it till after the signature was affixed; and will take upon himself, in suit, to prove it and therein fail, he must abide by the consequences.

Without therefore pronouncing that this will of July, 1826, is a forgery (which perhaps it would not be proper for this Court to do); without pronouncing even that a fraud upon an incapable testator has been proved, though I confess that is my view of the case; yet I do think that I should not reach the justice of the case, and should very much shrink from a discharge of my public duty, if I did not, in pronouncing against the will, condemn William Dodge in costs.

[625] SCARTH v. THE BISHOP OF LONDON, HIS VICAR GENERAL, SURROGATE, REGISTRAR OR ACTUARY IN SPECIAL, AND ALL OTHERS IN GENERAL. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 2nd Session, 1828.—The will of a party who died in Scotland, and all whose property within the province of Canterbury was in the diocese of London (some of it in the funds) having been proved in the Consistory Court of London, and the deputy-registrar of that Court having appeared under protest to a monition to transmit such will, the Court will not overrule the protest; holding a prerogative probate unnecessary, as the Archbishop and Bishop of London have by practice a concurrent jurisdiction in such cases: it will, however, in aid of justice, grant an additional probate, if required, limited to the property in the funds.

On petition.

Thomas Dickson, formerly of Drury Lane, Middlesex, but late of Northfield in the county of Dumfries, was the party deceased. On the 18th of March, 1828, probate of his will was granted, by the authority of the Consistory Court of London, to James Scarth, the surviving executor: and on his behalf a monition—reciting "that the testator was, whilst living and at the time of his death, possessed of goods, chattels, and credits in divers dioceses or peculiar jurisdictions sufficient to found the jurisdiction of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury"—had since been duly served upon the deputy- registrar of the Consistory Court of London enjoining him "to bring into and leave in the registry of the Prerogative Court the aforesaid last will and testament." To this monition the deputy-registrar appeared under protest, alleging "that the several parishes and places (in the province of Canterbury) wherein the whole of the goods, chattels, and credits were situate are within the diocese, and in all respects subject to the jurisdiction of the Bishop of London; that the Archbishop of [626] Canterbury hath not, by virtue of his prerogative, any jurisdiction over them; and that the probate, heretofore issued under seal of the Consistorial and Episcopal Court of London, was therefore legal and valid."

Phillimore for the executor, in opposition to the protest. The bank has refused to transfer, under a probate issuing from the Consistory Court of London, certain stock belonging to the testator, and standing in his name. The question then is whether, under the circumstances, the bank is not justified in withholding the transfer, and whether it is not the duty of the executor to apply for a prerogative probate?

Per Curiam. Was the testator at his death domiciled in Scotland?

Dr. Phillimore. I apprehend that he was; and that his will was also found in Scotland. The origin of the question is on the 93rd canon: (a) on reference to which it is manifest [627] that it is not sufficiently comprehensive for all cases; the present is not included in it. Gibson, in commenting upon this canon, observes: "There are (a) The 93rd canon is headed: "The rate of Bona notabilia liable to the Prerogative Court." It enjoins, "that no judge of the Archbishop's Prerogative shall henceforward cite, or caused to be cited, ex officio, any person whatsoever to any of the aforesaid intents [viz. for the probate of wills or grant of administrations] unless he have knowledge that the party deceased was at the time of his death possessed of several cases wherein no written law hath made provision, in which therefore we must attend to the declarations of the common law; as where one dies possessed of goods in London and Dublin; in that case the resolution seems to have been that the Archbishop of Canterbury by his prerogative was to grant administration for the goods in London; and the Archbishop of Dublin for those in Dublin" (Gibson's Codex, vol. 1, p. 472). However there is no adjudged case exactly in point with the one under consideration; but the nearest, that of Daniel v. Luker, is reported in 3 Dyer, 305 a., 1 Rolle, 908; it is the case upon which Gibson has founded the passage which I have just quoted; and it is also supported by the authority of Burn, and by a dictum of Sir William Wynne which is quoted by that writer, and is quite in unison with it.(c) In the case in Dyer there was, I admit, no decision; but the opinion of the reporter is that the deceased left bona notabilia both in England and Ireland; and that a prerogative probate was necessary in either country. Another analogous authority is to be found in Rolle's Abridgment, under the title of "Executor," p. 908, where it is said that if a party dies beyond sea, the archbishop grants administration. And no distinction exists, in this [628] respect, between an executor and an administrator.

That the Court of Chancery will not decree payment of money without a prerogative probate is established by a series of decisions. Challnor v. Murhall, 6 Ves. 118; Newman v. Hodgson, 7 Ves. 409; Thomas v. Davies, 12 Ves. 417, which last case is quite conclusive upon the point. In the case of Yockney v. Foyster, which occurred in this Court in 1789, the question of the prerogative jurisdiction was discussed; but that case, I admit, does not bear upon the present. All the cases indeed are collected in Lawton's treatise on Bona Notabilia, s. 4, where it is likewise stated that money cannot be received out of Chancery without a prerogative probate. I do not refer to this book as an authority binding upon the Court; but merely to shew the general impression that in Chancery a prerogative probate cannot be dispensed with.

Per Curiam. The question I have to decide is whether this Court has any authority to take away this will from the Court which is in possession of it? I have not to decide whether the Court of Chancery will pay under a probate of the Court of London.

Argument resumed.

The convenience of this rule, for which I am contending, being the established rule, is manifest. If probate is taken out in a Diocesan Court, and there are bona notabilia, the grant is [629] absolutely void; but if it issues erroneously from the Prerogative Court, the grant is only voidable, and all acts done under the authority of such a probate are valid until the grant is revoked.

The King's advocate in support of the protest. There is some doubt whether at the time of his death the testator was domiciled in Scotland; I am inclined to believe he was: that is, however, a circumstance of no importance. In considering what is the jurisdiction of the Prerogative Court of the Archbishop in probates and administrations, it is essential to look to the form of proceedings in respect to such grants. The instruments alone, by the form of their recital, sufficiently shew that the Prerogative Court exercises jurisdiction in these matters solely upon the ground of their being bona notabilia; for they allege that "A. B. had whilst living and at the time of his death goods, chattels, and credits in divers dioceses or peculiar jurisdictions sufficient to found the jurisdiction of our Prerogative Court of Canterbury." The foundation then of the archbishop's right is that the deceased left sufficient goods "in divers dioceses or peculiar jurisdictions:" that is, unless the party died worth property beyond the value of £5 in two dioceses, there is no jurisdicion of the prerogative. In other cases, where there are no bona notabilia, the right is in the diocesan. This is the general rule as to the respective jurisdictions of the metropolitan and diocesan.

It is objected in this case that the testator [630] did not die within the diocese of London: I admit that the death took place in Scotland; but that will not found goods and chattels in some other diocese or dioceses, or peculiar jurisdiction within that province than in that wherein he died, amounting to the value of five pounds at the least, decreeing and declaring that whoso hath not goods in divers dioceses to the said sum or value shall not be accounted to have bona notabilia," &c.

(c) Vide 4th Burn's Ecc. Law, 234 (Tyrwhitt's edition).

the jurisdiction; and reliance was placed upon Rolle's Abridgment; where it is stated that if a man die intestate in England and Ireland, the archbishops, respectively, shall grant administration.(a)[1] The case itself does not appear to have been acted upon; and immediately afterwards Rolle adds: "But this must be understood where the party hath goods in divers dioceses in each of their provinces, or in the diocese of the archbishop; for otherwise it ought to be granted by the ordinary where the goods are and not by the archbishop:" and this limitation has been adopted both by Bacon and Viner.(b) The jurisdiction then depends upon the goods. Viner,(c) citing from Freeman's Reports, is in direct opposition to the case from Dyer. "A man dies in France and hath goods in the diocese of Norwich, and the question was whether the Bishop of Norwich should grant administration or the archbishop? Per North, C. J. The bishop shall grant administration unless he hath bona notabilia; and his dying in France is no more than if he died in Norwich." (d) There must therefore be bona notabilia to found the archbishop's jurisdiction.

It has been argued that in Chancery money [631] is decreed not to be paid out, except on a prerogative probate; and that in all cases. Now if this position be correct, it is worthy of consideration; but from a review of the decisions it does not appear to me that if a party dies in the diocese of London (having no bona notabilia) a prerogative probate would be required by the Court of Chancery. The cases cited only determine that where there are bona notabilia, the Court will not dispense with a prerogative probate, merely because of the smallness of the sum.

Per Curiam. The cases do not touch the present question.

Argument resumed.

In Yockney v. Foyster (a)[2] a very broad proposition, as to the necessity of a prerogative probate to carry on proceedings in Chancery, was certainly advanced in the pleadings; but [632] the sentence of the Court did not bear out the terms of the allegation. The present case, too, is easily distinguishable from that; for here the will is already proved. The Consistory Court is in possession of the grant, and the

(a)[2] Prerog., 27th May, 1789. This was a suit promoted in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury by Elizabeth (wife of Samuel Yockney), a legatee named in the last will and testament of Caleb Foyster, late of Kingston in the island of Jamaica. The executor, Foyster, having appeared under protest to the jurisdiction, it was propounded on the part of Mrs. Yockney, in an allegation.

The first article, in substance, pleaded that the deceased died in 1777, having whilst living and at the time of his death goods, chattels, and credits in divers dioceses or peculiar jurisdictions within the province of Canterbury to the value of £5 and upwards sufficient to found the jurisdiction of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury.

The second, that Foyster, the surviving executor and residuary legatee, proved the will in Jamaica; that he is now resident within the province of Canterbury, and since his having taken upon him the execution of the will, he hath had remitted to him by his agents from Jamaica divers effects amounting to more than the sum of £5 in value; and that he is in possession of them and of divers other effects in the province of Canterbury.

The third recited the bequest.

The fourth pleaded that the legatee, in order to compel the executor to the due payment of the legacy, "hath been advised to file her bill of complaint in Chancery, but is prevented from so doing on account of there not being a representative to the deceased in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury: that by the constant and invariable practice of the Court of Chancery no proceedings can be had or instituted therein against an executor for rendering an account, or for the recovery of a legacy bequeathed by the will of any testator, unless such will shall have been first regularly proved in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, and a legal personal representative appointed to such testator by the said Court."

This allegation was rejected. Vide infra, p. 636.

In Tyrwhitt's edition of Burn's Ecc. Law, vol. iv. p. 234, the case of Yockney and Foyster is noticed.

application is to take it out of that registry. I apprehend this Court will not interfere.

Per Curiam. Is not the principle of all prerogative probates to save the necessity of two grants? Where a party dies with goods in two provinces, there must then be two grants. If a will had been proved in Jamaica, would a probate of the exemplification of that will be granted in the London Court? There must, I think, be some instances, where persons dying in the British colonies and having no other personal property in this country, except in the [633] English funds, that probate of their wills are taken in the Consistorial Court?

The deputy-registrar of the Commissary Court of London stated that there were instances of probates in such cases in both the London Courts.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This question was argued on a former Court day, and from the nature of it, and from the number of authorities cited, the Court thought proper to take time to deliberate. The facts are these. Thomas Dickson died in Scotland, having made his will of which he appointed Scarth executor. He was possessed of personal property in Scotland and also in London: the latter consisting of some leasehold premises in Drury Lane; some bond and other debts in Westminster; and £10 long annuities in the funds. Probate of this will was taken out in the Consistory Court of London; but Mr. Scarth has since extracted a monition against the deputy-registrar of that Court to transmit the will to the Prerogative Court, because (as has been stated in argument, though this does not appear in the act on petition) the bank has refused to transfer the long annuities on a consistory probate. The deputy-registrar has appeared under protest, alleging that all the property out of Scotland lay within the diocese of London, and that there were no bona notabilia in any other diocese within this province. This is not controverted, unless money in the [634] funds be not considered to lie within the diocese of London.

The question, then, is, not whether the Prerogative Court has concurrent jurisdiction, and might, in the first instance, or even now, grant probate of the will of a party dying out of the province, but whether a monition to transmit the probate to this Court shall issue on the ground that the Bishop of London has no jurisdiction, though there are goods in no other diocese within the province. If there was a concurrent jurisdiction, that is, if in the first instance either or both Courts might have been applied to, the prerogative would not take the grant out of the hands of the Bishop of London, the probate having already passed.

In respect to concurrency, there is a fact to commence with, admitted on all hands: that it is the practice to grant probate in either jurisdiction where a party dies out of the province having no goods in divers dioceses, but only in the diocese of London, though part of those goods is money in the funds. It would, then, require clear and decisive authority to shew that such jurisdiction, so sanctioned by practice, is to be disturbed, and that this grant made by the Diocesan Court is illegal and void—and to justify the enforcing of this monition.

In aid of such a position I have not been referred to any case. The strongest semblance of the bishop having no jurisdiction, on the present occasion, arises from the party not dying within the diocese; but though there may be some dicta to this effect, yet the authorities, to prove that the death of the party within the [635] diocese is essentially necessary to found the jurisdiction of the bishop, are not sufficiently clear to induce the Court to overturn the established practice which exists as to parties dying out of the province. The concurrency of jurisdiction is then recognized in practice and is also intelligible in principle. By the general canon law it should seem that the metropolitan had original jurisdiction throughout his province. Many authorities to that effect may be found: the exercise of this jurisdiction was restrained, in respect to suits, by the Statute of Citations (23 Hen. 8, c. 9), and, in respect to probates and administrations, by the ninety-third canon; but the metropolitan has still the right of visiting his bishops and of inhibiting them during his visitations, in the same manner as bishops visit and inhibit their respective archdeacons; and a general concurrency of jurisdiction may have been reserved by composition or otherwise.

Proceeding then to the consideration of the cases cited, and the arguments addressed to the Court on the former day, I am of opinion that there is not sufficient to authorize a departure from the ascertained practice in instances where the party dies out of, and does not possess bona notabilia in different dioceses of, the province. Though the authorities to be found in the books afford some countenance to the doctrine that if the death happens out of the province, and there are only goods in one diocese, a prerogative probate is still necessary, yet they are extremely loose and vague: many are mere dicta; [636] some when investigated do not support the position; some are inconsistent with others; some assert that if a person dies abroad, or in Dublin, a prerogative probate is to issue; but the position is stated so generally that it may, if the authorities could be traced up, only mean that the archbishop shall have concurrent, not exclusive, jurisdiction, unless there be bona notabilia. So a note of a case decided in the Prerogative Court in 1714—Green v. Wigmore (Prerog., 1714)—states, "A person dying in the East Indies and goods in London, prerogative probate." That is the whole of the note which I have; and this again may only refer to a concurrent, not an exclusive, right: but still it is a strong case, because it is known that formerly, for certain purposes, the East Indies were considered to be within the jurisdiction of the diocese of London.

I may here remark, as to the rule of the Court of Chancery, that the cases referred to, when examined, only establish that that Court requires a competent probate, and will not direct money to be paid out on a diocesan probate, when the money itself in Court shews that there are bona notabilia in divers dioceses, and consequently that a prerogative is the competent probate.

In the case of Yockney v. Foyster (Prerog., 1789, vide supra, p. 631), in which I was of counsel, the party applied for a prerogative probate: the jurisdiction was denied, and was propounded in an allegation. The only effects within the province were brought [637] there after the death of the party. Sir William Wynne rejected the allegation upon the ground "that such goods did not found the jurisdiction;" and said, "though it was stated in argument that the probate was necessary in order to file a bill, yet he could not grant it upon such an assertion: but if the Court of Chancery had actually decided that the prerogative grant was necessary, this Court 'in aid of justice' might allow the grant to pass." I do not know that that case throws much light on the present question: it only shews that for the sake of furthering justice the Court would not withhold its probate. This may be of some use however, for a purpose to which I shall presently allude.

The canon itself (the ninety-second) perhaps is the safest authority for this Court.(a) Its [638] provisions should seem, generally, to import that the Prerogative Court originally exercised a concurrent jurisdiction in all cases, and that the officers of that Court and of the Diocesan Court were running a race—having a sort of scramble—to get first possession. To remedy this inconvenience the canon restrains the inferior Court from interposing where there are goods in divers dioceses within the province, or as it may seem to provide, where there are goods in another diocese besides in that wherein the party died: and though the notice required to [639] be given by the registrar of the inferior Court to the apparitor of the Prerogative Court is now obsolete, yet still the rule remains that a probate granted by a Diocesan Court is absolutely void, and null ab initio, where there are bona notabilia.

The canon, however, does not distinctly refer to the case of a person who dies out

(a) The 92nd canon is intituled—"None to be cited into divers Courts for probate of the same will;" and after reciting that "Forasmuch as many heretofore have been by apparitors both of inferior Courts, and of the Courts of the Archbishop's Prerogative, much distracted, and diversely summoned for probate of wills, or to take administrations of the goods of persons dying intestate, and are thereby vexed:" it directs "all chancellors, commissaries, officials, &c. to inquire of all persons appearing before them for probate or administration whether they know or believe that the deceased had, at his death, any goods or good debts in any other diocese or peculiar jurisdiction within that province than in that wherein the party died, to the value of £5. And if the person cited, or voluntarily appearing, shall upon his oath affirm that he knoweth, or firmly believeth, that the said party deceased had goods or good debts in any other diocese or dioceses, or peculiar jurisdictions within the said province, to the value aforesaid, then shall such chancellor, &c. &c. presently dismiss him, not presuming to intermeddle with the probate of the said will, or to grant administration of the goods of the intestate: but shall openly and plainly declare that the cause belongeth to the prerogative of the archbishop of that province, willing and of the province, but who has goods in a particular diocese, and the construction put upon the canon by the practice appears to be that in such case the concurrent jurisdiction remains, and that either the metropolitan or the bishop of the diocese, in which alone there were any effects, may make the grant. At all events this Court, finding such a practice at present existing, does not feel warranted in disturbing it by taking this probate out of the hands of the Consistory Court. This Court is always unwilling to break in upon an established practice; more especially would it be unwilling in a case where this Court and its officers may have some sort of interest. Any alteration in such matters would more fitly proceed from a different authority.

It can hardly be expected that, because the bank has now, and not for the first time, started a difficulty, this Court is to set up a new rule without some decisive authority to justify it. If any authorities or sound principles exist, which may have escaped the diligence and research of counsel or the knowledge of the Court, resort must be had to the supreme tribunal or to the powers of some other Court; or if there exist any strong reasons of public expediency requiring, as a protection and neces-[640]-sary safeguard to the public funds, that none but a prerogative probate should be received to found a transfer at the bank, recourse must be had to the Legislature. The difficulty in this particular case may probably be removed by the proviso stated in the latter part of the ninety-second canon, viz.: If a party voluntarily desire it, probate may be granted both out of the inferior and Prerogative Court: "Provided that this canon or anything therein contained be not prejudicial, &c. to any inferior judge that shall grant any probate of testament or administration of goods to any party that shall voluntarily desire it both out of the said inferior Court and also out of the Prerogative."

Upon this authority, and in order to "aid the ends of justice," if the executor now applies here for probate, this Court might grant it, limited as far as the necessity of the case requires. It would be unfit and improper to grant a general probate, because a general probate has been already granted by what is to be considered a Court of competent jurisdiction; but I should be disposed to grant a probate limited to the property in the public funds, which is all that the necessity and justice of the case require. The party may choose voluntarily to make this application rather than engage in a contest with that great and powerful body, the bank, which may possibly have strong and substantial reasons for the rule they are contending for, and from which other Courts might hesitate to compel them to depart. This course, however, must be left to the [641] consideration of the parties themselves: but upon the grounds already stated, the Court thinks itself bound to allow the protest, and to dismiss the deputy-registrar from the monition.

Protest sustained.

Note.—The editor is informed that since the judgment of the Court was delivered in this case the Bank of England has acquiesced in the transfer of the £10 long annuities upon the original probate taken in the Consistory of London.

admonishing the party to prove the said will, or require administration of the said goods in the Court of the said prerogative; and if any chancellor, &c. &c. shall offend herein, let him be ipso facto suspended from the execution of his office, not to be absolved or released, until he have restored to the party all expences by him laid out contrary to the tenor of the premises; and every such probate of any testament, or administration of goods so granted, shall be held void and frustrate to all effects of law whatsoever.

"Furthermore we charge and enjoin that the registrar of every inferior Judge do, without all difficulty or delay, certify and inform the apparitor of the Prerogative Court, repairing unto him once a month, what executors or administrators have been by his said Judge, for the incompetency of his own jurisdiction, dismissed to the Prerogative Court within the month next before. Provided that this canon be not prejudicial to any composition between the archbishop and any bishop or other ordinary, nor to any inferior Judge that shall grant any probate of testament or administration of goods, to any party that shall voluntarily desire it, both out of the said inferior Court, and also out of the Prerogative."

IN THE GOODS OF JAMES TAYLOR. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 3rd Session, 1828.—Execution being only prevented by death, the Court will decree probate in common form on a proxy of consent from all in esse interested; but those not in esse will not be bound by the grant.

On motion.

The deceased died at Birmingham on the 19th of November, 1827: he left a widow, a son, and a daughter (Elizabeth, wife of Henry Beaumont). His will, regularly executed, was dated in March, 1822. On the day preceding his death, while very ill, he sent for his solicitor, Mr. Ingleby, to alter his will; who immediately attended (in company with the deceased's surgeon) and drew up a codicil. When the codicil [642] was prepared, it was, at the testator's request, read over to him in the presence of witnesses, and he approved of it; but deferred signing it till the next morning, when he died without having executed it.

The son and daughter of the deceased and their respective issue were the only persons who could be prejudiced by the codicil: the son was since dead, unmarried and intestate: the daughter had no children.

Upon a special proxy of consent from the daughter and her husband, and from different legatees (whose interests were varied by the codicil), and a full affidavit of the facts, Lushington moved for probate of the codicil in common form.

Per Curiam. This is an ordinary case of prevention by death: there was no hesitation as to the contents; the execution only was postponed till the following morning. All at present in existence who are interested consent, and the issue that may be hereafter born will not be bound by this decree. Probate may therefore pass.

Motion granted.

[643] IN THE GOODS OF ELIZABETH ROBINSON. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 3rd Session, 1828.—The Court will not grant probate, in common form, of a paper formally drawn up, but unexecuted, and which the deceased clearly intended to alter; nor of a subsequent paper in the deceased's handwriting, but undated, unsigned, and apparently unfinished, and with nothing to ascertain that it was written shortly before the death, or that it embodied the final intentions of the deceased; the deceased being an illegitimate spinster, and the Crown opposing the grant.

On motion.

Elizabeth Robinson, formerly of Tregunter, Brecon, but late of Sunbury, Middlesex, died suddenly on the 23rd of May, 1828, a spinster and illegitimate, having personal property exceeding £4000; but no real estate.

Upon her death were found in a box containing her papers of importance, three papers of a testamentary nature; they were enclosed in an unsealed envelope, which was tied round.

Paper A was in the handwriting of the deceased: it was not signed, nor dated, and did not dispose of the residue: but contained an appointment of executors.

Paper B was a will on parchment, prepared for execution.(a)

Paper C contained some memoranda in the handwriting of the deceased.

Upon affidavits from the deceased's solicitor, and from the medical attendant; Lushington moved for probate of paper A as the last will and testament of the deceased.

The King's advocate, on the part of the Crown, opposed the motion.

[644] Per Curiam. The deceased, a spinster, and illegitimate, died on the 23rd of May, 1828; and there are several documents of a testamentary nature before the Court: one of which, B, written on parchment, is ready prepared for execution; but in the concluding part are these words: "All the rest residue and remainder of my personal estate and effects subject to the payment of the last mentioned legacies and my funeral and testamentary expences I purpose disposing of in such manner as shall be expressed in a codicil or codicils to this my will;" so that she intended to make an addition to the will even if she had executed it, but in fact she never did finish it. On the 5th of April she wrote to Mr. Powell, who prepared B: "I received the parchment agreeable to my desire and intend to fill it up and to make a few alterations but think to leave it for the present." She did not then merely suspend the execution, but she proposed to make some alteration. A, another of these papers, has nothing in it to shew when it was written, except that it appears to have been subsequent to, because manifestly drawn up from, B. The water-mark, being 1824, affords no clue. It is in her own handwriting, but has no concluding words, no signature, no date, no distribution of the residue; and the affidavits only go to finding and handwriting, but do not fix the date, nor contain anything to prove that the paper embodied her final intentions. It therefore is not entitled to probate unless with the express consent of the Crown. [645] The parties interested may endeavour to convince the Crown that it was the deceased's intention that this paper should have effect, when some arrangement might probably be made for the payment of the legacies by the nominee of the Crown; but as far as this Court is concerned the present motion must be rejected.

(a) Mr. Powell, of Brecon, the deceased's solicitor, stated on affidavit that this paper was forwarded to the deceased on the 23rd of February, 1825; and had been drawn up from her own verbal instructions: and that it had evidently been used as the model of paper A.

Motion rejected.

WOOD v. MEDLEY. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 1st Session, 1828.—Two papers having been propounded by an executor in an allegation which was rejected, and administration thereupon taken out by the next of kin; on a legatee under one of those papers calling in the administration, and the administrator appearing under protest; the protest allowed to stand over, in order that the legatee, on shewing he was not cognizant of the former proceedings, &c. &c. might bring in an allegation: the appointment of the executor being in one paper, the interest of the legatee entirely under the other, and the two papers not necessarily connected.

On petition.

In Michaelmas Term 1827, an allegation propounding, on behalf of the asserted executor, two papers as together containing the last will of John Medley was rejected. (Vide Cundy v. Medley, supra, p. 140.) Letters of administration then issued to Ann Medley (a sister and one of the next of kin of the deceased), the party who now appeared under protest to a decree served upon her at the promotion of Peter Wood, a nephew, and a residuary legatee named in one of the aforesaid papers, in order that, on his behalf, the papers might be re-propounded. The averments, on [646] either side, were set forth in an act on petition.(a)

(a) In support of the act on petition Peter Wood made an affidavit, dated on the 12th of May, as follows:—"Peter Wood, the younger, of the city of Antwerp, but now in London, maketh oath that he is one of the residuary legatees named in the last will and testament (as contained in two paper writings) of John Medley the deceased; that he hath been informed and believes that the said John Medley died on or about the 12th of August, 1827, and that soon after his death certain proceedings arose between J. W. Cundy the executor named in one of the said paper writings and Ann Medley and Priscilla Medley, two of the natural and lawful sisters and two of the next of kin of the deceased, with a view to establish the said papers as the last will of the deceased, the validity of which the said Ann and Priscilla Medley contested: And this deponent further saith that he was not informed of the said proceedings, as he was then labouring under a very severe and dangerous illness, until on or about the latter end of January or the beginning of February last past, when he was informed and believes that letters of administration of the effects of the said deceased had been granted to the said Ann Medley: he further saith that a short time since, having been informed by his agents in England that sufficient evidence hath now been obtained to establish the validity of the said paper writings, he did on the 22nd of February last instruct and authorize proceedings to be commenced on his behalf against the administratrix for the purpose of establishing the said paper writings as the true and original last will and testament of the deceased; and he further saith that he did not in any way consent or make himself a party to any acts done by James Riddel Wood or John William Cundy, either during the dependance of the said proceedings or subsequent thereto, as he during the dependance of the same was wholly ignorant thereof."

Lushington and Nicholl in support of the protest.

Two points arise on this petition. First: whether it is not true as a general rule, though possibly liable to exceptions, that when an executor has propounded a will, and no collusion is [647] suggested, all persons claiming under that will are bound by his acts. Secondly: whether, if this be the true rule, any reasons are here offered to take the present case out of such general rule.

In the first place, the Court, we apprehend, would be much disinclined to allow these proceedings to be revived, and the next of kin put to the fresh expence of opposing these papers a second time, unless it were bound so to do, either from a conviction that the rights of third parties had been improperly and lightly sacrificed in the former attempt to substantiate these papers; or unless it were required by the principles of law, or by a constant stream of authority. Now collusion is quite out of the question; for it is admitted that Mr. Cundy, the executor, fully discharged his duty; that he was assisted and furnished with information by Riddel Wood, the brother of the present party, who has exactly the same interest; and that a caveat entered by the proctor of that brother was withdrawn by the advice of his counsel, on the ground that the papers could not be supported.(a)[1] This affords the strongest possible disproof of collusion or of neglect; and indeed the act on petition abstains from suggesting any such charge.

That all parties and all interests are bound by [648] the act of the pars principalis is a principle universally recognised. On this principle it is that, in cases of marriage, whether void or voidable, and in which the wife is the only party proceeded against, the decisions of this Court are held to bind the children. Indeed, to what manifest inconvenience and injustice would any such practice, as that now attempted, necessarily lead? When would a next of kin be safe, if allowed to be attacked by every legatee in succession? It may, however, be said, the objection is easily obviated by citing all parties interested to see proceedings: but if this were done much useless expence would be incurred in every common suit; and it would render all property, where such a course had not been adopted, insecure. In Colvin v. Fraser (supra, p. 107) a doubt was raised whether the next of kin had a right to take out such a decree, and though the Court overruled the objection, it at the same time seemed to be of opinion that the decree was unnecessary; as the legatees, unless collusion were shewn, would be bound by the acts of the executor. The principle that "res inter alios acta aliis nec nocet nec prodest" cannot be disputed: but this rule, we contend, is limited to the person having the chief and primary interest, and that those whose claims are dependent upon, and deduced from, and through, the pars principalis, are bound by his acts; that, after a sentence against the legitimus contradictor, none other has a right to contest the same question.

Who, then, is the legitimus contradictor of the will?—the hæres scriptus—the executor—the person to whose especial care the testator, if tes-[649]-tator he be, has committed the trust of carrying his will into effect—whom he has selected to watch over the interests of his minor legatees, and of his creditors, and, generally, over his estate; and who is called the very foundation of a testament. Such is the rule adopted by the Courts of common law, and of Chancery, by the civil law, and by these Courts.

In the first place, it cannot be pretended that at common law the act of the executor does not bind the legatee: he may confess as many judgments as he pleases, and they cannot even intervene, or in any way interfere to prevent him. In Chancery, though they may intervene, yet they are not—not even the residuary legatee—necessary parties to a decree against the executor. Hargrave's Law Tracts, pp. 475-6, in notis; Lawson v. Barker, 1 Bro. C. C. 303. Brown v. Dowthwaite, 1 Madd. 448. This doctrine is only gathered by inference from the Digests; (a)[2] but the commentators are express

(a)[1] In the act on petition, and in the affidavit of James Riddel Wood, it was stated to be the opinion of counsel that, "although the additional facts" [that James Riddel Wood had then discovered] "afforded strong grounds of presumption towards establishing the testamentary papers, yet that those facts as stated, or such at least of them as were supposed to be capable of proof, did not amount to what the Court would require."

upon the subject. Scaccia, after stating as a general rule that "sententia inter alios lata aliis non nocet," gives the following among other exceptions, "Quando sententia est lata cum legitimo contradictore, id est, cum eo cujus principaliter interest, et à quo alii [650] jus habent consecutivum; quia tunc illa sententia facit jus quoad omnes, etiam non intervenientes et non citatos." Again: "Sententia lata contrà hæredem nocet fidei commissario etiam ignoranti litem et non citato;" and, after stating that this doctrine is confirmed by many passages in the Digest, he concludes: "Ex quibus legum Doctores communiter videntur colligere quod sententia lata contrà hæredem, seu contrà testamentum, noceat etiam legatariis." (a)[1] Covarruvias is to the same effect. "Ubi lis tractatur cum legitimo contradictore, à quo aliorum jus in eadem re derivatur et oritur; et qui primas obtinet in eâ controversiâ partes, sententia lata facit jus quoad omnes, etiamsi nec litigaverint, nec vocati fuerint ad judicium, nec scientiam litis controversæ habuerint." (b) This principle is equally supported by Novarius,(c) by Heraldus,(d) by Peregrinus,(e) and by Mauritius.(f)

[651] What is the practice here? A legatee is not allowed to propound a paper till he has cited the executor to propound, or to refuse so to do. This was decided in the case of Da Silva v. Henriquez.(a)[2] Could then Mr. Cundy again propound this will? And if he could not be allowed, what a contradiction it would be to allow the person whose claim is subordinate to and deduced from his; and who is only allowed to propound on his refusal. There are no cases, that we are aware of, in which such a course has been permitted. The cases where the question has been raised by the next of kin against the executor, in possession of a probate, are completely distinct: the interest of all these are equal; none are secondary or subordinate; none are paramount; there is no legitimus contradictor. And the practice of always citing the next of kin rests upon this ground, that no one next of kin represents another next of kin: but to cite, regularly and formally, all the legatees under a will, who may be resident in different parts of the world, would be an impracticable attempt; and if it could be resorted to, much inconvenience would result from the number of parties that might thus be introduced into a cause.

The effect of a sentence of the Ecclesiastical [652] Court was much discussed in The Duchess of Kingston's case (State Trials, vol. xx. 8vo edition); and the result was, that all parties and interests are concluded by it, as much as if it were a sentence in a proceeding in rem; and it is established that in a suit of salvage, or wages, parties, though not cited, are bound by the decree (Attorney General v. Norstedt, 3 Price, 97).

In the case of Lewis v. Bulkeley a similar application to the present was rejected

Caveat entered by next of kin. Legatee, named in a paper, declared he propounded it, and gave an allegation.

Dr. Swabey, counsel for the legatee, suggested that, as there were executors named in the paper, they ought to be cited to appear and propound. The Court (Sir William Wynne) agreed that the legatee ought to cite the executors; and directed a decree to issue.

by the High Court of Delegates.(c) It may be said [653] that, in that case, there was a regular sentence against a will. We admit the distinction; but how does it bear? That in a case where the question is so nicely balanced, that the Court allows it to go to proof, there the legatees are bound; but in a case so feeble in its circumstances that the Court rejects the allegation, the legatees in succession may revive it, and vexatiously pursue the next of kin ad infinitum. So that the worse is the case of the parties the better is their situation.

In respect to the second point—whether there is any thing to remove this case out of the general principle, and to support the present application—we submit that the affidavits are scanty, and quite insufficient to induce the Court to re-open the cause. The allegation was rejected without doubt or hesitation. On the part of Mr. Wood there is much appearance of vexation and delay. The names of the persons who inform him that the evidence, now in his possession, is sufficient, are not given; nor the names of the witnesses; nor the facts that can be established; nor when they came to his [654] knowledge. The party should have been ready with an admissible allegation; or at least the Court will require, before it over-rules this protest, that such facts be laid before it as, if pleaded, would constitute an admissible allegation. Dabbs v. Chisman. Jennens v. Beauchamp, 1 Phill. 158.

Phillimore and Addams contrà. The general principle we may admit to be correctly stated. If, for instance, a will had been bonâ fide opposed by the next of kin on the ground of fraud, insanity, collusion, or force, and established, the Court, after an interval of many years, during which the sentence had been acquiesced in, would not be inclined to re-open the proceedings; but great hardships would result if, in all cases, this course were pursued. One example will shew it. Suppose a party, unadvisedly, propounds papers, and the allegation is rejected; could such a proceeding be conclusive against all persons interested under those papers? We admit that, under the circumstances, the allegation offered by Mr. Cundy was properly rejected; but we contend that, with reference to the facts disclosed in our affidavits, and to the character of the deceased, the arguments adduced against this application are, in a (c) Lewis & Lewis v. Bulkeley. Delegates, 1732.

This was an appeal from two concurrent sentences of the Court at Bangor and of the Court of Arches, both which Courts had pronounced for the validity of the will of a married woman made previous to a second marriage.

The original citation at Bangor issued at the instance of Rowland Williams and Dorothy, his wife, and also of William Lewis and Anne, his wife—the next of kin of the deceased—calling upon William Bulkeley, tutor or guardian of his daughter Maria Bulkeley (during her minority), executrix in the will of Maria Williams alias Hampton, to appear and prove the said will per testes; and further to do and receive what may be just.

There was no citation against the legatees, either personally or viis et modis, nor a citation against all persons in general to see proceedings.

On 17th February, 1732–3, the Delegates reversed both sentences. On 19th April, 1733, before the Con-Delegates, Hill exhibited for Dorothy Williams, sister and next of kin of Mary Hampton, otherwise Williams, and prayed administration to pass the seal. Sayer exhibited a special proxy under the hand and seal of Owen Lewis, and alleged him to be a legatee in the will of the deceased in this cause, and now remaining in the registry of this Court.

Upon the petition of each proctor, the act to be delivered three days before, and to shew precedents on the last Court of this term.

On 7th May the cause was assigned for informations and sentence at Serjeants' Inn whensoever.

On 1st June, before the whole commission at Serjeants' Inn, Hill prayed that administration of the goods of Mary Hampton, otherwise Williams, as dying intestate, be granted and ordered to pass under the seal of this Court to his client—the sister and next of kin of the deceased. Sayer prayed liberty to propound the will, in the name of his client, and to prove the same by sufficient witnesses.

The Judges, by their interlocutory decree, rejected the petition of Sayer, and ordered the administration to pass the seal in the name of Dorothy Williams—the sister and next of kin of the deceased.

Note.—This is the case cited as Mrs. Lewis' case. 4 Burn's Ecc. Law, p. 51.

great measure, irrelevant and insufficient. The two papers are not necessarily connected: the principal one has no executor named in it. Is then a person, so much interested as Mr. Peter Wood, to be bound and precluded by what has already passed in respect to these papers? It has been argued, as a broad [655] proposition, that under no circumstances (unless fraud or collusion be shewn) where an executor has propounded a will, can another party come in and revive the proceedings? and it may be generally true that lis pendens is a notice to all parties interested: yet the doctrine of this Court has never been that, in every possible case, a party is bound by the acts of an asserted executor. What is said in the civil law as to the pars principalis strongly favours our case; for, by the civil law, the pars principalis means the heir who answers to our next of kin. In the Court of Chancery it is true that an executor represents all parties, because it has been previously decided here who is to represent the testator. There is no analogy whatever between matrimonial and testamentary causes. Sententia contra matrimonium nunquam transit in rem judicatam is well established as a general principle; and there are instances where, to a certain degree, a sentence in a matrimonial suit may be again put in issue.

Per Curiam. In the case of a voidable marriage, where the parties are dead, could the question be agitated incidentally by children? I am not aware of any case where that has been allowed.

Argument resumed.

In Newell and King v. Weeks (2 Phill. 224) the principle upon which we rest this application was acted upon by the Court; and the same doctrine has been maintained in Jennens v. Beauchamp (1 Phill. 158), Braham v. Burchell (3 Add. 243), and a variety of ad-[656]-judged cases. No precedent has been brought forward that will support the argument on the other side. Lewis v. Bulkeley is easily distinguishable; for, in that case, there was a regular sentence after the pleas had gone to proof. The question then is reduced to the circumstances; for it is admitted that the general rule is open to exception. We contend that Mr. Peter Wood was not cognizant of the former proceedings, and that enough is established not to preclude him from being allowed to plead his interest.

Per Curiam. Is he a party in distribution?

Argument resumed.

Yes, he is. If, however, the Court should prefer that this matter, as to the protest and bringing in of the administration, should be suspended till an allegation is offered, and the Court has an opportunity of judging whether it is admissible, we see no objection to the adoption of that course.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. A person of the name of John Medley died on the 12th of August, 1827, having left three sisters, and several nephews and nieces, entitled in distribution. After his death two papers, described as together containing his will, were propounded by Mr. John Cundy, the asserted executor: they were opposed; and an allegation given in support of them having been rejected by the Court (Cundy v. Medley, supra, p. 140), administration was de-[657]-creed to two of the deceased's sisters. The administration, after some delay occasioned by a caveat, having been entered by one of the nephews, James Riddel Wood, seems to have passed the seal to one of the two sisters on the 28th of January; and is now called in by a process dated on the 20th of March, and taken out by Peter Wood, another nephew, and a residuary legatee, under one of the papers. An appearance has been given thereto under protest, which, having been extended into an act of Court, refers to a variety of opinions, given by counsel of this bar, respecting the validity of these papers, and also enters into a statement of certain facts and occurrences, from which, on the one hand, it is contended that Peter Wood ought not to be allowed again to propound these papers; and on the other, that nothing has happened to debar him from that right. Though the opinions given on either side concur that the papers are of no validity, yet, as Peter Wood has not been proved to have consented to be bound by those opinions, and as they cannot therefore be decisive of the present question, I shall not further notice them.

The question then is, whether Peter Wood, either as a matter of right or of equitable indulgence, ought to be permitted to set up the validity of these papers. In the first place, two papers are propounded, and if it were quite clear that Cundy was nominated executor of that under which Peter Wood claims, the Court would be justified in holding that, as appointee of the deceased, Cundy's act (unless collusion, of [658] which there is not a shadow of suspicion, could be shewn) would bind all persons interested under the asserted will: because the executor is not to be considered merely as the pars principalis or legitimus contradictor, but as the person especially selected by the deceased to carry his wishes into effect. But how does the fact stand on reference to the instruments themselves? [The Court here described the papers. Vide supra, pp. 140-2, and then continued]:

Now Peter Wood's claim is wholly under the first instrument, and the appointment of Cundy is made in the second scrap of paper; and it appears from both that the deceased clearly intended to appoint more executors than one. That this second paper has any reference to or connexion with the first, non constat; and unless that connexion is established, Mr. Cundy would not be the legitimus contradictor; for he would not be the executor of the former paper, under which alone, as I have said, Wood is interested. True it is that the decree extracted by Peter Wood calls on the administratrix to shew cause why Mr. Cundy should not be assigned to take out probate as executor; but that is the mere form in which he has been recommended to extract the process, and it may still be established that Mr. Cundy is not the executor. Mr. James Riddel Wood, who furnished information, and was consulted respecting the former suit, and was cognizant of, and privy to, every part of those proceedings, would unquestionably be bound by what then occurred: but the question with respect to Peter Wood is, whether he was legally [659] or de facto privy to the suit between Cundy and the Misses Medley. Not legally, because though one of the opinions recommended that a citation against all persons interested under the papers should be taken out, that course was not pursued; but the parties thought to go a shorter way to work. It remains then for him to shew that he was not de facto privy. If the intervention has not taken place at the earliest period, I should hold the party bound by the lis pendens; and as there was no reason why he should have intervened, his father and brother being both on the spot, I should not consider his bare non-intervention and non-citation sufficient grounds to justify the Court in permitting him to re-propound these papers, unless he can also shew that he was de facto and bonâ fide ignorant that there was a suit depending. He does not state when he was informed of the actual lis pendens. There is in his affidavit much room for mental reservation. The Court does not exactly arrive at what is his meaning; he does not state that he did not know, at the time, of his uncle's death; he does not state when, nor under what circumstances, information of the facts on which he now relies reached him, nor who are the agents from whom he received that information, nor what the facts are, so that the Court might judge for itself; nor does he even state that they have been laid before counsel as all the other facts have been: he says "that he did not in any way consent or make himself a party to any acts done by James Riddel Wood or John William Cundy, either during the dependance of the said pro-[660]-ceedings, or subsequent thereto;" but I rather collect from some other parts of the affidavits that he was aware of the proceedings. Now if it is quite clear that Peter Wood did know there was a suit pending, and chose to trust the protection of his interest to his father, to his brother, or to any other friend or adviser, he would be in strictness perhaps bound; still, as the Court in its discretion exercises a degree of indulgence towards parties out of the kingdom, and as what appears is not sufficient quite to convince me that he knew what was going forward, I do not feel imperatively called upon to uphold the protest without allowing a further opportunity of establishing his claim to the equitable consideration of the Court. I shall therefore allow the protest to stand over for the present, and adopting in some measure a suggestion of the learned counsel who spoke last, shall permit Peter Wood to bring in an allegation, on his making an affidavit shewing that he was ignorant of, and abroad during the pendency of, the former proceedings, and stating the time when the facts relied on to substantiate the validity of these papers first came to his knowledge: but he must understand that he does this at the certain peril of the full costs of calling in the administration, if he should ultimately fail in proving these papers entitled to probate.

The allegation might, and perhaps, indeed, ought to, have been brought in this day; but I direct it to be brought in on the next Court day. Perhaps, too, if Peter Wood had not been a party in distribution, the Court would have required from him a security for costs.

[661] Trinity Term, 3rd Session, 1828.—An executor having propounded papers in an allegation which was rejected, and administration being thereupon decreed to the next of kin; a legatee cannot be allowed to call in such administration, in order to repropound the same papers, unless he can bring in an admissible allegation, and shew by affidavit that the facts have come to his knowledge since the rejection of the former allegation: in which case semble that even the executor might repropound them.—An allegation repropounding two unfinished papers rejected, the facts not being sufficient to rebut the adverse presumption of law: and the administrator who appeared under protest dismissed with costs.—When an instrument is unfinished, its state must be accounted for; either by shewing completion prevented, or that the deceased, abandoning his intention of finishing it, meant it to operate in that form without any further act.

On admission of the allegation.

This allegation was, in substance, as follows:—

1. "That John Medley died on the 12th of August, 1827, a bachelor; leaving Ann and Priscilla Medley, spinsters, and also Susanna, wife of John Frost, his sisters and only next of kin; and together with several nephews and nieces, children of two deceased sisters, Mary, wife of Benjamin Jefford; and Elizabeth, wife of Peter Wood, the only persons entitled in distribution to his personal estate and effects, in case he had died intestate. That the deceased left no real property, and that his personal estate and effects consisted of £17,000 in the funds."

2. "That he was a person of very eccentric and retired habits; extremely penurious and reserved in respect to his affairs, and kept up very little intercourse with any of his relatives; that during the latter years of his life he resided entirely either at taverns or lodgings; and, when at the latter, he took his meals almost daily at some neighbouring tavern."

3. "That he for many years previous and up to the time of his death allowed to his sisters, Ann and Priscilla Medley, the yearly sum of £80 each; that he frequently expressed his intention of leaving them annuities for life only (they being elderly unmarried ladies), and that such his intentions were at all times known to the said two sisters, who were and [662] expressed themselves to be perfectly satisfied therewith."

4. "That for many years and till his death the deceased entertained a very unfavourable opinion of the conduct of John Frost, the husband of his sister Susanna, in consequence of his extravagant habits; and the deceased frequently declared that the said John Frost should not have the spending of any of his property."

5. "That the deceased at all times had a great affection for his nephews and nieces (Jefford and Wood); and frequently declared to divers persons that they would eventually come in for all his property, but not in equal proportions, as he intended to make a distinction in that respect in favour of one or two of them, without however, at such time, specifying which one or two in particular."

6. "That in October, 1824, the deceased wrote No. 1; and that not having named any executor thereof, he did some time afterwards, but when more particularly the party proponent is unable to set forth, with his own hand draw up No. 2. That the said paper writings contain together the last will and testament of the deceased, and were meant and intended by him to operate as and for his last will and testament. And that by such last mentioned paper he appointed John William Cundy sole executor of his will."

7. "This article pleaded the handwriting of the testamentary papers."

8. "That the deceased employed Capel, Cuertons, and Cundy as his stockbrokers; that he [663] placed great confidence in them (particularly in J. W. Cundy, his executor); and that he frequently deposited large sums of money in their hands, which they held as his bankers."

9. "That on the 10th of September, 1823, the deceased took up his residence at the Princess Charlotte Tavern, at which he wholly lived until July, 1825, when he quitted in consequence of its then proprietor retiring from the house. That during such his residence the deceased became much attached to, and took into his confidence, George Caines, the principal waiter in the tavern, and frequently expressed himself as extremely thankful to Caines for his kindness and attention, especially during several serious attacks of illness. That in August, 1826, the deceased, then resident in Arundel Street, having accidentally met Caines, proposed he should enter into his service in order constantly to attend upon him and accompany him in his walks; which Caines did, but shortly quitted the service from a want of suitable accommodation."

10. "That in the latter end of 1824, and whilst the deceased was living at the Princess Charlotte, he, being very unwell, requested Caines (as he had frequently done on former similar occasions) to come and sit with him after the business of the house was over, which Caines did, and remained talking with the deceased for a considerable time. That the deceased who, on such occasions, was and complained of being unusually ill, stated expressly to Caines, 'that happen what would to him, or die when he might, he had made [664] his will, or settled his affairs, and that his mind was quite easy in that respect.'"

11. "That in the beginning of June, 1825, he informed Caines it was his intention to go for a short time into the country, as he found his health still declining; and at the same time assured him that 'in the event of any thing happening to him (the deceased) his will was made, and his affairs finally settled.'"

12. "That he for many years previous to his death was on terms of the greatest intimacy and confidence with ——— Edwards, Esquire; that during the last two years of his life they met almost daily, and dined together at the Constitution Tavern. That, on very many of those occasions, he informed ——— Edwards 'that he had made his will, and thereby eventually bequeathed all his property to his nephews and nieces, but that one or two of them would take more than the rest.'"

13. "That in the latter end of May, 1827, the deceased was suddenly taken ill and deprived of his mental faculties; and that in consequence of such illness the said Ann and Priscilla Medley came to London; that, whilst at the deceased's lodgings, they wrote to Mr. Henry Edwards, a solicitor, and acquaintance, to request he would immediately come to them for the purpose of preparing a power of attorney to be executed by the deceased for receiving his dividends at the bank. That Henry Edwards accordingly attended at the deceased's lodgings; and that on such occasion Ann and Priscilla Medley brought down, from the deceased's desk, the paper-[665]-writings, No. 1 and 2, pleaded as aforesaid, and requested him to inform them 'whether it was a legal instrument?' That he replied 'they were imperfectly executed, and recommended that a more formal instrument should be prepared.' That Ann and Priscilla Medley well knew the contents of the said papers, and expressed themselves satisfied that such were conformable to the wishes of the deceased; and at the same time informed Henry Edwards that should the deceased be restored to a proper state of mind they would urge or recommend him formally to execute the same, or to make such or a similar will. That Henry Edwards again saw the said paper-writings on the following day; and that, on both occasions, they were pinned together. That the deceased continued, until his death, in a state both of body and mind which totally disqualified him from attending to, or comprehending, his affairs."

14. "That the said papers, when taken possession of by Ann and Priscilla Medley, were discovered in a pocket-book in the deceased's writing desk, wherein all his papers of value and his securities were deposited: that the pocket book contained two receipts signed by the deceased's sister Susanna (now Frost), the one dated 16th December, 1817, the day previous to her marriage, for £487, 10s.: and the other for £25. Also an acknowledgment from James Wood, a nephew, of the gift of £800, subject to 5 per cent. interest during the deceased's lifetime, bearing date the 7th of May, 1827."

[666] Lushington and Nicholl in objection. The party still persists in propounding No. 2, and probate is prayed to Cundy exactly as before: but the only ground of allowing this cause to be revived was the disconnexion of the two papers; yet, throughout this allegation, recognitions, custody, finding, are pleaded as applicable to both: all facts support the latter as well as the former. The expressions of intention go no further than the papers themselves; and it has already been decided that the papers shew only a passing intention, à fortiori then, declarations, which are much weaker, inasmuch as they may be more easily misunderstood, and more easily made. The affidavit is unsatisfactory. Wood does not state that he was abroad, which was required to be set forth. He says that the proceedings were instituted and conducted without his knowledge, but he does not say that he was ignorant of the pendency of the suit. It is perfectly consistent with the affidavit that he knew there was a suit, though he might not be aware of the parties to such suit, nor of the particular steps that were taken in it.

[The objections taken to the substance of the allegation were those referred to in the judgment of the Court.]

Phillimore and Addams contrà. The paper is certainly imperfect, but what is the doctrine of the Court in cases of this description? that the degree of proof must be in proportion to the imperfection of the instrument: it may, therefore, be more or less difficult of proof according to the circumstances. This [667] paper is capable of being sustained by extrinsic evidence, by the answers of the adverse party, and by the testimony of the witnesses who are vouched to establish the allegation. It is, in itself, more than a mere inception of a will; it disposes of the residue; and the heading of it, "This is the last will and testament of me John Medley," is very generally considered and adopted as tantamount to a signature; Burn, in his Ecclesiastical Law, and Blackstone furnish authorities to that effect; (a) and if it is so laid down in respect to real property, à fortiori it may easily be regarded as sufficient in a case of personalty only; and here there can be no doubt as to the fixed and final intentions of the testator. The character of the deceased was eccentric, and that may account for his having written his will on a passport. The affidavit has been objected to as not sufficient; it might easily have been drawn more specifically, and, no doubt, it would have been fully borne out by the facts.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. I am not clear that the Court ought to consider this allegation at all; for it appears that the papers, which are now brought forward, have been before propounded by Mr. Cundy, who then was, and still is, alleged to be the executor. Generally speaking, a legatee is bound by the act of the executor, and perhaps, [668] in the present instance, Mr. Wood might more especially be held bound, because in the former proceedings Mr. Cundy was assisted by another legatee, the brother of the present party. Thus the executor, who primâ facie is to be considered the pars principalis or legitimus contradictor, having failed in his endeavours to establish these papers, another legatee could not be allowed to assert their validity a second time, except on some special grounds: I say "except on some special grounds," because I do not mean to assert that an executor even, after having once propounded a paper, and been unsuccessful in shewing its title to probate, would in all possible cases be barred from re-propounding it, on proof that since its former rejection material facts had come to his knowledge.

The express condition then (as it also was the principal ground) on which the Court permitted, in this case, an allegation to be offered before it decided on the protest, was, that it should be accompanied by an affidavit that the facts were newly discovered, and that the party believed he should be able to make due proof of them.

The affidavit brought in, however, is extremely slight and loose, and does not at all satisfy the exigency of the case: but, passing over this preliminary objection, it would perhaps be more satisfactory to the party if I proceeded to consider the allegation. In so doing, the Court can have but little doubt as to its decision, more particularly as it must bear in mind that the application being special, the facts to support it must be special also.

The averments do not, in substance, differ [669] very widely from those contained in the original allegation. The only additional circumstances which could possibly be esteemed material, or have any weight, are certain declarations made to a waiter and to a tavern friend. The first eight articles, besides stating the number of the deceased's relations, the amount of his property, his habits, his mode of life, and the making and handwriting of these papers, plead the state of his affections and regard for the different parts of his family; all which were to be inferred from, and do not go beyond, the papers themselves, and must, I presume, have been known when the former allegation was given in: if indeed they have come to the party's knowledge since he was bound, under the circumstances in which they are offered, to have specified the time and place at which he became first apprised of them.

The paper itself does prove what his testamentary intentions were at the time it was written, and is evidence of the disposition then contemplated: it is, as has been observed, fairly written, and contains a full disposition of his property, but it is not without some erasures, and there is a blank for the amount of his annual income, which it is a little singular he should not have ascertained, if he had finally determined that this disposition should take effect. It is, however, pretty fairly written, but it is not subscribed: it is said that is not necessary; and, for some purposes, that may be so: but where there is no subscription there is the absence of one of the strongest proofs that the paper is finished, and that is the [670] reason why the circumstance always has effect in this Court. The paper upon its face is not a will, but a writing preparatory to a will—a draft to be copied: it is written on the back of a passport—whether new or old is of little importance, but it does certainly appear rather of a fair colour. It is hardly credible—at all events it is highly improbable—that a man, however eccentric or however penurious, would choose such a material of which to form the very instrument that he intended to operate: the presumption would be strong against it even if more finished. It must be considered as a preparatory draft: it is manifestly imperfect: it concludes "I appoint my executors," and none are appointed: this is most decisive that he intended to do more—that he proposed to name more than one executor.

Here is another paper—a little scrap: supposing it to have been pinned to the first, what does it shew, but that he intended to appoint executors, of whom Mr. Cundy was to be one: who the other was to be, the deceased was still deliberating; he might even be undecided about Mr. Cundy, for it does not appear that he ever spoke to that gentleman on the subject. I cannot consider that this was any recognition of the first paper, amounting to proof of his having finally made up his mind. The papers then are clearly upon the face of them unfinished, and not only unfinished, but are merely preparatory to some other instrument.

The rule of the Court, which is clearly established, and which I think ought to be most carefully followed, is, that where an instrument [671] is unfinished, you must account for its state, either by shewing that the deceased was prevented from completing, or by shewing that he had abandoned the intention of finishing it, meaning that it should operate in that very form, without any further act.

The paper No. 1 is dated two years and a half before the deceased's death: it is quite obvious, therefore, that he was not prevented from finishing it; he might at any day or hour during these two years and a half have appointed executors, have signed it, and, if he wished, have had it attested. That he was prevented from so doing, however, is not the case set up: but it comes to the other point, that he did not mean to appoint executors, except as by paper No. 2, but intended the instruments to operate in their present form. Now that they were found in his pocket-book, in conjunction with other papers, some bearing date as far back as 1817, some as recently as May, 1827, in no way accounts for his not intending to give them a more formal and complete effect, nor affords any ground to believe that he wished, meant, or considered them to be operative, and to take effect as his final will. This is so contradictory to the papers themselves, and so highly improbable, notwithstanding his eccentricity, that nothing short of the most positive and direct circumstances would be sufficient to establish that such was his intention.

These declarations, that he had made his will, would be utterly insufficient and extremely unsafe grounds on which to proceed. Declarations at all times, unless coupled with acts, [672] are very loose and dangerous evidence—are liable to be insincere—liable to be misapprehended—liable to be misrepresented: but in this case, as has been observed, these declarations do not apply, and have no direct reference to this instrument in particular. If this paper had been produced to his friends and he had said he did not intend to appoint executors, and wished this instrument in its present form to operate, the case would have borne a different aspect; but the declarations pleaded might as well apply to some other instrument which the deceased may afterwards have thought proper to destroy. The first declaration, as pleaded in the tenth article of the allegation, was made about the time of writing the paper, that is, three or four years ago: and on this the Court is asked to believe that the deceased had finally settled his affairs. The other, in the eleventh article, is pretty much to the same effect. The remaining declarations are those made to a person of the name of Edwards, of whom Mr. Wood is able in this allegation to set forth neither the Christian name nor residence. This declaration does bear a reference more connected with the substance of this paper, but it does not identify it, for it is probable enough that if he had made a will, it would be something of this effect: but it would be unsafe in the extreme to the rights of property, and to the interests of the next of kin if upon these general declarations, not applying to a particular instrument, and made to a waiter or tavern acquaintance, the presumptions of law relating to an instrument so manifestly unfinished could be repelled.

[673] The other circumstance, the impressions of the sisters at the finding, does not supply the defects. Even supposing the affidavit to have been completely satisfactory, that the facts were noviter perventa, or, putting the case still more favourably, supposing the circumstances had been laid in an allegation tendered immediately after the deceased's death; still this plea would not compose a case sufficient to sustain the instrument propounded; and I am still of opinion that the deceased is dead intestate.

I therefore reject the allegation and allow the protest.

Lushington prayed that Mr. Wood might be condemned in costs.

Per Curiam. I can see no reason why, after the executor had been before the Court, and the other brother also had been watching the proceedings, the administration which had gone out should have been called in. No affidavit of stringency has been laid before the Court to justify the proceedings. If the case had been brought forward at first, the expences of it would, as in the original cause, have been allowed out of the estate. I do not think that I can, consistently with what is due to the rights of those in possession of an administration, now refuse to condemn Mr. Wood in costs; but I leave it to the discretion of the other parties to decide whether they think fit to press for them.

Allegation rejected with costs.

[674] DRAPER v. HITCH AND OTHERS. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 30th June, 1828.—A married woman having under a certain settlement and also under her mother's codicil made a will, and, under her mother's codicil, specifically and under "all and every other power," &c. &c. generally, made a second will with a general revocatory clause; the Court of Probate will grant a general administration with the latter will annexed, but not pronounce against the former will; leaving it to the Court of Construction to decide whether the former will is thereby revoked.—In the Court of Probate an ambiguity on the face of a paper as to the factum: e.g. whether a revocatory clause was intended to operate as a general or only as a partial revocation, lets in parol evidence.—In order to the admission of parol evidence in a Court of Probate, to explain an ambiguity upon the factum of an instrument, the ambiguity must be on the face of the paper; and the facts to be proved must completely remove that ambiguity.

This was a cause (promoted by Carter Draper, an executor in a will dated the 9th of April, 1824) of bringing into and leaving in the registry of the Prerogative Court certain letters of administration (with the will, dated the 19th of October, 1824, annexed) of the effects of Ann Branen (wife of George Branen), deceased, heretofore granted (with the husband's consent) by the authority of this Court, to Elizabeth Hitch, spinster, the sole executrix; and of shewing cause why the administration should not be revoked, and probate granted to her, limited only to the estate and effects of which the deceased had power to dispose by virtue of her mother's, Ann Jordis', second codicil (and which she had by her said will disposed of accordingly), or under such limitations as the Court might appoint; and of proving in solemn form of law the will bearing date the 9th of April, 1824.

On the part of Draper an allegation, consisting of seven articles, was given in. The first pleaded in substance as follows:—

1. That Ann Branen died on the 30th of August, 1825, without issue, leaving her husband; Elizabeth Lee, spinster, her sister; and Mary (wife of George Wilson), formerly Freeman, her niece, the only persons who would have been entitled to her personal estate in case she had died intestate and unmarried.

[675] 2. That by a settlement, dated the 20th of October, 1817, made between Ann Jordis, widow; her daughter Ann Branen (the deceased); and divers trustees, it was witnessed that certain stock should be held in trust for Mrs. Branen during her life, for her separate use independent of her husband: and from and after her decease upon further trust for her issue; but if no issue, then subject to her appointment by will for any person other than her husband; and in default of such appointment, or of a complete disposition of the trust money, then as to such part thereof, to which such direction, limitation, or appointment should not extend upon trust for the next of kin, who should be then living, of Ann Jordis; to be divided between them according to the statutes of distribution.

3. That Ann Jordis duly executed her will with two codicils; and by the second codicil, dated the 24th of December, 1817, after reciting a certain disposition of her property under her will, revoked the bequest, and directed, in case Mrs. Branen died without issue, that the same should be subject, but in exclusion of her husband, to her appointment by will, notwithstanding coverture. This article further pleaded the death of Ann Jordis in the lifetime of her daughter without having altered or revoked this codicil, and that probate of the said will and codicils had been granted by this Court.

4. That the will, pleaded on behalf of Carter Draper, was duly made and executed by Ann [676] Branen in exercise and by virtue of the powers and authorities vested in her as already set forth in the second and third articles.

5. "That Ann Branen, some time after the execution of her said will (as pleaded in the next preceding article), did, under the advice of her husband, consent to revoke the disposition which she had made by it, so far as respected the bequest to her under her mother's second codicil, and to make a further appointment thereof; that the conveyancer, to whom instructions were delivered to prepare a will therefrom, not being aware that the deceased was empowered to dispose of any other property besides that bequeathed to her by her mother's codicil, inserted in the will of the 19th of October, 1824, a clause that the deceased did thereby revoke and make void all former wills by her made; (a)[1] that she did unwittingly execute the said will without understanding the effect of the clause, and without having any intention to revoke the disposition which she had made by her former will, save and except so far as respected the property which she was authorized to dispose [677] of under the second codicil to the will of Ann Jordis, deceased." The King's advocate and Phillimore for Mr. Draper.

[678] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. When the allegation in this case was admitted the Court did not in the slightest degree intend to depart from the principles recognized in Lady Bath's case: (a)[3] viz. that in order to justify the admission of parol evidence to explain an ambiguity upon the factum of an instrument the ambiguity must be on the face of the paper; and further, the facts alleged and to be proved must completely remove that ambiguity. The Court therefore cautiously reserved all questions, and said, with reference to the asserted ambiguity, that it would be more satisfactory to have the evidence laid before it. I am very glad that I took that course; because, as far as the Court can rely on the evidence, it was decidedly the intention of the deceased to revoke the former will: whether the instrument, which purports to be her last will and testament, will have that effect and will give Mrs. Hitch all the property, it is not for this Court to decide.

(a)[1] The will, after reciting the second codicil of Mrs. Jordis' will, contained these passages: "Now in pursuance and exercise of the power and authority given to or vested in me in and by the said codicil, and of all and every other power and authority powers and authorities whatsoever enabling me in this behalf I do by this my last will and testament," &c., &c. "and I do hereby nominate, constitute and appoint the said Elizabeth Hitch the sole executrix of this my will, and I do hereby revoke all former and other wills by me at any time heretofore made and declare this to be my last will and testament."

(a)[2] This allegation was debated on the 7th of May: and, on the part of Miss Lee and Mrs. Wilson, the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, 4th, and 6th articles were admitted; except as to the 1st article they stated, that Elizabeth Lee was the lawful aunt, and not the sister; and that Mary Wilson was the cousin-german, and not the niece of the deceased. The fifth article alone was opposed.

Per Curiam. The Court was of opinion that there was on the face of this will such an ambiguity as opened the door to parol evidence; and—considering that it was made under a power by a married woman, and prepared through the immediate agency of her husband and without her having direct communication with the conveyancer—allowed the allegation to go to proof, reserving all questions.

Allegation admitted.

(a)[3] Fawcett v. Jones and Pulteney, 3 Phill. 434.

What are the circumstances? The deceased and her husband go to the office of Mr. Chapman, a conveyancer, near Chancery Lane: he is out of town; but the husband introduces Mrs. Branen as his wife to one of the clerks who was well known to him. The clerk receives the instructions, admitted to be in the handwriting [679] of Mrs. Branen, and which are of the following tenor:—

"In the name of God Amen—I Anne Branen of 24 Canterbury Place Lambeth being in perfect health sound mind memory and Understanding Do make and publish this as and for my last Will and Testament In manner following. I give devise and Bequeath unto my friend Eliz^th^ Hitch of John Street Islington her Heirs Exor. Admors. and Assigns for ever all my Property of whatsoever nature or kind it may be In the Publick Funds or elsewhere and all my goods Chattels Moneys and Estate whatsoever and wheresoever whereto I am entitled either at Law or equity And I do hereby revoke all former Wills by me at any time heretofore made Declaring this to be my last Will and Testament And I do hereby appoint the said Elizabeth Hitch Sole Executrix of this my Will. "ANN BRANEN."

Nothing can be more clear and distinct than that, by this instrument, she did intend to revoke the former will, and to give to Mrs. Hitch the whole of that property over which she had a power of disposal.

Myers, the clerk, has been examined; and he says: "When he had looked at the instructions he observed 'that Mrs. Branen being a married woman she could not make a will;' whereupon Mr. Branen said to his wife, 'You have a power to do so,' which she acquiescing [680] in, he added, 'You must give it to me.' Deponent said it would be necessary for Mr. Chapman to have the power. That in a few days the husband called and left with deponent a copy of the will and codicils of a Mrs. Jordis by which Mrs. Branen was enabled to make a will."

The copy of the will and codicils of Mrs. Jordis then are only produced to satisfy Myers' demand: no allusion is originally made to them as the authority under which this will is to be executed: so that the case stands as if the instructions had been given without reference to any particular instrument, and for no other possible intention but with a view both to a general disposition and to a general revocation.

In the course of these communications with the conveyancer's clerk no mention is made that Mrs. Branen had executed a former will; but from the written instructions and from Mrs. Jordis' second codicil a draft is prepared, which is given to Branen, who, after some days, returns it, and says his wife had approved of it, and would call and execute the will when it was ready. At the execution the clerk says: "He read the whole contents of the will over to Mrs. Branen, including the clause of revocation, and that no observation was made upon it:" and on an interrogatory he states: "That nothing passed to lead him to believe, either previous to the execution or in allusion to the will, dated the 19th of October, 1824, that it was, at that time, the intention of the testatrix to make a will limited in its operation to part only of the property over which [681] she had a disposing power; but, on the contrary, he firmly believes that she fully intended it to be her last and only will, and to operate over all her property."

How can this Court say that here is such an ambiguity as will authorize it to set aside the revocatory clause? It is bound to confirm the general grant. What may be the decision of other Courts, to which the construction of the due execution of such powers properly belongs, I cannot undertake to say. It will appear upon the face of the papers that the revocatory instrument does not specifically refer to the power under which the former will was made.(a) On the effect of that circumstance I do not decide. This Court will be governed by the ordinary principles of testamentary law and the manifest intention of the testator, in the absence of any clear authority establishing a different rule applicable to this case.

I therefore direct the general administration with the latter will annexed to be delivered out, but I do not pronounce against the former will.

(a) By the former will, viz. that of the 9th of April, 1824, Mrs. Branen disposed of the property under the settlement, as well as under her mother's codicil; but the will only recited generally, "Whereas I am enabled, notwithstanding my coverture, to dispose of my property by will I do hereby," &c. For the revocatory clause in the will of October, 1824, see ante, p. 677, note (a).

[682] In the Goods of Sarah Blakelock. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 4th Session, 1828.—The executors having died in the deceased's lifetime, a joint limited administration, with the will of a married woman under a power annexed, granted to five residuary legatees, to whom a similar grant had been made at York, the forum domicilii, and who were all parties to a suit in Chancery.

On motion.

Sarah Blakelock, late of Chapel Allerton in the parish of Leeds, by virtue of her marriage settlement made her will, and thereof appointed her husband and John Charlesworth executors: she also appointed five residuary legatees.

The King's advocate, after stating that the executors died in the lifetime of the deceased, and the five residuary legatees had been admitted joint administrators, with the will annexed, by the Court at York, the forum domicilii of the deceased, and were parties to a suit in Chancery, moved, under the circumstances, for a limited administration to the same parties, though it was contrary to the ordinary practice of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury to join more than three in an administration.

Motion granted.

[683] Loton v. Loton. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 4th Session, 1828.—A diocesan administration obtained by one next of kin directed to be brought in, and pronounced null and void on the prayer of another next of kin who had taken out a prerogative administration: the diocesan administrator being personally cited and shewing no cause to the contrary.

On motion.

John Loton, late of Acton Beauchamp, in the county of Worcester, died in July, 1827, a bachelor, without parent, and intestate. On the 31st of August his brother John took out letters of administration in the Consistorial and Episcopal Court of Worcester; and on the 26th of April, 1828, administration of the deceased's effects was granted by the Prerogative Court of Canterbury to Edward Loton, another brother: and at his instance a decree had issued from this Court, which, after setting forth "that the deceased had, at the time of his death, goods, chattels and credits in divers dioceses or peculiar jurisdictions sufficient to found the jurisdiction of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, cited John Loton to bring into and leave in the registry of this Court the pretended letters of administration which had been granted to him; and to shew cause why the same should not be declared null and void, as having been unduly obtained."

This decree was personally served on the fifth of June, and on this day, at the motion of [684] Dodson, the Court desired the diocesan administration to be brought in, and pronounced it null and void.

Motion granted.(a)

Peddle v. Evans. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 4th Session, 1828.—The Court will not direct the deputy-registrar to allow the solicitor of a party, who has a new proctor, to be present at the examination by consent of the bill of costs of his former proctor: such an attendance being unusual and unnecessary to the purposes of justice.—Bills of costs between a proctor and his party are of common law cognizance; the Ecclesiastical Court has no jurisdiction over them; the examination of such bills by the deputy-registrar is only by consent and ex gratiâ; and neither party is thereby bound as to the amount.—The Ecclesiastical Court can enforce the payment of costs where one party is condemned in costs to the other party; and such costs are then taxed by the Judge, in open Court, on the report of the deputy-registrar, subject to objection from either party.—When a party regularly complains of gross extortion by his proctor, the Court may punish the proctor by suspension or otherwise.

On motion.

(a) This motion had been previously made on the third session; but on the statement of the defendant's proctor, that the Stamp Office invariably requires both administrations to be produced before it will restore the duty on an erroneous grant, and that it will not make the allowance upon a certificate from the registrars of the Prerogative Court, the Court permitted the motion to stand over, in order that the prerogative administrator might be applied to for the use of his administration to enable the defendant to recover the amount of the stamp on the diocesan grant. The prerogative administrator, however, refused to accede to the defendant's application.

Lee moved; referring to the 2 Geo. 2, c. 23, § 10, 21, 23; (a)[1] to the case of Garnett v. Ferrand, 6 B. & C. 611; and to the 134th, 135th, 137th canons.

Per Curiam. The nature of the present application seems to be totally misapprehended by all the parties concerned in it. Here is no suit depending; [685] here are no parties amenable to the Court. The application is, that the Court shall direct the deputy-registrar to allow a solicitor employed by Mr. Peddle to attend the taxation (as it is called) of his own proctor's bill. It is a matter ex gratiâ to allow a bill of costs between proctor and client to be examined by the officer of the Court: this Court cannot enforce the payment of any one item, nor has it a right to take off and disallow any one charge: it has no jurisdiction in respect to the payment, and if it attempted to exercise any, Courts of Common Law would interfere by prohibition. For what is the case? A suit was depending in this Court, described Peddle v. Evans; in Trinity Term, 1824, sentence was given; an appeal was prosecuted to the Delegates; the sentence was affirmed, and the cause remitted: (a)[2] each party had to pay his own costs, except that, on some intermediate step in the Delegates, Peddle was condemned in costs: thus the suit was ended. Some question has since arisen between Peddle and his own proctor as to the amount of the proctor's charges. This Court cannot decide that question. The proctor, if his bill still remains unliquidated, must sue for the amount at common law: if the bill has been already paid, the party, Peddle, must also proceed in the Temporal Courts to recover back any overcharge. This Court, I [686] again repeat, has no jurisdiction whatever to compel payment between a proctor and his client.(a)[3]

Where a party is condemned in costs to the other party, and it is a question between party and party, this Court can then enforce the payment of such costs; and accordingly it refers the matter to the deputy-registrar for his examination; the deputy-registrar, after hearing the parties or their proctors on both sides, reports the amount to the Judge in open Court, who himself, unless one or both of the parties prays to be heard on his or their petition in objection to the deputy-registrar's report, taxes the bill at that amount: then whether the party is liable to costs and to what extent, when condemned, forms a portion of the suit between the two parties; but costs between either party and his own proctor do not stand on the same footing: they are no part of the suit, nor within the jurisdiction of the Court. But if it is intended to sue for the costs at law, or if any dispute arises on the application of either party, the Court will, in aid of justice, allow the bill to be taxed, or, more properly speaking, looked over and examined by the deputy-registrar; for, in that case, he makes no report to the Court. The proctor will then better know what to sue for, and the client what to tender, as the proper amount of compensation: it is a matter of convenience to all parties.

[687] To proceed then to the present case. There seems to have arisen a dispute between Peddle and his own proctor as to the amount of his bill. The proctor consents to refer his bill to the deputy-registrar; the deputy-registrar is ready to undertake the trouble in the usual way. The Court and the deputy-registrar do this for the guidance of the parties rather than strictly as a part of their duty in administering the functions of this Court; for, as before stated, the Court has really no authority to allow or to disallow, nor the deputy-registrar to report; nor is either party legally bound by such report. It is rather a business in camerâ than in curiâ; it is a mere private voluntary reference. I do not say that in an attempt at gross extortion by a proctor against a client the Court (upon a regular complaint in proper form by the client) has not such an authority over one of its practitioners, as for such an act, to correct the practitioner by suspension or otherwise, as the justice of the case might require; (a)[4] but that is not the shape of the present applica-

(a)[4] Prerog., 19th March, 1823.—In The Goods of Gillart, on complaint that a proctor's charge for a de bonis non administration was exorbitant, the bill was referred to the deputy-registrar, for examination; and on their report that £10, 14s. 8d. had been

tion is only that the deputy-registrar may be directed to permit a solicitor's attendance at what is improperly termed the taxation. The proctor is willing to have his [688] bill examined by the deputy-registrar. The deputy-registrar is ready to undertake the duty; but the party desires that this examination may be conducted in an unusual and unprecedented way: he has a proctor, a new proctor, to attend the examination; but he insists that his solicitor may also attend. All the deputy-registrars say that this is unusual, and they decline adopting this novel course.

This Court knows nothing of a solicitor in a cause; he has no more right to appear or to do any act in a cause in these Courts than a proctor has in Courts of Common Law or of Equity. The solicitor has no more to do with the examination of the items of a bill than any other stranger or witness. The deputy-registrar is only to hear a party or his proctor. And when acts of Parliament are quoted to shew that attorneys of one Court may practise in another Court, or that other persons, besides the parties, may attend at taxation, it should be remembered that these acts apply only to the Courts in Westminster Hall, and that the very enactments shew that it was an accorded privilege, and not of common right.

I think the deputy-registrar, therefore, acting in concurrence with the other two deputy-registrars, did what he had a right to do in not admitting this claim, and in refusing to set up such a precedent.

It is said, however, that the solicitor is also Mr. Peddle's witness: but then he must be content to be treated as any other witness: he must give his evidence by making his affidavit; [689] he is only to be heard upon oath; he may put his proctor in possession of all facts and objections, and if the proctor wants proof of facts he may consult the solicitor and get his affidavit. It is further said that Peddle's ignorance, and that his proctor's delicacy towards the former proctor, would prevent the charges being thoroughly sifted. As to the former, the question is merely one of facts whether such and such business has been done as to which the solicitor might make an affidavit; or of figures, to which surely Peddle, an exciseman, is not incompetent; and as to the proctor's delicacy, this Court trusts that no proctor would be prevented from the discharge of such a duty to his client by delicacy towards any member of the profession.

The new proctor has allowed his party and the attorney to make a long affidavit, going into much extraneous matter, and has put his client to much unnecessary expence.(a)[1] No costs have thereby, however, been occasioned to any other person, otherwise I might give the costs [690] of the present application against the party making it, or against the proctor framing and tendering such an affidavit.(a)[2]

On the whole, the party must be content to have his bill examined in the usual mode: it is not a case where the Court is warranted in deviating from the established practice and in setting up a new rule, by compelling the deputy-registrar to admit the solicitor. I therefore reject the application.

Motion refused.

taken off from a charge of £19, 14s. 4d. the proctor was directed to attend in Court and shew cause why he should not be suspended; and the Judge, having heard his explanation, suspended him for a year.

(a)[1] The Court refused to allow the affidavit to be read in open Court, as it contained irrelevant and improper matter. The Judge, however, stated that he had read it himself, and said that the counsel might make use of such parts of it as were limited to the real question before the Court: viz. whether the deputy-registrar was justified in refusing to permit a solicitor's attendance at taxation.

In Le Heup, Ex parte, 18 Ves. 223, the Lord Chancellor said: "No doubt is expressed at the Bar upon the jurisdiction to direct a reference to the Master to inquire into alleged scandal in an affidavit filed in the Court and offered to the Master; whether read or not I am not informed. I have reason to believe that in my own decision, Ex parte Simpson, and so in lunacy, I am sanctioned by precedents of Lord Hardwicke; but without that authority I should have thought it right to make the precedent."

In Ex parte Simpson, 15 Ves. 476, the affidavits were ordered to be taken off the file as irrelevant and scandalous, with costs against the attorney. See also Anonymous, 3 V. & B. 93.

By-Day.—The Court will not hear, on an ex parte motion and on affidavits, a case where offences are charged and punishment prayed.

Sir John Nicholl. Before the regular business of the day is entered upon, I wish first to dispose of a matter that has been brought under my notice. A paper has been sent into the registry and thence transmitted to the Judge; and it is entitled Peddle v. Evans; In the Goods of Evan Evans, Deceased. There is no such cause outstanding. Evans, at all events, is in no way before the Court. A proctor has no right to send in a motion in a cause not existing. This paper is accompanied by an affidavit attested by the same proctor. I have read that affidavit as I read the former affidavit; but I shall not [691] permit it to be read in Court; because I will not allow the Court to be made a vehicle of publishing unfounded imputations upon its officers or practitioners. An application is now made which is extremely irregular. I must censure the proctor for having made it. A proctor is not to make an application merely because a dissatisfied suitor and his solicitor desire it: the proctor is responsible; he owes a duty to the Court, to his profession, and to his own character. If censure will not stop him, and he again repeats such an improper application, the Court must resort to stronger means, viz. suspension.

I have read the case; and the motion, in my judgment, is not fit to be made: for which opinion I will assign my reasons publicly. The case suggests charges of offences and prays punishment, viz. "that the principal registrars may be suspended as well as the deputy-registrars for their offences [as set forth in the affidavit], and that fit persons may be appointed to tax the bills of proctors for the time to come; and that the said registrars or their deputies be condemned in the costs of this application." If these persons have been guilty of any offences for which they are liable to punishment, it is not by an ex parte motion on affidavits that they are to be proceeded against: such a step would be an act of gross injustice. This application is so irregular, that, if granted, it would, I conceive, infer malice in the Court, and render it liable to an action, even though acting judicially. At present I only consider this motion as a pretext for making attacks on [692] the officers of the Court. I have no difficulty for these reasons in refusing to hear the motion argued by counsel. If the Court is wrong the party must seek his remedy elsewhere; but I will not allow the regular business of the suitors to be interrupted by such a matter.

Let the deputy-registrar call the first cause.

IN THE GOODS OF MARY KEANE. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, By-Day, 1828.—Administration granted to the nephew on the renunciation of his father, the brother, and sole next of kin of the deceased.

On motion.

The King's advocate moved "that administration be granted to the Rev. Charles Edmund Keane, the nephew, upon the renunciation of Benjamin Keane (his father), the brother, and only next of kin of Mary Keane, the intestate." The nephew had no interest; yet to whom else could the grant be decreed? the deceased's brother, the sole next of kin, had waived his right; and being resident within the province it could not pass for his use and benefit to his attorney.

Per Curiam. Let the administration issue in the terms of the motion.

Motion granted.

[693] VALLANCE v. VALLANCE AND OTHERS. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, By-Day, 1828.—The original will being lost and no copy in existence, a limited administration with the will (contained in an affidavit) annexed granted to the widow, as executrix and residuary legatee for life, on her giving justifying security: the eldest son having being personally cited; two other children, minors and abroad, cited by a service on the Royal Exchange, and the remaining five consenting.

On motion.

William Vallance, late of Bermondsey, Surrey, died in October, 1814; he left a widow and eight children, the only persons entitled in distribution in case of his intestacy.

In the beginning of October, 1814, the deceased, in the presence and hearing of his wife, of one of his four younger children, and of two other persons, dictated his last will to his medical attendant, who immediately committed the same to writing, and then read it over to the deceased, when it was duly executed.

By this will, after bequeathing a suit of mourning to his eldest son, he left the residue of his estate and effects to his widow for life, and upon her death, in equal proportions, to his four younger children. He appointed his widow and John Hosier executors.

Upon the death of the testator his widow delivered the will to Mr. Hosier; but in his lifetime, on account of the embarrassed state of the deceased's affairs, no steps were taken to prove it. Mrs. Vallance was now anxious to take probate; she had recently been informed that the sum of £112, to which her late husband was [694] entitled, might be recovered; and had applied to the solicitor of the representative of the late Mr. Hosier for the will; but it could not be found; there was no copy in existence; and the attesting witnesses were dead.

Upon an affidavit of these circumstances a decree with intimation had issued against the children to shew cause why probate of the substance of this will, as contained in the affidavit, should not be granted, under the usual limitations, to the lawful relict and executrix. This decree was personally served on the eldest son; it was also affixed to the Royal Exchange, as two of the children were minors and abroad.

A proxy of consent had been signed by all the children in England, except the eldest son; and Phillimore now moved that probate should pass according to the decree.

Per Curiam. It would be dangerous to decree this probate merely on the affidavit of interested parties without requiring security; but the Court sees no objection to the grant of an administration with the will, as contained in the affidavit, annexed, limited until the original is produced; provided the widow gives justifying security.

Limited administration decreed.

[695] IN THE GOODS OF JAMES THOMAS. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, By-Day, 1828.—In order to the grant of probate, in common form, of an unfinished paper, there must be, first, affidavits stating such a case as if proved by depositions would establish the paper; and, secondly, consent, implied or express, from all parties interested.

On motion.

James Thomas died on the 13th of January, 1828, and left a widow and seven children. By a testamentary paper he appointed his wife universal legatee, sole executrix, and guardian of his children during their minorities. He left no real estate; and the personal property did not exceed £160. Of this instrument, as the last will of the deceased, Pickard moved for probate.

Per Curiam. This paper, in the deceased's own handwriting, giving every thing to the wife, is written on a small octavo half-sheet; and begins in a formal manner: "This is the last will and testament of me James Thomas of Topsham:" it is signed, has an attestation clause, but no subscribing witnesses; and the paper concludes in these terms: "In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal this," &c. There is, however, no seal, nor date; though it is clear that the deceased intended there should be both, as well as that the paper should be witnessed: it therefore is unfinished. An attempt is now made to take probate of this instrument simply on affidavits. What do they establish? Challis, a neighbour of the de-[696]-ceased, and in habits of intimacy with him, says "that he, some time about the end of October, 1827, in speaking with the deceased about wills, informed him that, as he had no freehold property, there could be no occasion for any witnesses to his will:" this then takes place three months before the death of Thomas, and, according to the wife's account, before the paper was written. The remainder of this affidavit is made jointly with Pledge, and is merely to handwriting. The other affidavit is sworn by the wife, a party greatly interested: she says "that the will was written by the deceased on the 30th of December while he was confined to his bed-room; that he gave it to her to read, when she requested him to send for two witnesses, and that he replied, 'Challis had told him no witnesses were required;' that the deceased then signed the paper and put it into his desk:" she further says "that on the day before he died he lamented to her that his will was not witnessed, but trusted from what Challis had told him that it would do as it was."

This is a dangerous affidavit: the party is interested; the paper perhaps was written to please the wife; the Court cannot exclude the children on her evidence: there is not sufficient to satisfy the regular demands of the Court, viz. first, affidavits stating such a case as if proved by depositions would establish the paper; and, secondly, consent implied or express from all parties interested: (a)[1] here [697] no consent can be given for the minor children; and if the Court were to grant probate, the executrix would give no security; and the children would be entirely at her mercy: while if the deceased were held to be dead intestate, administration might be granted to the widow, and she would then give security.

Motion refused.

TALBOT v. ANDREWS. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, By-Day, 1828.—Administration granted to one creditor, a decree, with intimation, having issued in the name of another.

On motion.

Robert Andrews died in January, 1828, intestate; he left an only daughter, solely entitled to his personal estate.

A decree having been personally served upon her, to shew cause why administration should not be granted to Mr. Talbot, a creditor, it was discovered that it would be of no avail for him to take the grant, as he was already party to a suit in which an appearance for the administrator of Andrews' estate was required. In consequence of this, an affidavit of debt was made by Robert Kipling, another creditor of the deceased's estate; and Pickard, referring to Maidman v. All Persons in General,(a)[2] moved for administration to be granted, on the original decree, to Mr. Kipling.

Motion granted.

[698] IN THE GOODS OF JOHN EDMONDS. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, By-Day, 1828.—The Court will not on affidavit grant probate of an imperfect paper unless all parties interested are consenting or cited.

On motion.

The deceased died on the 4th of June, 1828, a widower, leaving fourteen cousins-german (two abroad) his sole next of kin. A testamentary paper, in his own handwriting, dated the 19th of April, 1828, was found at his death: by this paper he had appointed Elizabeth Smith (his niece by marriage, and who resided with him) and Isaac Hanson executors: they were also the only legatees, and there was no disposition of the residue. This paper was signed, but there were no signatures to the attestation clause.

Curteis moved for probate, upon the affidavits of the executors, and of Mr. Goddard, a solicitor, that the deceased was ignorant of the effect of an attestation clause; and that he expressed, to the latest day of his life, an anxiety that his will should take effect. Annexed to the affidavits was a letter from Mr. Goddard to the deceased, informing him that, in a will merely of personal property, subscribing witnesses were not absolutely required.

Per Curiam. Here is a slight presumption against this paper which it is necessary to remove: the affi-[699]-davits, however, shew fully that the deceased intended it to operate without being attested, having been informed that no witnesses were necessary. But these affidavits are made by parties interested, and there is no proxy of consent, nor notice to the next of kin; and the Court cannot depart from the rule that when application for a probate is made on ex parte affidavits, all parties interested must be consenting or cited.

Motion to stand over.

Note.—On the second session of Michaelmas Term, no appearance being given to a decree duly served in respect to the next of kin, who were abroad; and a proxy of consent, from the next of kin who were in England, being exhibited; the Court granted the probate.

Motion granted.

SKEFFINGTON v. WHITE. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, By-Day, 1828.—Where administration was granted in 1791, on the renunciation of the next of kin, to a creditor who died in 1806; when no de bonis grant was taken out till March, 1827, and when an administration, limited to certain leasehold property, and granted at that time (without citing the next of kin) to a nominee of the persons in possession of such property, was in February, 1828, called in by the representative of the next of kin; such representative held barred by time and circumstances, and the administrator, who appeared under protest, dismissed with costs.

Dodson and Haggard contrà.

[700] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a very long petition going into a variety of details and accompanied by numerous affidavits, though a few only of the circumstances and dates are sufficient for the decision of the present question. The facts are these:—

Thomas Hubbert died a bachelor in August, 1790, nearly forty years ago, leaving two sisters solely entitled in distribution: they renounced, and probably had very good reasons for such renunciation; and in February, 1791, administration was decreed to Alexander Hubbert, his partner, as a creditor. Alexander administered the estate for sixteen years, till his death in 1806: and, as was truly stated, the sisters might then have come in and taken administration de bonis non: but they did not; and from that time until last year no further representation was taken out. The deceased's estate, I have every reason to be satisfied, was insolvent; for it appears that the administrator entered into a composition with the creditors, who agreed to take fifteen shillings in the pound. As an additional circumstance it should also be remembered that during the lifetime of Alexander Hubbert no account was called for by the sisters, who were entitled to the surplus, if any surplus remained.

The deceased was possessed of some leasehold property at Bermondsey. The beneficial interest in these leases passed through several hands by arrangements and mortgages; but it is not necessary for the purposes of the present [701] question to trace out all the different transfers, nor is this Court competent to decide in whom the title to these premises, legal or equitable, is vested: but the property having been sold by auction a little time ago, the purchaser (under the difficulties arising from the modern system of conveyancing) insisted that it was necessary, in order to make a good title, that the deeds should be executed by the personal representative of Thomas Hubbert, who had died thirty-seven years before, in 1790: Alexander Hubbert, the creditor administrator, having also been dead twenty-one years. It was at length ascertained that Sir Lumley Skeffington, as the son of one of the sisters, was the next of kin, and entitled to the grant of administration. Application was made to him to facilitate the business, either by taking out a general, or a limited, administration.

Sir Lumley, who was in distressed circumstances, referred the parties to his attorney, who expressly stipulated that his bill should be paid by the sellers and not by Sir Lumley Skeffington. All the documents were laid before the attorney; and a very long correspondence took place between the two solicitors; nor am I competent to decide which was right or which was wrong; but considerable difficulties were, as appears, raised to this consent. An account was required of Alexander's disbursements and administration, though I cannot but think that Sir Lumley Skeffington's solicitor ought to have been satisfied that the deceased's estate must have been insolvent. The negociation, however, [702] failed, and the sellers were left to their remedy. They, accordingly, applied to this Court for a grant to their nominee, Mr. White, of administration de bonis non, limited to these premises at Bermondsey. In March, 1827, the administration limited as prayed was granted. In December, 1827, the interests were assigned; the deeds were executed; and the conveyance was completed: and it was not till the end of Hilary Term, 1828, that a decree was taken out against White to bring in this administration, to shew cause why it should not be revoked, and a general administration granted to Sir Lumley Skeffington. White appeared under protest, and stating that, under the circumstances, he was not bound to bring in the administration, prayed to be dismissed with costs.

Taking all that has occurred into my consideration, I think there is not sufficient ground of irregularity, either as to the want of title in the parties, or in the neglect of citing or serving Sir Lumley Skeffington with a process "to accept or refuse," to induce the Court to take the grant out of Mr. White's hands, and to decree a general administration to Sir Lumley Skeffington. I am of opinion that the citation under the circumstances was not necessary; but that he was barred by time, by events, and by his own laches.

What are the periods to which the Court must look? First, at the original grant: those entitled to the administration, renounced; and though that does not, in ordinary cases, bar next of kin who, on the expiration of such a [703] grant, may come in and claim; yet they did not apply on the death of the creditor administrator, who lived sixteen years. It is not suggested that there was any surplus, or that the next of kin ever set up any interest or demanded any account: and the composition with the creditors, the incumbrances on the estate by mortgage and by annuity, besides other circumstances, do not leave the slightest reason to suspect that there was a surplus.

What is the next period? The creditor administrator dies in 1806, and for twenty years and upwards no application is made for a representation. This lapse of years is tantamount to a fresh renunciation. Time must operate as a bar, or the business of the world could not proceed. Looking to all these circumstances, I do think the Court was fully warranted in granting the limited administration without citing the next of kin, for that creates an additional expence. I do not enter into the circumstances minutely; the strong fact is, that for twenty years there was no application for a de bonis grant; and after such an interval a specious title even would form a ground for a limited administration. If it was now clear that the administration had been obtained surreptitiously, or for fraudulent purposes, the Court would have, and would exercise, the power of revoking it: but the facts prove directly the reverse.

Application was made to Sir Lumley Skeffington in June, 1826. I will not say his refusal was malicious or vexatious, but it has [704] somewhat of that character and appearance: the negociation was broken off, and his solicitor's bill was paid in September, 1826. What does Sir Lumley Skeffington then do? he does not take out administration; he does not enter a caveat. It is said that he had no funds, that he was advised it would require £150, that he borrowed that sum of a noble lord, but that another solicitor defrauded him of it. This may be an excuse for himself, but it attaches no blame or imputation of fraud on the other party. The administration was taken out in March, 1827; he says he was not apprized of it till July, 1827—but what does he do? he lies by, and does not call it in till February, 1828. In the mean time there is no undue haste on the other side. The conveyance is not executed till December, 1827; and when all the deeds and the letters of administration have been handed over to the purchasers' solicitor, and when the administrator is functus officio, then Sir Lumley Skeffington calls in the administration, and prays it may be revoked.

I do not think it necessary, under these circumstances, to enter into the question in whom may be the legal, or in whom the equitable, title; for I am yet to be informed that whoever claims it cannot go into a Court of Equity and there assert his right. No step was taken here to stop the administration, and I cannot now revoke it, nor disturb the present bonâ fide purchasers for a valuable consideration. It is sufficient that there is no ground to impute any fraud, nor indeed any irregularity, in obtaining [705] this limited administration; the representative of the next of kin having forborne for twenty years, and even after he was apprized of all the circumstances, having abstained from applying, till the limited administration had executed its purpose. I shall therefore allow the protest, and dismiss Mr. White with his costs.

Protest sustained.

TALBOT AND OTHERS, BY THEIR GUARDIAN v. TALBOT. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, By-Day, 1828.—Marriage and birth of issue is not an absolute but a presumptive revocation of a prior will; the law presuming an intention to revoke, arising from a change of condition and new obligations; if such change of condition and new obligations are provided for, and the intention to revoke cannot be presumed, the revocation does not take place. Therefore a will, in favour of the issue of a former marriage, is not revoked by a subsequent marriage and birth of issue; such marriage and issue having been provided for by settlement.

[Discussed, Israel v. Rodon, 1839, 2 Moore, P. C. 66.]

Richard Talbot, late of Portsea, victualler, is the party deceased. By his last will and testament, bearing date the 19th of December, 1812, he appointed his children residuary legatees.(a)[1] Upon his death, a caveat on the part [706] of the widow having been entered and warned, it was alleged on her behalf that, according to law, the deceased had died intestate. An appearance was then given for the deceased's three daughters (minors) by their guardian; and an allegation on either side was offered to the Court.

For the daughters it was pleaded:—

1. That the deceased died on the 15th of November, 1827, leaving Mary Ann Talbot, his lawful widow—three daughters and a son (all minors), children by Rebecca, his first wife; also leaving by his widow (who at his death was pregnant) an infant son.(a)[2]

2. That the will, dated 19th December, 1812, was duly executed.

3. That on the 24th February, 1823, his first wife died; and that on 5th October, 1824, he intermarried with Mary Ann Arnold, widow, who was possessed of freehold and personal property; that by settlement dated the 4th October, 1824, her freeholds were put in trust for her to receive, during life, the rents and profits, with remainder to the children of the intended marriage; that out of her personalty, £800 was to be raised and immediately after the marriage paid, upon trust to apply the interest towards the maintenance and support of [707] her daughter, Ann Arnold, until she should attain twenty-one, and then for her absolutely; and if she should die under age, the interest to the separate use of her mother for life, and upon her death the £800 to be paid to the children of the intended marriage.

4. That the deceased at the time of executing his will was possessed of freeholds of the value of £6700; that at his death he had acquired freeholds to the amount of £16,000; that there were mortgages on the estate purchased since the date of his will to the amount of £5133, and an arrear of £650 for interest; that his simple contract debts amounted to £2280, and that his personalty was of the value of £7000.

5. That on the 29th of January, 1827, the deceased, having agreed for the purchase of a freehold house, declared to his friend, John Vick, "I will tell you, Vick, when I married my wife she had a certain property of her own, I have a family by my first wife, and I do not intend to injure them, but I shall buy a little estate in the country which I will make sacred to my wife and her family."

6. That the deceased, on Monday, the 12th November, 1827, was thrown from his horse; became speechless and apparently senseless, and so continued till he died on the following Thursday; that the will was found in his iron chest, together with deeds and other papers of importance.

For the widow it was pleaded:—

1. That the deceased, in conversation with Archibald Low, his solicitor, repeatedly told him "that he must make his will, and that the [708] will he had made would not do;" and that in or about September last he made use of the following declaration:—"I made a will about 16 or 17 years ago (thereby meaning the will propounded in this cause), but that will not do; now I must have another; you shall make it, and I will fix an early day for the purpose."

2. That on or about Saturday previous to his death, the deceased, informing his wife that Mr. Nicholson intended to be at Portsea on the following Thursday, inquired of

---

(a)[1] The testator, after charging a certain messuage and premises with an annuity of £150 per annum to his wife, Rebecca, for life, devised the same in these words: "Unto such children as I may leave or my said wife be ensient with at the time of my decease, their heirs and assigns, for ever, as tenants in common." And, after giving a certain dwelling house to his mother for life; and, at her death, to his brother and his heirs, &c. for ever, thus went on: "I further devise all other my messuages, lands, and hereditaments whatsoever unto such children as I may leave or my said wife be ensient with at the time of my decease their heirs, &c. I also bequeath all my household goods, furniture, &c. to my wife for her own use and benefit, and £50 to be paid to her within one month after my decease. I likewise give £50 to each of my two sisters, and the residue of my personal estate in trust to apply the interest and dividends thereof for the maintenance and education of such children as I may leave or my wife may be ensient with at the time of my decease until they shall severally attain the age of 21, then upon trust to be equally divided among them."

(a)[2] This son died before the hearing of the cause; and a posthumous child was born.

her "what she wished settled on her;" and on her saying "£200 per annum in addition to her own property" (of the annual value of £200), he replied "he did not consider it too much," and that he would call upon his attorney that the will might be ready for Mr. Nicholson, who was to be a trustee.

On the by-day of Hilary Term these allegations were admitted; and the cause now came on for hearing.

Lushington in support of the will. The question is, whether a will made during the lifetime of the testator's first wife, and after the birth of children, is revoked by a second marriage and by the birth of issue? Under this will, I apprehend children by a future wife are not excluded; and they, as well as the widow, are provided for by settlement. There is not, then, a total disposition of the property exclusively in favour of the children of the first marriage. If the will be admitted to [709] probate, a question may then arise whether the children of the second marriage are not entitled to take under it; but whether the will be established or not, the widow in neither case will be benefited, for the personalty is absorbed by the debts. A presumptive revocation is in this instance rebutted by the circumstances. The declarations shew the deceased's knowledge of the existence of his will; and that he would not injure his children by his first wife; and the wife and issue of the second marriage are provided for. The settlement of itself rebuts the original presumption of revocation: for it was held by Lord Mansfield in Brady v. Cubitt (1 Doug. 31), and by Lord Chancellor Eldon in Ex parte Ilchester (7 Ves. 365), that, where there was not a total disposition of the testator's property, the presumption would not operate.

Phillimore for the widow and infant, contended that the will, primâ facie, was revoked, that revocation being founded on a change of circumstances in the deceased; and that in this case the facts were not sufficient to repel the presumption of law. The declaration to Low proved that the deceased intended to make a new will; by the will in existence the widow was totally unprovided for; and that in respect to the settlement, it was solely of her own property, and which was secured to the daughter of her former marriage. Hollway v. Clarke (1 Phill. 339), Emerson v. Boville (1 Phill. 342), and Sullivan v. [710] Sullivan, which is there cited, all established that this Court requires some recognition or some act to shew that the deceased's intention was that his will should take effect.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. When the allegations were admitted the Court reserved the whole consideration of the question which arises on this will. The will was made by the testator, then a married man, on the 19th of December, 1812; and no dispute is raised as to its factum; by it he provides for his wife for life, gives a few legacies, and then bequeaths the residue of his real and personal property among his children. In February, 1823, his wife died, leaving four children—three daughters and a son: but there was no reason on her death to alter his testamentary disposition, because his property would go among his children exactly as he had intended in the event of his dying before his wife.

On the 5th of October, 1824, he married a second wife, Mary Ann Arnold, a widow, who had a daughter by her former husband, and was also possessed of property of her own, both real and personal. Before their marriage a settlement was entered into by which her real property, amounting to about £200 per annum, was secured to the wife's separate use for life, and then to the issue of this marriage with Talbot; and £800 was settled on her daughter by the first marriage, the interest to be applied to her maintenance and the principal to be [711] paid to her at the age of 21; and if she died before she attained that age, then the interest of this sum was to belong to the mother for life, and on her death the principal to go to her children by Talbot: so that, by this settlement, provision was made for his wife and the children by his second marriage; and it does not appear to me materially to vary the case whether the provision was out of the husband's or out of the wife's property.

On the 15th of November, 1827, Richard Talbot died, leaving his second wife pregnant, and also one child by her. His four children by his first marriage likewise survived him. His will of 1812 he left in an uncancelled state, in his own possession, in his iron chest; and though he might talk of making, he never had made, a new will, nor taken any measures for that purpose. The question then is, whether this will of 1812 was revoked by his second marriage and by the birth of issue? Now marriage and birth of children have never been held to be an absolute revocation; never more than a presumptive revocation, and the presumption may, under all the circumstances, be either not raised or repelled. The principle is this, that marriage and the birth of issue create such a change in the condition of the deceased, such new obligations and duties, that they raise an inference that a testator would not adhere to a will made previous to their existence, considering it an act of moral duty to revoke that disposition, in order to make provision for his new wife and new issue: but, on the other [712] hand, if there does not arise such a state of circumstances as to produce new duties, if the change is provided for, there is no reason to presume a revocation. The question, after all, is one of presumed intention—whether to die intestate, or, notwithstanding the change of circumstances, to leave the former will existing and effective.

Here is a settlement providing for his second wife and providing for the issue of his second marriage; that settlement must take effect notwithstanding the will and in exclusion of the children of the first marriage, while the property of the second wife must go to her own children; and if the deceased shall be held to be dead intestate, she and her children would share with the children of the former marriage; she, as widow, would take one-third, and her two children a third of the remainder; that is, in addition to the settlement, they would take five-ninths of the whole between them; excepting the realty, which forms the greater part of the deceased's property, and would go to his eldest son.

Under these circumstances there is no breach of moral duty—no neglect of new obligations in adhering to the former will. I am then of opinion that no presumptive revocation did take place: the marriage and issue were provided for by the settlement; the previous acts therefore repel the presumption. And to me it seems that this view is in no way altered by the parol evidence. The deceased might have thought of making a new will or of increasing [713] his wife's jointure; and if he had used a part of her property, might intend to make her some compensation; but there is no reason to suppose he intended to die intestate. Inasmuch, then, as there is a provision regularly made for the second wife and her issue, I am of opinion that the will of the 19th of December, 1812, is valid; and I accordingly pronounce for it.

Costs out of the estate were decreed.

[714] ASTLEY v. ASTLEY. Consistory Court, Trinity Term, 1st Session, 1828.—In a suit for separation à mensâ et thoro, the wife's adultery being fully established, but she having, on a recriminatory allegation, proved facts antecedent to her adultery, from which the Court necessarily presumed the husband's adultery, this amounts to compensatio criminum, and the wife is entitled to be dismissed.—Semble, going to a brothel, and remaining alone for a considerable time in a room with a common prostitute, is sufficient evidence from which to infer adultery.—A married man going to a brothel, knowing it to be a house of that description, raises a suspicion of adultery necessary to be rebutted by the very best evidence.

This was a suit of divorce brought by Sir Jacob Astley, Baronet, against Georgiana Caroline Astley, his wife, by reason of her adultery.

The parties were married on the 22nd of March, 1819; and cohabited together till the elopement of Lady Astley with Captain Garth on the 24th of July, 1826.

A libel having been admitted, an allegation, on the part of the wife, charging Sir Jacob Astley with improper familiarities and adultery with abandoned women, was also admitted. The second, third, and fourth articles of this allegation, to which the witnesses, relied upon by the Court, deposed, were in substance as follows:—

2. That in March, 1826, Sir Jacob and Lady Astley (being resident in Leicester during the hunting season) went in an open carriage to the race-ground to witness a race in which a horse of Sir Jacob's was to run; that Sir Jacob, leaving Lady Astley in the carriage, walked on the course with Mrs. Richardson, Lucy Burbidge, Charlotte Spawforth, and Mary Ann [715] Webster, women of abandoned character; that he conversed immodestly with them, and drew up the petticoats of Burbidge, upon which a fear was expressed that Lady Astley would see and observe what passed: that after Sir Jacob had returned to Lady Astley's carriage he sat at the back part of it, and kissed his hand to the women, and said, "Girls, I will be with you at night, and I will give you a treat."

3. That in the evening of the same day Sir Jacob introduced into a dining-room of the Bell Inn at Leicester several women from the street; that he gave them spirits and wine, after which he and the women made so much disturbance, and their conduct towards each other was such, that the women were sent out of the house.

4. That on the next evening Sir Jacob, accompanied by some gentlemen, went to Richardson's; that he gave her money to procure wine and spirits for Burbidge, Spawforth, Webster, and other women who were present; that he continued in company with these women for some time; that indecent familiarities passed between him and Lucy Burbidge, and at length they retired to a bed-room, in which they were alone for about half an hour (with the door locked on the inside), when they committed adultery.

Upon the depositions taken on these pleas the cause was argued by the King's advocate, Phillimore, and Addams for Sir Jacob Astley; and by Burnaby and Dodson contrà.

The libel was admitted to be fully proved; [716] and the only question raised was whether the evidence on the allegation was sufficient to establish the guilt of the husband.

Judgment—Dr. Lushington. This is a suit promoted by Sir Jacob Astley, Baronet, against his wife, Lady Astley, for separation by reason of her adultery. The marriage of the parties in 1819, their subsequent cohabitation, and the birth of children are admitted to be fully established: nor is any objection raised to the proof of the adultery with which Lady Astley is charged. It is perfectly clear that in July, 1826, she quitted the house of her husband in Grosvenor Street, and eloped with Captain Garth, with whom her cohabitation is very distinctly proved and admitted. There is no question, therefore, that Sir Jacob Astley will be entitled to the remedy he prays, unless the recriminatory allegation of Lady Astley—for she has replied to this suit, not by denying her own adultery, but by charging her husband with a similar offence—is so proved as to call upon the Court to dismiss her from all further observance of justice.

It is unnecessary to consider the terms upon which the parties lived previous to the month of July, 1826; there is nothing sufficiently established in the cause to enable the Court to form any judicial opinion on this point anterior to that period. In the beginning of the year 1826 these parties went to Leicester; and it is during [717] their residence in that town that Sir Jacob Astley is accused of having there formed a connexion with divers women of bad character; of resorting to a house of ill fame, and of committing adultery. This is the substance of the charge. There are other accusations of a minor nature, but they are of weight only as tending to corroborate those of a graver character.

The evidence in respect to these charges in part consists of the testimony of Mary Richardson, who kept this house of ill fame, and of three common prostitutes. Now the testimony of these witnesses requires the most vigilant and accurate examination; for, independent of their character, their manner of giving evidence, and their mutual contradictions, ought to put the Court on its guard where their depositions are not confirmed by more credible testimony. There is throughout their examinations a manifest disregard of truth. The discrepancies are numerous and have been pointed out. It is quite impossible to look at the testimony of Mary Richardson without perceiving that she has deposed with very little sense of the obligation of an oath; and, as to the three other women, they would probably be as willing to bring their evidence to market as they were ready to offer their persons to sale. But there is, in addition, the testimony of other persons of a very different description, upon which the Court can more safely rely.

The facts appear to be as follows:—It is proved that Sir Jacob Astley had asked one of his acquaintance, a witness in the cause, to shew [718] him the house of Mary Richardson; and that he went there. It is clear that nothing criminal took place on the occasion of that visit; but, at the same time, it must not be forgotten that Sir Jacob Astley was then perfectly aware of the character of this house. The next fact is an occurrence on the race-course on the day of the race. It is impossible to reconcile all the evidence on this point; but it is sufficiently proved that Sir Jacob Astley said to the three women, to whom I have already referred, "If I win the race, girls, I will give you a treat to-night." The evidence also establishes that Sir Jacob Astley, while on the race-ground, hooked up the petticoats of a woman of bad character. None of these facts import the degree of criminality necessary to debar the husband from the relief he prays; yet they ought not to be left out of the consideration of the Court, because they shew that, even at that time, he had some acquaintance with these women.

The decision, however, in this case, must depend on the occurrences which took place at the house of Mrs. Richardson, either on the evening of the race, or on the evening after. This part of the case is proved by three gentlemen, associates of Sir Jacob Astley; leaving out of consideration the testimony of the other witnesses. It is proved that Sir Jacob Astley went to Mrs. Richardson's from a dinner party at the Bell Inn; that he went up stairs with one of the women, and that he remained alone with her at least a quarter of an hour. These facts are demonstrated: they are undenied and un-[719]-deniable. It has been urged that the going to this house was unpremeditated and accidental, and was in order to protect one of the party who had been assaulted. This may be possible; yet I cannot help thinking there was something in the nature of an anterior appointment on the race-course; or, if the visit were unpremeditated, it would lead me to a conclusion that Sir Jacob Astley had been at this house on more than one occasion, as asserted in the evidence of the women. I am not, however, disposed to conclude positively, either that this visit was in pursuance of an actual engagement, or that it was accidental. I take the fact as I find it, that Sir Jacob Astley was there, and remained alone in a room with a woman of notorious character for a considerable space of time, as already stated; and on this state of facts the questions are: first, whether or not a legal presumption of the commission of adultery arises; and, secondly, supposing that it does arise, whether it is sufficient to bar the husband of the remedy he now seeks?

It cannot be denied that Sir Jacob Astley could not have a more ample opportunity of committing an act of adultery than at a house of ill fame and alone, at least for a quarter of an hour, in a room with a common prostitute.

If these facts are not sufficient to raise a presumption of adultery, what facts would be sufficient? All the probabilities unite in this conclusion, that Sir Jacob Astley would not have placed himself in this situation except for a criminal purpose. But even if the conviction of the Court did not lead it to that inference, there [720] are authorities which bind it to conclude that, in such circumstances, adultery has been committed. In Eliot v. Eliot, mentioned by Lord Stowell in Williams' case,(a)[1] it was held "that a woman going to a brothel with a man, furnished conclusive proof of adultery." Now, if a married man goes to a brothel, he being perfectly aware of the nature of the house, I will not say that it does not supply an equal presumption of guilt as in the case of a woman; but supposing the Court not inclined to push this presumption so far as to hold the proof conclusive, still it cannot be denied that such conduct furnishes a violent suspicion—a suspicion that must be rebutted, if rebutted it can be at all, by the very best evidence.

Now what is the evidence to rebut the suspicion in the present case? As to the testimony of Lucy Burbidge, with whom Sir Jacob Astley was shut up, it is impossible that the Court can give any credit to her denial: she is a witness not to be listened to; and in respect to the opinion of the three gentlemen, who were also in this house at the time that no act of adultery was committed, it is, I apprehend, the duty of the Court to draw its own conclusions, and not allow itself to be led away by the abstinence of the witnesses. In Elwes v. Elwes (1 Hagg. Con. 278) Lord Stowell said: "If the facts are of such a nature as justifiably, and almost necessarily, lead to a conclusion of guilt, the scepticism of a wit-[721]-ness, even if it really exists, signifies nothing. The Court, representing the law, draws that inference to which the proximate acts unavoidably lead; and therefore if the witnesses, even in this case, hesitated and paused about drawing that conclusion, I should not conceive myself in any degree limited by their hesitation." To this opinion I entirely accede; and it does appear to me that the circumstances of this case raise so strong a suspicion of adultery that it is scarcely possible to be rebutted by any evidence; but manifestly not by the evidence before the Court. And when I consider that Sir Jacob Astley is the party proceeding against his wife for a divorce, and that this matter is merely recriminatory and set up to bar his remedy, I also feel myself bound by the reference, in the argument, to the case of Lord and Lady Leicester: (a)[2] "That where adultery is pleaded by way of recrimination, and as a bar, it is not necessary to prove such strong facts as are required to convict the other party." It was said this is a loose doctrine; I will not stop to consider it, but shall pass it with this observation; that the doctrine has received the sanction of Lord Stowell, and is binding on this Court. I am, then, of opinion that the charge against Sir Jacob Astley is sufficiently established. If, however, he is really innocent, I can only regret that he has voluntarily exposed himself to such an accusation; but if a man will [722] associate with common prostitutes, as Sir Jacob Astley is proved to have done, whether he be guilty or innocent, every court of justice must, I think, come to the same conclusion to which I have arrived in this case.

(a)[1] 1 Hagg. Con. 302. See also Popkin v. Popkin, infra (Supplement), 765, notis.

(a)[2] Cited in Forster v. Forster, 1 Hagg. Con. 153. See also Durant v. Durant, infra, Supplement), 733. D'Aguilar v. D'Aguilar, ibid. 773, and Beeby v. Beeby, ibid. 789.

The only remaining question is, whether, as there is no proof of further adultery, the husband is debarred by this single act from the remedy he seeks?

Many arguments have been urged as to the hardship that Sir Jacob Astley will incur from the refusal of a sentence of separation: but this is an inconvenience which he has brought upon himself, and which the law imposes upon him. Similar arguments were also strongly urged in the case of Proctor v. Proctor, but were overruled (2 Hagg. Con. 295-6). It is also to be remembered that the wife will equally suffer inconvenience if a sentence be given against her, and she be turned loose upon the world.

Now, in support of the argument that one act of frailty is not sufficient to bar a husband of his remedy, only one case has been cited, viz. Naylor v. Naylor (Consistory, 1777, Trin. Term, 4th Sess.). I have obtained a note of that case, and since it is desirable that misapprehension should not exist as to the doctrine there held, nor as to the opinion of the judge, I will read that note. Dr. Bettesworth, who then presided in this Court, said: "This is a cause of restitution of conjugal rights brought by the wife against the husband: in bar he pleads adultery: she recriminates. [723] There are no less than thirteen witnesses to prove the adultery of the wife. She has not only committed the crime of adultery, but a series of adultery is proved, so that of her guilt there cannot be a doubt. On the other side, the counsel rely that they have made full proof of adultery by the husband; and that according to the law of the Ecclesiastical Court, if they have fully established his guilt, that will prevent his obtaining the effect of his prayer. But here is only a single witness to a fact, and all circumstances are against her; it would not, therefore, be sufficient even if her evidence were without exception. She, then, being a single witness, must be laid out of the case. It might be a question if a wife left her husband and lived many years from him, and in a course of adultery, whether, if the husband in one frail moment should be faulty, it would be a compensatio criminis? The words imply, 'You have been as guilty as I have been:' but in this case it is not necessary to consider; for two persons have deposed in a way not to be relied upon; and Mrs. Naylor has bribed witnesses—a circumstance alone sufficient to repel their credit."

In this case, then, of Naylor the learned Judge stated that it might be a question whether, when a wife left her husband, and lived in a long course of adultery, it would afford a compensatio criminis, and whether a husband ought to suffer for one frail act? but it will be observed that the case itself was decided on a totally different ground; the learned Judge decided there was [724] no proof of adultery; he merely put an hypothetical case, which is materially distinguished from the one before me. In that hypothetical case the wife was supposed to have quitted her husband, and lived for several years in adultery; now here the wife had not quitted her husband, and continued in adultery previous to his guilt: on the contrary, the husband is charged with adultery anterior to the separation and to her criminality. The cases, therefore, are quite separate and distinct; but at the same time I must be permitted to say, on the authority of Proctor v. Proctor, a case to which I have already referred, that a compensatio criminum is effected by the guilt of both parties.(a) But the present case does not alone depend upon an act of adultery committed in one frail moment; for, here, it is distinctly proved that, on one previous occasion at least, he had gone to this brothel, and that he had taken liberties with these women, and with other abandoned females.

I, therefore, come to this decision, that the conduct of Sir Jacob Astley bars him of the remedy he prays, and that Lady Astley be dismissed from this suit.

[725] POLLARD, FALSELY CALLED WYBOURN v. WYBOURN. Consistory Court, Trinity Term, 2nd Session, 1828.—In a suit of nullity by reason of the impotency of the man, a certificate (twelve years after marriage) that the woman was virgo intacta and apta viro, coupled with two several confessions by the man of his incapacity to two medical witnesses, and with proof that the woman's health had suffered; though the man had not given in his answers, had removed into France, and refused to undergo surgical examination, held sufficient.

[Discussed, M., falsely called D. v. D., 1885, 10 P. D. 75.]

This was a suit of nullity by reason of the man's impotency. The de facto marriage took place in April, 1815, the man being of the age of forty-one; the woman, seventeen.

A month after marriage the man took to a separate bed: afterwards, from October, 1815, to the spring of 1816, she resided with her father; and the man, though generally absent on military duties, occasionally slept in the same bed; but from the spring till October of 1816 he abstained altogether from cohabitation; and then the parties again lived together as man and wife for two months, after which he volunteered to St. Helena. He returned in 1819; but concealed his return from the other party for three weeks; but there was regular matrimonial cohabitation, with slight intervals, from that time till April, 1823. At that time her health having greatly suffered, she by the advice of her medical man took to sleep separately, and never afterwards returned to Mr. Wybourn's bed. About May, 1826, they finally parted, and towards the close of that year this suit was instituted. A medical certificate fully proved that [726] the marriage had never been consummated, and that, though virgo intacta, she was apta viro. The man had been personally served with a monition at Cassel, in France, to submit himself to medical inspection, but had not obeyed the process.

The King's advocate and Nicholl for the woman.

Phillimore and Pickard contrà.

Judgment—Dr. Lushington. In this case a de facto marriage was celebrated in August, 1815, and the parties continued to cohabit together at intervals, as man and wife, till the spring of 1823, when, as appears by the evidence of Mr. Parkin, a medical man, they ceased by his advice to occupy the same bed, in consequence of her health having suffered. They, however, lived under the same roof till May, 1826, when Mr. Wybourn quitted the country.

The Court has been put upon its guard against collusion. I am well aware that the Court should be very cautious, if collusion could reasonably be suspected; but there is no circumstance in this case to lead me to imagine that any thing of the sort exists. I cannot presume collusion, without something to raise such a presumption. The question then is, whether the evidence is sufficient; whether there is an absence of what is essential to the final adjudi-[727]-cation of the cause. I am of opinion that there is satisfactory evidence that the cohabitation lasted considerably longer than what the law generally requires; much more than three years. The ground of the separation is not to be laid out of the case; it is part of the res gestæ. Now, that it arose in consequence of the loss of health, and from her sufferings, appears from the evidence of Mr. Parkin: he says, "That about six or eight months after Christmas, 1822, they, by deponent's advice, ceased to occupy the same bed: it was on her account, and in consequence of her health having suffered, that the deponent gave this advice." Again, on the 14th article, he says, "He was attending Mrs. Wybourn professionally in 1823, and having ascertained the cause of the deplorable state in which she was, the deponent advised she should withdraw from the bed of her husband."

The Court always requires a certificate of medical persons as to the state and condition of the woman. In the present case that certificate has been given by Mr. Parkin, who appears to be a surgeon of eminence, and by Mr. Blagden, who undoubtedly is. It has been argued that the test on which the certificate is framed is too vague and uncertain; that the Court cannot rely on it. Now the present certificate is according to the practice invariably adopted—not to give reasons; and I should be extremely reluctant to depart from that practice. In the first place, it is a received maxim "cuilibet in arte suâ credendum est." Secondly, if the grounds were given, how could the Court com-[728]-prehend the reasons, and decide between conflicting opinions? besides, the introduction of the grounds would lead the Court into minute inquiries about matters, the discussion of which the Court would be most anxious to avoid unless it were imperatively called upon to pursue the investigation.

Here are the very strongest grounds to presume the impotency of the man. If the parties lay together in one bed for so many years, of such ages, and the woman is certified to remain virgo intacta, there cannot be a stronger presumption that impotency existed, and that it was incurable. Such a lapse of time satisfies the Court that in all human probability he was incapable of consummating the de facto marriage: but this is not left to inference from these facts only; for two direct admissions by him to two different surgeons are proved. I never can think that these lead to any thing but a direct acknowledgment of his incapacity. The first of these admissions was made previous to his departure for St. Helena in 1816, "that he was then incapable of performing marriage rites:" and the second confession was in 1823, "that he was impotent; that whenever he had made the attempt to have connexion with his wife he had failed." These confessions were made at periods so long anterior to the institution of this suit that there could have been no inducement to fabrication.

It is said that the law requires that the party's answers should be given in, or that he should submit his person to medical inspection. If this were the true rule, the man would only have to withdraw out of the reach of the process [729] of the Court, and thus defeat the ends of justice, and defraud the woman of her remedy. The law never imposed such difficulties upon any Court.(a)

It being perfectly clear that the monition was personally served, and that the party consequently has had fair notice of these proceedings, he surely would have come forward and rebutted the charge, if he had had the power. The Court, however, cannot refrain from going still further in this case; for suppose the party had appeared, and the certificate from his inspectors had been couched in the same terms as in Greenstreet v. Cumyns (Consistory Reports, 332; S. C. 2 Phill. 10), which rather supported his capacity than proved his impotency; even in that case the Court would not go the length of saying that the woman's remedy would have been barred.

In this case I am satisfied there is no collusion, and that there is as much evidence as the law requires; and I therefore pronounce the libel fully proved, that the lady is entitled to the sentence she prays, and that the defendant must be condemned in the costs of this suit.

[730] THE OFFICE OF THE JUDGE PROMOTED BY NORTH AND LITTLE v. DICKSON. Consistory Court of London, Trinity Term, 22nd July, 1828.—Provocation is no defence to a criminal suit for brawling in a church at a vestry meeting. On proof of the offence, the defendant suspended for a fortnight ab ingressu ecclesiæ, and condemned in costs.

Judgment—Dr. Lushington. This is a cause of office brought by the churchwardens of the hamlet of Mile End, Old Town, in the parish of St. Dunstan, Stepney, against Robert Dickson of the said hamlet, "for quarrelling, chiding, and brawling by words, and for creating a riot and disturbance in the parish church." Three witnesses have been examined on the part of the promoters, and their testimony fully establishes the charge.

The first says he was present at the vestry-meeting, when "Dickson called out to Little (who was chairman) in a loud voice and angry and passionate manner, 'Why do you not call that wretch to order;' and upon Hall inquiring of the chairman who Dickson meant to call 'wretch,' Dickson, in a still more angry and passionate manner, called out very loud, 'I mean you, you wretch, Bob Hall;' at the same time pointing with his hand to Hall, and added, 'Now bring your action as soon as you like.' Deponent says that in consequence of Dickson's behaviour the business [731] of the meeting was for a time entirely suspended."

Now this witness is corroborated by the evidence of the two other persons who have been examined. By way of defence an allegation has been given in, charging Little, one of the churchwardens promoting this suit, with being in a state of intoxication, and with addressing Dickson in a boisterous and insulting manner, on the occasion; and by way of further defence it is alleged that some provocation was given to the defendant by a person named Robert Hall; and some provocation from Hall is proved: but there is no satisfactory evidence to support the imputation against (a) "Quamvis utroque conjuge fatente impedimentum, ac triennio lapso, sanum consilium sit facere conjuges inspici; at id non est necessarium." Sanchez, De Matrimonio, lib. 7, disp. 108, No. 6.

Little.(a)[1] Such provocation, however, would not justify the defendant's conduct. It must be understood that people who go into a church, whether for the purpose of attending divine service, or of being present at a vestry, must keep themselves under restraint, and not depart from that decorum which should always be preserved within consecrated walls.

It is clear that Dickson has outraged the sanctity of the place. I must observe at the same time that had Hall been guilty of similar misconduct, I trust the churchwardens would have proceeded against him. Churchwardens must deal out impartial justice between the two parties. I do not say that they have acted [732] improperly in this instance, but there is proof that this parish is divided into two parties.

The sentence of the Court is that the defendant shall be suspended ab ingressu ecclesiæ for one fortnight, to be computed from Sunday, the 27th instant, and be condemned in the costs of this suit.

SUPPLEMENT.

[733] DURANT v. DURANT.(a)[2] Arches Court, Easter Term, 1825.—In a suit for divorce on account of the husband's adultery after a condonation of former adulteries, there must be, in order to establish condonation of subsequent adultery as a bar to the wife's remedy, evidence that she was aware of this renewed misconduct; nor can such knowledge be inferred from slight facts, and from cohabitation, but it must be clearly and distinctly proved.—If a wife forgives earlier adultery upon condition and assurance of future amendment, on the husband's again committing adultery that previous injury revives.—When the husband's adultery is to be proved by pregnancy and acknowledgment of children it is not necessary to plead particular acts.—Evidence extracted upon cross-examination (in order to shew condonation, compensatio criminum, or to discredit one adverse witness by another) if relied on as the sole ground of defence has far slighter effect than when a defensive, recriminatory, or exceptive plea is given in and examined to.—In examining evidence and proofs, the Court must not take the charges insulated and detached, but the whole together, and must consider what has been the admitted conduct of the party under similar circumstances.—Quære, whether condonation, unless as far as is admitted by the adverse case, can be set up without being pleaded. Semble that in no case has it been held to estop a party where not pleaded.—Condonation is not presumed, as a bar, so readily against the wife as against the husband.—Entering into a voluntary deed of separation and bringing an action on that deed does not bar a wife from proceeding for a divorce in the Spiritual Court: nor bear unfavourably on her case.—Condonation is forgiveness with an implied condition that the injury shall not be repeated, and that the other party shall be treated with conjugal kindness: on breach of the condition the right to a remedy for the former injuries revives.—A groundless and malicious charge against the wife's chastity followed up by turning her out of doors, and not attempted to be pleaded nor proved, may be alleged with other acts of cruelty as a ground for separation. Quære, whether it would not revive condoned adultery?

This was a suit for divorce, à mensâ et thoro, brought by the wife against her husband by reason of his adultery. The facts of the case are fully detailed in the judgment; and it is unnecessary to state more than that it was admitted that the adultery of the husband was fully proved; and that on this fact coming to the knowledge of the wife she, on two occasions, separated herself from her husband, but afterwards returned to cohabitation; first, on a promise of future good conduct; and, secondly, from want of means of subsistence when near her confinement. The husband afterwards accused her of adultery, and turned her out of his house. Further acts of adultery on his part, subsequent to her return to cohabitation, and also subsequent to his having forced her to leave his house, were alleged. No charge was brought forward in plea against the wife: and the questions of fact principally were, whether the later acts of adultery were established; and whether the wife, at [734] her return to cohabitation, was aware of all the earlier acts of adultery?

---

(a)[1] A responsive allegation denying the charges was admitted. The cause at the hearing was undefended.

(a)[2] Vide supra, p. 528.

In the course of the argument the Court read the following note of Worsley v. Worsley. Consistory, Mich. Term, 3rd Session, 1730.—Cruelty revives condoned adultery.

"In this case several facts of cruelty and adultery were charged by the wife in an allegation offered by her, which were laid to have been committed some years ago; since that there had been a reconciliation between the husband and wife; and since that reconciliation he was charged in this allegation with fresh acts of cruelty, but with no new acts of adultery.

"Dr. Cotterell for the husband said, that as he was charged with fresh acts of cruelty since the reconciliation, they would indeed revive the former acts of cruelty before the reconciliation, but since no adultery was pretended, the former acts of that kind did not come within the rule, therefore all the articles of the allegation relating to the adultery were irrelevant, and ought to be struck out.

"The Court (Dr. Henchman) held clearly that the new acts of cruelty would revive the whole, as well the acts of adultery that were committed before the reconciliation (though there were no new acts of that kind), as also the acts of cruelty, and that the wife was now as much at liberty to charge her husband with those former acts of adultery, notwithstanding the reconciliation, as she [735] would have been if there had been no reconciliation at all." (a)

After reading this case the Court said:

I wish to hear a full argument on the doctrine of condonation; its principles, and the authorities respecting it. What takes off its effects, and revives a former charge? Will any offence, short of subsequent adultery, namely, an approach to adultery, set aside condonation as a bar? Will solicitation of chastity have that effect? Must the injury be ejusdem generis? Will cruelty revive adultery? If so, will any thing short of what would substantively and separately establish a case of cruelty? Will an unfounded charge of adultery, of which there is not a tittle of proof, against a mother with twelve living children, and an unjust dismissal of the wife from her husband's house, be sufficient to revive condoned adultery? Can condonation be set up as an effectual bar without being pleaded?

[The arguments on the facts of the case have been omitted; and those only which apply to these questions inserted.]

Lushington and Dodson for Mr. Durant. We do not find that the questions put by the Court have received judicial consideration.

1. Whether condonation is necessary to be pleaded? It is not absolutely necessary, but it may be convenient and proper; because otherwise, as the party applying for a divorce [736] should have a knowledge of the defence, we admit the party would be at liberty to plead after publication, or the Court ex officio might order further proofs. Elwes v. Elwes (1 Hagg. Con. Reports, 292). That condonation ought to be pleaded may perhaps rather be inferred from Oughton.(b) But this is on the general ground that there should be notice of the intended defence; but that reason does not hold here, because the wife herself pleads condonation—"qui ponit fatetur." Neither Ayliffe nor Sanchez lay down that it is necessary to plead condonation. If on cross-examination it appeared clearly that there had been subsequent cohabitation, the Court would allow the other party, at any period of the cause, to deny condonation.

2. Condonation is where a husband or wife, cognisant of the adultery of the other, is voluntarily reconciled. Ayliffe's Parergon, 226. In that case the party is barred from complaint. Mere residence in the house without actual conjugal cohabitation is no condonation. "Si enim," says Sanchez, "essent in eadem domo non se alloquentes, divisique à mensâ et lecto, non censeretur condonatum adulterium."(c) But here there is no doubt of conjugal cohabitation.

3. A repetition of the same injury, no doubt, revives condoned adultery; and we admit that something short of it may possibly have that effect; as, for instance, solicitation of chastity, [737] or whatever indeed would bar a husband from complaining of his wife's adultery: but it must be an offence ejusdem generis: and if that be so, the proof here is of adultery or of nothing. The only reported case in which the doctrine of revival was discussed is D'Aguilar v. D'Aguilar (1 Hagg. Con. Reports, 135, notis). It is there laid down that, to revive cruelty, the subsequent facts must be such as would be sufficient to found a sentence. It may be said that a harsh course of treatment ought to revive, but if any thing short of legal cruelty is admitted, there would be no certain rule. By analogy this rule should apply to adultery: then nothing short of adultery would revive; certainly nothing less than solicitation of chastity.

(a) See some further information on the case of Worsley v. Worsley, post, p. 762.

(b) "Si pars rea allegaverit et probaverit partem agentem, ante litem institutam, habuisse notitiam saltem probabilem criminis libellati," &c. Oughton, tit. 214, s. 2.

4. It is impossible, we submit, to maintain that cruelty would revive adultery. We cannot find any case to that effect, except the note of Worsley v. Worsley, which is very unsatisfactory as a precedent; nor are we aware that it is so laid down in any authorities. It is not necessary to revive the adultery, for cruelty would of itself be a ground for divorce: it is not ejusdem generis. It is laid down that "condonation is a conditional forgiveness which does not take away the right of complaint in case of a continuation of adultery."(b) Even Sanchez does not suggest that condoned adultery could be revived by any thing short of adultery. If cruelty would not revive it, à fortiori, harshness, or less than legal cruelty, would not suffice.

[738] 5. Would an unfounded charge of adultery revive? It is true that adultery on the part of the wife is not pleaded, and that Mr. Durant did charge her with that crime. Though he might be misinformed, yet he acted bonâ fide, for he employed a solicitor, collected evidence, and laid it before a friend. A case might easily be supposed in which there were good grounds of suspicion, and for requiring explanation, such as loose conduct, and indecent expressions; and yet not sufficient to offer a plea.

W. Adams and Jenner for Mrs. Durant. [After going fully through the facts of the case.] The adultery, both prior and subsequent to the renewed cohabitation, is fully proved, and the condonation of the previous adultery is not established, inasmuch as Mrs. Durant is not shewn to be cognisant of the birth of Bradbury's third child. The books require a notitia probabilis, meaning by that phrase pretty full proof, as the three instances in Oughton shew.(a) These instances all refer to condonation by the husband, which has always been held to be more easily presumed than condonation by the wife. We proceed then to examine the questions proposed by the Court, though we dis-[739]-claim the necessity, as we deny any condonation.

The cases as to condonation are few, and the books not specific.

1. As to its nature. It is a conditional forgiveness: it may be made by a wife, but does not necessarily result from a continuance of cohabitation only.

2. Condonation is hardly possible to be presumed against a wife without being pleaded, as it is capable of many explanations. It is said the wife has pleaded it herself: we deny it; she has only pleaded facts from which it has been argued that condonation is to be inferred. It is admitted the husband could not rest on it if brought out by interrogatories alone; here the knowledge of Bradbury's third child is attempted to be shewn only by interrogatories. If the wife had had notice that condonation would have been objected, she might have pleaded her ignorance. It is said that in Elwes v. Elwes, condonation by the husband was not pleaded; but the Court there lays down that it must be admitted with extreme caution if not pleaded. In that case too the alleged condonation was on the part of the husband; and the Court does not notice it as a plea in bar but as a circumstance requiring explanation. If then, with the dictum "Causa nunquam concluditur contra Judicem," the Court is so cautious of noticing unpleaded condonation, surely it cannot be competent for the adverse party to take advantage of it. In Beeby v. Beeby (a)[1] condonation is further observed upon by Lord [740] Stowell in the same guarded language: "The Court would not say that condonation might not come out in evidence, though unpleaded, but the Court would not help it out." In Ruding v. Ruding (a)[2] it was said: "The Court has never gone the length of holding mere delay as a bar against the wife. If it could be shewn that the wife's conduct amounted to licence, it would be matter of defence; but it must be pleaded." A plea in bar cannot then be treated as a matter of defence if not pleaded, though the Court may notice it. Oughton speaks of condonation as necessary to be pleaded and proved: "Si allegaverit et probaverit;" this is conjunctive and not disjunctive: the proof will not do without [741] the plea any more than the plea without the proof. Sanchez and Ayliffe may not notice the necessity of pleading condonation, because they suppose that of course it must be pleaded.

---

(b) Ferrers v. Ferrers, 1 Hag. Con. Reports, 130.

(a) "Probabilis scientia dicitur, si maritus, suspectam habens uxorem de adulterio, eam de eodem accusaverit, et illa hujusmodi crimen confessa fuerit. Vel testes illi, quos maritus in judicio contradictorio ad probandum adulterium objectum produxit, significaverint marito, ante litem institutam, se posse deponere ex propriis eorum visu et scientiâ de hujusmodi adulterio. Vel si maritus uxorem suam in ipso actu adulterino deprehenderit." Oughton, tit. 214, s. 3.

3. It is not denied that condoned adultery may be revived by subsequent adultery. The law is not explicit that minor acts would be sufficient; but there is nothing to shew that the husband's return to the mens adultera et rea is not sufficient. The implied condition is that he shall not return to impure practices. It is said in D'Aguilar v. D'Aguilar that to revive forgiven cruelty there must be legal cruelty; but even if that were true to its full extent there is a distinction between the relief for cruelty and adultery. In the former the protection is from present danger, and the extent of the offence must be known to the complainant. The latter is secret, and therefore evidence of the mens rea may be sufficient. Here is the mens rea at least by solicitation of chastity.

4. Where there is harshness or any thing short of legal cruelty the Court will at least be very cautious of inferring condonation from cohabitation alone; and even as to removing undoubted condonation it cannot be correct that the subsequent cruelty must be of itself sufficient to found a sentence. Suppose serious cruelty during cohabitation; a separation and return; would it be necessary to prove actual cruelty for separation afterwards? Would not the former conduct give colour to threats or harshness? The wife must be able to enjoy the consortium vitæ; that must be the implied condition, and any thing that would destroy the consortium, and drive her from cohabitation, [742] would revive cruelty or adultery. The case of Worsley v. Worsley, as stated, seems to confirm this, and to shew that cruelty would revive adultery.

5. The accusation of adultery with the tutor of her children comes under the head of the most aggravated cruelty. The husband had no business to make, still less to insinuate, charges of this nature. If he withdrew the allegation he ought to have withdrawn the interrogatories; but he has persisted in them at the very hearing.

(a)[1] Consistory, Mich. Term, 1799. For the judgment in this case, see post, p. 789.

(a)[2] Arches, 1819, Hil. Term, 2d Session.

This was a suit of separation brought by the wife for the husband's adultery: the parties were married in 1796. In 1802 they went to reside in France, and were there detained on the commencement of the war. Mrs. Ruding returned to England in 1806. In 1808 the husband was pleaded to have commenced an adulterous intercourse with a French lady, by whom he had five children: he returned to England in 1815, and continued to live in open adultery till the commencement of this suit, on the first session of Michaelmas Term, 1818.

Per Curiam (Sir John Nicholl). It is admitted, in limine, that the rejection of the libel would be a strong measure, but it is contended that the circumstances would justify it. It seems to be admitted that while the husband was in France there was no improper delay. Since his return three years have elapsed, but I am not aware of any case where the Court has gone the length of saying that a mere lapse of time is a bar to the wife. If it could be shewn that the wife, for three years, had connived; that her conduct amounted to licence, it would be defensive, but must be pleaded. I admit this libel, as on the face of it there is nothing which amounts to a bar to the wife's prayer.

Note.—The case of Ruding v. Smith, falsely calling herself Ruding (2 Hagg. Con. 371), was between the same parties.

We are not aware of any cases allowing the wife to retire from cohabitation upon such an accusation alone; but here the Court must look at all the conduct of the husband, and all the circumstances of the case. What remedy can the wife now have? Is it possible for her to bring a suit of restitution? Such an accusation is a ground of divorce by the civil law. Thus Huber, in treating of divorce, says: "Contra virum mulieri proditæ sunt quatuor causæ," and mentions as the second: "Si uxorem de adulterio temerè accusaverit." (a) And the Novellæ, in the chapter "De justis divortii causis mulieri concessis," furnish this passage: "Si vir de adulterio inscripserit uxorem et adulterium non probaverit, licere mulieri volenti etiam pro hac causâ repudium destinare viro, et recipere quidem propriam dotem, lucrari autem et antenuptialem donationem" (Novell. 117, c. 9, s. 4). Though not a substantive ground of divorce here, these principles may well be applied, under all the circumstances, to this case.

[743] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a suit for separation by reason of adultery brought by the wife against her husband, and begun in the Consistory Court of Lichfield; from whence it came up here on an appeal from a grievance (vide 1 Add. 114). It is unnecessary to state more of the proceedings than that they commenced in January, 1820, and have been depending five years. This delay is attributable alone to the husband, but I shall not particularly refer to it further than may bear upon the proof of the facts applying to the merits of the question.

The libel states the history of the parties, and the grounds of the present charge.

The parties were married in February, 1799; George Durant being a gentleman of fortune, the proprietor of Tong Castle, Shropshire; and Mrs. Durant, then Mary Ann Eld, a spinster of age, whose family resided in the same neighbourhood. During their cohabitation the parties lived at Tong Castle, and had fourteen children, twelve of whom are now living. The facts thus far are proved, and are not controverted.

The libel proceeds: and Mr. Durant is charged with having formed, in 1807, an adulterous connection with Mary Bradbury, and with having had three children by her; the first born in July, 1808; the second in March, 1810; the third in December, 1811; and he is alleged to have acknowledged and supported these children. He is also charged with having formed [744] another adulterous connection with Elizabeth Cliffe, by whom he had a child born on the 19th of June, 1809: both these persons were nursery maids in his family. In 1816 he is charged with an adulterous connection with Mary Dyke, his dairy maid; of that connection no child was born which he acknowledged, but it is alleged that in June, 1816, he was seen with her in the criminal act. In 1818 he is charged also with an adulterous connection with Jane James, a labourer's wife, and on the 4th of November with having been caught in the fact on the floor of her cottage. In 1820 there is a similar charge with another labourer's wife, of the name of Starkey; and, on the 26th of April, 1820, it is asserted that he was caught in the fact in a room in her cottage called White Oak Lodge. These are the several adulteries charged.

The libel further pleads: that in January, 1808, in consequence of the preceding adultery, Mrs. Durant withdrew to the house of her father, Francis Eld, Esq. at Seighford, in Staffordshire. Durant, upon that occasion, wrote a letter to her brother confessing his misconduct, expressing contrition, and promising future good conduct. That letter is exhibited, and I shall have occasion hereafter to refer to it (vide infra, p. 770).

The libel then pleads that in consequence of the assurances contained in this letter Mrs. Durant was induced to return; but in 1810, Durant continuing his adulterous conduct with Bradbury and with Cliffe, Mrs. Durant again withdrew to her father's house: Durant went there; and she agreed that if he would leave Tong, break off [745] his connection, and go to reside in Devonshire, she would again cohabit. They accordingly went to reside in Devonshire, and afterwards removed to Bath. Durant then proposed to return to Tong, but she refused, because Bradbury lived in the neighbourhood: accordingly, at the latter end of 1810, they separated; he returned to Tong; she went to reside in London, accompanied by one of her daughters. She remained there till near her confinement (for during these cohabitations she had become pregnant), when, being in want of necessaries, and obliged to sell part of her clothes, she returned in August, 1811, to Tong Castle to lie in. From that time till 1817 she continued to live with her husband at Tong, when he, without any just cause, quarrelled with her—insisted on her leaving his house, which she was obliged to do, and to go to her father's, where she has ever since resided, and has never cohabited with her husband since April, 1817.

This is the substance of the libel, and on account of what passed in the argument it is necessary to consider the effect of these, her own averments. Upon this statement, if proved, she is undoubtedly entitled to the separation prayed; for though she had forgiven the earlier adultery upon condition and assurance of future amendment, yet, if he again committed adultery, even that previous injury would, in point of law, revive. Here is no appearance of being indifferent to her injuries, so as to give her husband a licence for his profligate course of life; but she resents them; she withdraws from his society; she only returns on condition of amend-[746]-ment: and when she a second time consents to be reconciled, she takes the best course to reclaim him, by insisting on quitting their residence and on going to live at a distance: she refuses to accompany her husband back to Tong Castle; but being pregnant and in distress she is obliged at length to return. Unless, then, there was a knowledge of the adultery after the latter end of 1810, and during their subsequent cohabitation, no condonation can be inferred so far as the libel itself lays the case.

Against this charge, so made, what is the defence set up? In plea, none: the husband has given no allegation whatever; but he has administered very long interrogatories. In these interrogatories various grounds of defence are suggested, but he has not ventured to plead any thing responsive; here is no allegation contradicting and denying the charges of adultery; no allegation pleading condonation later than 1810, or knowledge of his subsequent adultery; no allegation exceptive to the general character of a single witness; no allegation recriminatory against the wife, though he compelled her to quit his house.

It is said that a defensive allegation was not given, because the charges of adultery were pleaded so indefinitely that they could not be counterpleaded: but that is not so. The adultery with Bradbury and Cliffe was to be proved, not by acts seen, but by their pregnancy, and by Durant's acknowledgment of the children: it was not necessary, therefore, to lay particular acts; besides that, adultery is admitted, and a different defence is set up; viz. condonation, [747] not innocence. But the adultery with Dyke, James, and Starkey is specifically pleaded: that with Dyke among the trees near the avenue in the month of June; and of that with the other two the time and place are both fixed: yet no contradiction by plea is tendered. It is said, "These charges are not proved, because the witnesses are discredited;" but though all the witnesses were well known dependants at Tong Castle, yet no exception is offered against their character, but Mr. Durant is content with administering interrogatories and cross-examining one against the other, and is not wholly clear of an attempt to tamper with them.

The same observation applies as to the condonation; though he admits the adultery with Bradbury and Cliffe, yet there is no allegation to state Mrs. Durant ever knew that Bradbury had this third child; but he has made an attempt to prove it by interrogatories alone. So, also, with respect to the imputation on account of which he excluded Mrs. Durant from his society, some interrogatories have been addressed to the witnesses, but there is no averment in plea. Now, though he was at liberty to cross-examine to all these points, and evidence thus got out would be admissible, and might be material in aid of what he might plead and examine to; yet the effect is very different, if what is thus extracted be relied upon as the sole ground of defence, because it places the other party under very unfair disadvantages, and might defeat justice. If, for example, he had contradicted the adultery in plea, Mrs. Durant might have adduced other circumstances to corroborate her [748] former charge: if he had attacked the character of her witnesses, she might have supported their character, or have produced other witnesses to confirm and prove the facts: if he had alleged knowledge of the adultery, yet that she forgave it, she might have given a responsive allegation to prove her total ignorance: if he had made any charge of misconduct, she might have repelled and shewn it to be utterly groundless and malicious.

In proceeding, then, to examine the evidence and proofs, I am bound not to lose sight of these considerations, nor to take insulated and detached charges, but the whole together for one part may throw an important light on the probability and credibility of other parts.

That Durant carried on a criminal intercourse with Bradbury and Cliffe is not attempted to be denied. It is admitted he had three children by Bradbury and one by Cliffe: it was prudent on his part to wrap up this series of misconduct in one general admission; but the Court is bound to look at the character of these adulterous connections. He had been married about eight years, had nearly as many children, and his family was further increasing; Bradbury was about sixteen, his nursery-maid, attending on his children, and on that account it is probable she was decent and modest. This young girl, in this situation, does this husband and father of daughters seduce and debauch. Bradbury has been examined, and Mr. Durant's counsel have relied upon parts of her evidence. She entered his service about May, 1807, and staid in the family about eight months, when she went [749] away pregnant. Her account of the commencement and particulars of their criminal intimacy is—

"That when she had been some months in the service, being one day in a room on the ground floor, adjoining the stables, which was unfurnished, Durant came therein and pulled her about: whether he had connection with her at that time she does not recollect, but several times when she was in the back premises, as the brew-house, laundry, and other apartments, and no other person was observed to be about the same, he prevailed on the deponent to have connection with him: at Christmas she was discharged—went first to the house of Cooper at Galey, and thence removed to Newport in Shropshire to lie in."

This, then, is the mode in which this father of a family seduces this poor girl—the attendant upon his own children—almost a child herself; and these are the sort of places in which he carries on his criminal intercourse—in a brewhouse, laundry, or unfurnished apartment adjoining the stables—watching when the other servants were out of the way. I agree with what was said in argument that this wholly takes off the improbability that he was connected with his dairy-maid in the fowl-yard or shrubbery; or with labourers' wives on the floors of their own cottages.

After her confinement at Newport, Bradbury was brought back to the neighbourhood of Tong Castle—to "the house in the wood" inhabited by Doran, and there Durant kept and visited her, and she again became pregnant: she was [750] then sent away to a place at or near Wolverhampton, and in March, 1810, she had a second child—about a year after the other. After the birth of the second child Bradbury returned to her former residence at Doran's—"the house in the wood"—where she remained about three months. There Durant again kept her, and she again became pregnant: she then removed to Oker, near Wolverhampton, and was there delivered of a third child in December, 1811.

It might seem that this profligate adultery hardly admitted of aggravation, but it is aggravated. Between the birth of Bradbury's first and second child, when she went away to lie in, he formed a connection with her successor; the then nursery-maid, Elizabeth Cliffe: she also became pregnant, and she was brought to bed of a male child in June, 1809. Durant carried on this intercourse in his own house, almost in the room with his children: he was discovered one evening on a bed with this girl in one of the spare rooms opposite the nursery, without the door even being locked; and so barefaced was his conduct towards his servants (for Mrs. Durant was then absent), that the nurse, Boycott, in the presence of Rider, the witness, reproached him, telling him that "he is always after her," and pulled him away from the bed and from Cliffe. Conduct more immoral, more degrading, and more disgraceful—making a brothel of his own house with the attendant upon, and in the apartment adjoining that of, his children, scarcely disguising his guilt from his servants—can hardly be imagined.

The fact of these adulteries is fully estab-[751]-lished: the defence set up is condonation. I proceed then to consider the proof of the condonation, not deciding the question whether it can be set up as a bar without being pleaded, unless so far as it is admitted by Mrs. Durant's case.

Mrs. Durant, in her libel, states that after having returned in consequence of Durant's contrite letter in 1808, yet upon discovering the renewal of the adultery with Cliffe she again, in 1810, withdrew to her father's house at Seighford, where she remained a month; but having had an interview with her husband there, she admits that she agreed to cohabit with him upon condition of his quitting Tong and going into Devonshire: they went into Devonshire, and she never again returned to Tong till 1811, as already stated.

Here then is an admission of condonation after the second adultery with Bradbury, and after that with Cliffe: it is not, however, a condonation evincing an unfeeling disregard of her rights and insensibility to the injury; she deeply feels her wrongs; she duly resents them, and she properly takes the most prudent means of reclaiming her husband. Even her return in 1811 was under circumstances which almost amounted to compulsion and necessity: here also is an admission of subsequent cohabitation, but here is no admission of a knowledge of the fresh adultery with Bradbury.

To establish condonation of that third adultery, and thereby to bar her of her remedy, there must be proof that she was aware of her husband's renewed misconduct; for the mere fact of subsequent cohabitation does not imply for-[752]-giveness, nor operate as a bar, unless knowledge of the adultery be shewn. I know not of any case where condonation has been held to estop a party when it has not been pleaded. It may not be necessary to decide whether, if there were clear indisputable evidence of a condonation, it might, or might not, operate as a bar even against a wife without being pleaded or directly admitted: but all the authorities shew that it is not so readily presumed as a bar against the wife as against the husband. All lay down (and the common feelings of mankind confirm them) that it is the very reverse; that the injury is different; that the forgiveness on the part of the wife, especially with a large family, in the hopes of reclaiming her husband, is meritorious; while a similar forgiveness on the part of the husband would be degrading and dishonourable. Without, therefore, advancing, as a clear rule, that condonation to deprive a wife of redress must actually be pleaded; yet I may venture to say that, in order to be a bar, it must be clearly and distinctly proved. Knowledge and forgiveness are not legally to be presumed.

How then stands the proof of this condonation? In the first place, Mrs. Durant was not at Tong during any part of this third adulterous intercourse with Bradbury: she was either in Devonshire, at Bath, or in London: for the child was born in December, 1811. Bradbury was at the house in the wood only three months, so that she was in the neighbourhood of Tong only during the spring of 1811, and long before Mrs. Durant's return in August, 1811, had been removed to many miles distant, where she after-[753]-wards resided, and continued to reside. Durant was so cautious to keep the birth of this child from the knowledge of his wife that he never afterwards would allow Bradbury to come into the neighbourhood; and Bradbury swears, and it is relied upon by Durant, "that she never had intercourse with and never spoke to him after the birth of this last child." Rider deposes "that Bradbury wished to see Durant, but that he said it would be his ruin if he was seen talking to her." Rider by error states the time to be about 1816 or 1817, but it must have been considerably later. Doran, the wife, describes Bradbury as coming to the wood and wishing to see Durant much later, for she says "she had left her house ten or twelve years before:" so does Doran, the husband; and the warrant against Bradbury is dated in 1820. So that there is no trace of Bradbury's having been in the neighbourhood of Tong after Mrs. Durant returned there in 1811, or of Mrs. Durant ever afterwards having seen her, before the final separation: and yet the whole relied upon to prove the most important fact—namely, Mrs. Durant's knowledge of this subsequent adultery—is a single passage in Bradbury's evidence, when in answer to the sixty-ninth interrogatory she says "that Mrs. Durant did upbraid her with the birth of the children mentioned in her deposition in chief:" not stating when, where, nor in what terms. In her deposition in chief she has mentioned having had three children, and it is assumed that Mrs. Durant must have referred to all three, and must have upbraided Bradbury for having had all those children by [754] Durant, and that this took place before the separation. This alone is to prove Mrs. Durant's knowledge of the third adultery, and to prove, without pleading it and against every probability, that Mrs. Durant ever saw Bradbury after her return to Tong in 1811, before the final separation; for if this happened after it would be no condonation. If I was obliged to decide the case on this point alone, I should be strongly disposed to hold that there was not that proof of a knowledge of the subsequent adultery upon which condonation could be bottomed as a bar to the relief sought by the wife from as profligate and degrading an injury, of the nature complained of, as could well be brought before any tribunal.

But the case does not rest on this point alone. Here are subsequent adulteries charged, to which it is not suggested that condonation applies: and if either of these subsequent adulteries be proved, it is clear that the earlier adultery revives and forms an aggregate upon which relief must be granted to the injured wife.

The parties continued, as has been already stated, to cohabit till April, 1817. The next adultery is laid in the seventh article of the libel to have been committed with Mary Dyke, and on that article two witnesses have been examined, Jane Rider and Esther Hampton. Their own evidence is to this effect: "Jane Rider was born on Mr. Durant's estate; she and her husband (who was a tailor, and to whose evidence I have referred) were employed by, and rented two cows of Durant; these cows used to come with Durant's to be [755] milked near the fowl-yard. Mary Dyke was the dairy-maid; she was a neighbour's daughter whom the deponent had known from her childhood; one day the deponent was told by Durant's upper servant not to milk her cows by the fowl-yard, but at another spot near an elm tree in the park; a day or two after she saw Dyke for the first time fetching the cows out of the park; a thought struck her to go and see what was going on at the fowl-yard: looking through a hole in the wall she was much surprised to see Dyke standing against the wall with her face to her and Durant very near her with his back towards her, the witness; they were quite alone, the witness was frightened, and came away directly, and went again to the elm tree." Such is Jane Rider's evidence.

Esther Hampton was the cook at Tong Castle: "She often saw Durant behaving in a familiar way and toying with Dyke, throwing his arms round her neck when they were alone in the dairy. One day, a few days before she left the service, which was on the 8th of July, about three o'clock—the usual dinner-time—she had dished up dinner; the servant said 'his master was not at home;' she said 'she would find him' —having a few minutes before seen her master pass the window, and a short time before that having seen Dyke at some distance, each going in a direction to meet at a particular point; she went to an avenue at the back of the castle, where she suspected she should find them together; she did find them in the act of adultery;" which she describes.

[756] If these witnesses are believed, here is adultery proved. In considering the probability of the story and the credit of the witnesses I must take the whole case together; and then, looking at the connection with the two nursery maids, is this account of his adultery with the dairy-maid improbable? Not in the least. Remembering the order for Rider to milk her cows in a different place—this order conveyed by the upper servant, who afterwards fathers Dyke's child, and who might be a very convenient person to Mr. Durant on this and other occasions for various purposes—has any person much doubt what was the object of Durant's meeting Dyke in the fowl-yard? though, if that were the only circumstance, it might not be sufficient proof of adultery being then and there committed. But let us look at the rest of the history.

It was argued that the time and place spoken to by Hampton are improbable. As to the time: not calculating it perhaps very nicely, he would select it, supposing that the servants were engaged in preparing for dinner, for with Bradbury in the laundry and brewhouse he watched his opportunity when the servants were out of the way; as to the place; on other occasions he was not very choice—among the trees in a summer's day with the dairy-maid is not more improbable than in out-of-doors' offices with the nursery-maid: as to the credit of the witnesses; Durant, though well knowing them, has not ventured to except against their general character; Hampton has had a child; but, with the example of Durant to countenance her, that is [757] no great discredit at Tong Castle—chastity was not there, with such a pattern as the master and head of the family afforded, a virtue much to be expected or in high estimation; and the fact of Dyke's having had a child, which was laid to this convenient upper servant, does not go far to shew that the master had no criminal intercourse, whoever might be the actual father. After, then, considering fully all the observations made by counsel, I find it very difficult to withhold my belief and conviction of the truth of this individual charge. If this be so, it becomes unnecessary to enter into much detail of the other two charges with the two labourers' wives in their respective cottages, for of this adultery with Dyke there is no attempt to allege condonation, and the former adulteries therefore would be revived.

The three Blakemores do certainly not stand high in point of credit, but their characters have not been fairly attacked and put in issue by plea: had that been done, they either might have been supported, or the accusations themselves might have been corroborated by other witnesses. The improbability of the conversation between James and the female Blakemore is not very great, considering the lax morals of the neighbourhood, considering that James herself had a child before marriage, and the sort of vanity which she, being of loose character and habits, might feel in being so noticed by the squire of Tong Castle: she might think it matter rather of boast than of concealment and shame. As to the place, again—the floor of the cottage—Mr. Durant might be as well satis-[758]-fied with that, as with the floor of the brewhouse or laundry.

The circumstance that makes the most impression on my mind, as affecting the truth of these charges, is that Blakemore should upon both occasions happen to come into the cottage just at the exact time: such a coincidence may possibly have happened, but it raises considerable doubt as to the reality of a story, coming from witnesses not wholly unshaken in credit. If this were the only proof of adultery; if there were no other charges established; if up to this time Durant's conduct had been unimpeached as a father and a husband, I should not have ventured to pronounce a sentence on the evidence of the Blakemores; but the whole history, standing as it does, makes it scarcely necessary to place much weight, or to come to any decisive opinion, upon these two charges; they may or they may not be true; but being spoken to by such witnesses and of such a person, I should be more disposed to say "not proven" than "not guilty;" for I am far from being satisfied that it is fabricated, still less that it is suborned evidence. If Blakemore has been to Seighford, he has also been to Tong Castle, for his account on the thirty-sixth interrogatory of the agents of Durant, and of Durant himself having him together with Starkey up to Tong Castle, though not adding to the credit of the witness, does not exhibit conduct quite proper in the party against whom he was about to be produced as a material witness. The influence which Durant must have over the class of witnesses, who alone could be the persons capable of proving the adultery [759] charged, renders their evidence not the less credible. It is true that Mrs. Durant did not separate herself on the ground of his adultery: she was not aware of the extent of it; and this brings me to the account of the separation and the subsequent history.

In the latter end of April, 1817, Mrs. Durant being at Seighford with her father, who was ill, and her sister, Miss Eld, and another lady being at Tong Castle, Durant charged his wife with impropriety of conduct with the tutor of his children. Mrs. Durant on hearing it immediately returned to Tong Castle, accompanied by her two brothers; and Mr. Slaney, a friend of Durant's, being called in, the matter was investigated, and Durant declared himself perfectly satisfied; but the tutor left the family. Notwithstanding this, Durant in a few days afterwards ordered his doors to be shut against his wife, stated to Slaney that he had proofs of her criminality, and desired she would attend at Slaney's house, not at Tong Castle, to exculpate herself: she indignantly declined, and by Durant's orders his doors continued to be shut against her. He has ever since persisted in the same insinuations, inquiring in his interrogatories whether she has not kept up an intercourse with this tutor and supplied him with money; and even at the hearing has instructed his counsel to persevere in the same species of suggestions; but he has never brought forward the charge in any specific and tangible shape, and the Court is bound in common justice to consider it as perfectly groundless, and to say in the words of Lord Stowell, in the case of Soil-[760]-leux v. Soilleux (1 Hagg. Con. 378), when observing on similar conduct on the part of the husband, "This is a continuation of the atrocious conduct which has marked the character of this man throughout." The terms are not inapplicable on the present occasion.

Upon these events in 1817 the wife did not immediately resort to the present suit. A deed had been executed by Durant in 1809, by which he bound himself to allow his wife £500 a year in case she should at any time choose to live separate, and to support one of the children. An action was brought in the name of the trustee upon this deed to recover the allowance: in the first instance a verdict was obtained, but upon a writ of error the decision was reversed (Titley v. Durant, 7 Price, 577); she then resorted to the present suit. The proceeding under that deed was no legal bar to this suit, nor does it appear to bear unfavourably upon the case of the wife, After this charge, after an exclusion from his house and his society, could she wish to return degraded and insulted to her twelve children and her servants? Her object could alone be to procure a subsistence in a state of separation, either under the deed or by the present suit: there was no other alternative; and if that object could at once be obtained under the deed it was natural and not improper that she should try that method, rather than proclaim the misconduct of the father of her children by a detailed disclosure of it in such a proceeding as the present. It is no bar to the suit; it is no acquiescence in her injuries; it was rather meritorious [761] to abstain from the exposure of her husband's domestic profligacy till driven to it by necessity as her only remaining remedy.

In the course of the argument the Court threw out whether, if the condonation took off the effect of the admitted adultery and the subsequent adultery were not proved, this groundless charge against the wife and shutting his doors against her would not do away the effect of the condonation and revive her title to legal relief: it may perhaps be unnecessary to decide upon the point, as I am satisfied that adultery subsequent to the established condonation is proved; but it may not be fitting wholly to pass by this point.

Some propositions seem to be admitted—

First, that condonation is accompanied with an implied condition.

Secondly, that the condition implied is that the injury shall not be repeated.

Thirdly, that a repetition at least of the same injury does away the condonation and revives the former injury.

So far the propositions are clear: but must the injury be of the same sort—proved in the same clear manner—be sufficient per se to found a separation? If nothing but clear proof of actual adultery will do away condonation of adultery, the rule of revival becomes nearly useless, for the revival is unnecessary. The only possible way in which the former adultery could bear would be in, possibly, inducing the Court to give some slight additional alimony: but it could not bear even in that way when the suit is brought by the husband; in which case, [762] of course, there would be no question of permanent alimony. It appears, therefore, hardly to be consistent with common sense, that clear proof of an actual fact of subsequent adultery should be necessary to remove the bar: something short would be sufficient, and it seemed almost admitted, though no direct authority was adduced in support of the position, that solicitation of chastity would remove the effect of condonation of adultery, but still it was maintained that it must be "an injury ejusdem generis."

It is difficult to accede to the good sense even of that principle, or to suppose that the implied condition upon which the forgiveness takes place could be, "You may treat me with every degree of insult and harshness—nay, with actual cruelty, and I bar myself from all remedy for your profligate adultery—only do not again commit adultery or any thing tending to adultery:" the result of the argument is, that this must be supposed to be the condition implied when condonation of adultery takes place. The plainer reason and the good sense of the implied condition is that "you shall not only abstain from adultery, but shall in future treat me, in every respect treat me (to use the words of the law), 'with conjugal kindness'—on this condition I will overlook the past injuries you have done me."

This principle, however, does not rest wholly on its own apparent good sense, but the Court has authority to support it. It has been held that cruelty will revive adultery. The case of Worsley v. Worsley (vide supra, p. 734, and infra, p. 764) was read by the Court [763] in the course of the argument, and the Court has no reason to doubt the correctness of the note. If this cause had turned upon that authority alone, I might have thought it necessary myself to look through the original papers, but knowing the accuracy of the quarter from which this note came, and, still more, finding that case fully investigated, and the principle recognized by another very high authority, in the case of D'Aguilar v. D'Aguilar, I have contented myself with what I have already quoted respecting the decision of Worsley.

I advert to the case of D'Aguilar also for another purpose, viz. to set right a misconception which seems to have arisen, that it was there laid down by my Lord Stowell that the reviving cruelty must be sufficient per se to be the ground of a sentence; and if that great Judge had solemnly laid down such a proposition I should have much diffidence and hesitation in dissenting. The passage to which I am about to refer is to be found in the Consistory Reports, a collection of most valuable judgments; but it is not in one of the cases reported in the body of the work; it is only stated in a note. The passage stands thus:

It is said "that though condonation might be taken away by subsequent facts, they must not be slender facts, but such as would be sufficient to found a sentence: this is the true rule. But I think the facts pleaded are such as might avail substantively, and therefore revive the ancient facts." (a)[1] This was merely on debating a plea, when dicta may be [764] stated with less precision, and are more easily misapprehended, more especially as the point did not require decision, there being actual subsequent cruelty pleaded: but, upon looking at the sentence, I find that distinguished individual lays down a different doctrine, namely, that less will revive former acts than would found a sentence.

He says, "A question has been raised in argument whether acts of adultery revive acts of cruelty; and a case has been cited in which it was decided by Dr. Henchman, who I always understood was one of the most judicious practitioners who ever presided here, that acts of cruelty revived acts of adultery before condoned. The case is Worsley v. Worsley. I have had it looked up. It never proceeded to sentence; but the allegation was admitted after an opposition. It alleges that the parties were married in 1712; that the husband treated the wife with cruelty; that he committed adultery in 1720; and in 1728 the parties were living together, for acts of cruelty are then stated. I presume, then, the objection taken was that after 1720 they were living together, and the only ground on which the Court could admit the act of adultery was that it was revived by the cruelty. The Court, however, overruled the objection. It has then been considered in this Court that circumstances may take off the effect of condonation which would not support an original cause. Facts of cruelty revive adultery, though they would not support an original suit for it. The condonation in this case is such that it is [765] hardly necessary to resort to the authority of Worsley, but it confirms the doctrine that facts would revive which would not be a sufficient ground for an original proceeding. It is held that words of heat and passion, of incivility or reproach, are not alone sufficient for an original cause; nor harshness of behaviour: but I cannot but think that their operation would be stronger in condonation. Words otherwise of heat receive a different interpretation if upon former occasions they have been accompanied with acts; if it is apparent that the party was in the habit of following up words with blows: and on these grounds I am of opinion much less is sufficient to destroy condonation than to found an original suit." (a)[2]

Under these authorities I am inclined to hold: first, that cruelty will revive adultery: and, secondly, that less is necessary to revive than to found an original sentence.

The same doctrine is maintained by the same eminent judge in Popkin v. Popkin.(b)

(a)[1] D'Aguilar v. D'Aguilar, 1 Hagg. Con. 134, notis.

(a)[2] D'Aguilar v. D'Aguilar, Consistory, Mich. T. 1794. See a note of the judgment in this case, post, p. 773.

(b) In Popkin v. Popkin (Consistory, Hil. Term, 2nd Session, 1794) the libel, after pleading the marriage in 1778, charged the husband with general intoxication; habitually frequenting brothels; associating with common prostitutes at Bethune and at Lisle; attempts to debauch his women-servants in his own house; an act of adultery "on an evening happening in 1787, or the beginning of 1788, with a young woman, the servant of a milliner at Lisle, and that he afterwards continued his improper intercourse with her, and confessed the same to Mr. Montgomery;" two specific violent acts of cruelty in January and June, 1784; and general cruelty from April to August, 1784; venereal disease in 1789; and up to December, 1790, and his confessions; his attempts to sleep in the same bed with his wife, and that on her refusal he became violently enraged, made use of many outrageous and dreadful menaces to compel her, and, on one occasion, at Lisle, in September, 1790, "he seized her in his arms, and forcibly dragged her along towards his bed; that she disengaged herself, and immediately ran down stairs, undressed, into a room where was a gentleman sitting, her husband's relation; that her husband followed her into the parlour, when she fell on her knees, intreated him to desist, promising to return to his bed as soon as he would satisfy her he was cured." The libel further charged similar conduct on several successive nights; and that in consequence of such conduct, she, on the 6th of January, 1791, while he was absent in England, quitted his house (which he had hitherto prevented) and had never lived or cohabited with him since August, 1790.

Dr. Arnold and Dr. Swabey in support of the libel.

"The [766] principal objection raised is that a condonation appears on the face of the libel. But it is [767] not proved that acts of adultery will not revive cruelty, nor that acts of cruelty will not revive [768] adultery. It may be true that, under a citation for adultery, you might not originally [769] plead facts of cruelty, nor vice versâ; but I do not know that it has been held the two are so slightly connected that one will not revive the other (see Barrett v. Barrett, supra, 22). No such case has been cited: nor do I know that such has been the doctrine of this Court. I have rather understood otherwise; and the case of Worsley v. Worsley, quoted by Dr. Swabey, is an authority in point. It is not necessary to give a decided opinion here, as the fact of revival is of a mixed nature, partly cruelty and partly evidence of adultery, and would revive either."

To apply the principle to this case. Here is not cruelty which would support a sentence "propter sævitiam;" but here is an act which might be pleaded as such in conjunction with other circumstances. If a person who had ill-treated his wife, and had been guilty of acts of violence and words of menace, had finally made a charge of misconduct and criminality which he had not attempted to allege nor to prove, and under that pretence had shut his door against her, it cannot be doubted that such conduct would be admissible matter in a suit for separation by reason of cruelty. By some authorities in the civil law this was held to be a distinct ground of separation, and passages were quoted in the argument to that effect which it is unnecessary again to state. These Courts and the law of this country have not gone the length of recognizing it as a substantive ground; but it is a fact, among others, "per quod consortium amittitur." Making [770] this charge, and excluding her from his residence without provision, is a species of malicious desertion; but neither is malicious

Dr. Nicholl and Dr. Laurence contrà.

Per Curiam. Sir William Scott (Lord Stowell). "This libel is offered in a suit for the adultery and cruelty of the husband. It is objected to in toto: but I can reject in toto only on one of two grounds:—1. That the story, on the face of it, shews a false case which cannot be proved. 2. That it evidently appears, from the facts pleaded, that the party complaining has barred herself.

"A plea cannot be rejected as false unless it is manifest that it is impossible to prove it. Improbability is not sufficient: it must be shewn it cannot be proved by any possibility. It is not here contended that proof is impossible, but that it is improbable. The delay is accounted for by facts suggested by themselves, viz. the absence of the husband out of the kingdom and the derangement of his circumstances. This is sufficient of itself; but in fact there has been no delay; for the citation was taken out long before it could be served. But mere time is no bar in the case of a woman, as various reasons may induce her to submit. Mere flux of time is no condonation; neither on the face of the proceedings nor on the libel does it appear that there is any impossibility of proof.

"The principal objection raised is that a condonation appears on the face of the libel; but it is not proved that acts of adultery will not revive cruelty, nor that acts of cruelty will not revive adultery. It may be true that, under a citation for adultery, you might not originally plead facts of cruelty, nor vice versâ; but I do not know that it has been held the two are so slightly connected that one will not revive the other. No such case has been cited, nor do I know that such has been the doctrine of this Court: I have rather understood otherwise; and the case of Worsley v. Worsley, quoted by Dr. Swabey, is an authority in point (Worsley v. Worsley, supra, 734). It is not necessary to give a decided opinion here, as the fact of revival is of a mixed nature, partly cruelty and partly evidence of adultery, and would revive either.

"It is said the only specific act of adultery is charged in the 8th article, in the year 1787. It is not shewn this was known to the wife: it might be secret; of course, then, she could not forgive it. It would be matter of defence to prove that she was acquainted with the fact, and forgave him. The 12th article states that he was violently afflicted with venereal disease, and attempted to sleep with his wife, and thus communicate it to her. Whether this disease is evidence of adultery may depend upon circumstances, such as length of time since the marriage. If it shews itself soon after the marriage, it might be hard to say that it would be proof of adultery. Here the parties have been married twelve years; and though possibly it might be lying in the blood so long, yet this would be matter of defence, and to be proved. Under such circumstances it is primâ facie evidence of adultery.

desertion by the law of England a ground of separation (see Forster v. Forster, 1 Hagg. Con. Reports, 154).

What, however, was the situation of this lady at that moment, and what does it now continue? Here is the wife and the mother turned out of doors in the face of her neighbours, her family, and her twelve children, under the heaviest of all imputations—a charge of criminality with her children's tutor. Is there any woman who would not have considered an act of personal violence, inflicted in passion or even deliberately and maliciously, trivial and pardonable in comparison with this accusation? Who would not have considered an act of casual adultery, nay, the deliberate seduction of a nursery-maid, trivial—not really in itself, but as affecting the feelings of a wife—trivial in comparison with this charge? a charge made not in the haste and error of the moment, but kept up and persevered in to the present time? And yet this severest of all injuries is not to wipe away the former condonation; but that condonation is to bar the wife of a remedy on account of all the profligate adulteries previously committed. This is not treatment in conformity with the promises and conditions on which she forgave; promises not left to implication, but expressed in Durant's own letter:

"My dear Sir,—I am again obliged to apply to you in my distress; I am the most wretched man alive; [771] my poor dear Marianne has behaved like an angel, but it is impossible she can ever forgive me. On Friday last she heard of the brutal passion which had hurried me on to commit what I shall repent of to my last hour. One of the women confessed to her that I had been criminally connected with her. As I might have expected, she insisted on leaving the house instantly, and the carriage took her on the road to London: but as I could never bear the idea of parting with her, I followed it on horseback, and she most indulgently consented to return. I

"But it is said, 'here is a condonation; for the wife promised she would return to his bed when she was satisfied he was cured.' This declaration, however, was made under force and violence, and to relieve herself from his attacks. The promise was merely conditional, and that condition was never fulfilled. The husband has a right to the person of his wife, but not if her health is endangered. It is impossible to say that this is such a condonation as will bar adultery charged on the husband.

"On the charge of cruelty it is said that there are only two acts of cruelty in twelve years: if only one act, and that was of an inflamed nature, and was sufficiently gross to excite terror in the wife, she would not be barred (see Holden v. Holden, 1 Hagg. Con. Rep. 458-9). It does not follow there are not other intermediate acts which the party might plead if necessary; but she would be advised only to plead sufficient facts without loading her case with supernumerary circumstances.

"The acts of violence are not objected to; but it is said she consented to live with him. It is not, however, necessary for the wife to withdraw from cohabitation on the first or second instance of misconduct. It is legal and meritorious in her to submit to no inconsiderable degree of ill treatment; to be patient as long as possible. Such forbearance is not permitted to weaken her title to relief. But here cruelty is carried down to the latest period of the cohabitation; the husband forcing his wife to his bed when he was violently affected with venereal disease. It is not necessary, when there is an attempt at violence by an overt act, to wait till it is actually put into execution. Here he attempted to draw her to his bed when infected with venereal disease; an injury of a most malignant kind, and attempted in the most improper and violent manner. It has been said that he was unconscious of this malady: that is for him to shew; though it is improbable at present that he should succeed in establishing his ignorance. I am clearly of opinion that as this disease continued to December, she quitting cohabitation on the 6th of January, it brings the charge down sufficiently, revives former acts, and repels the suggestion of condonation. I overrule without hesitation the general grounds of objection."

In remarking upon the particular objections to the libel the Court said: "The attempts to debauch his own women servants was a strong act of cruelty; perhaps not alone sufficient to divorce, but which might weigh, in conjunction with others, as an act of considerable indignity and outrage to his wife's feelings. The attempt to make a brothel of his own house was brutal conduct, of which the wife had a right to complain."

cannot object to the present determination of being some time at Seighford, as I hope she will there recover the tranquillity I have so miserably destroyed: would she but once consent to return here I would relinquish every thing in the world to her guidance, and if I ever prove ungrateful for her kindness would willingly live on bread and water to give her possession of all my property. Your kindness will, I am assured, send me an answer by my servant, and I hope bring her leave to come to Seighford to fetch her home. I trust nothing will induce you to let her leave Seighford, as I know she would rather suffer any poverty than let her family know where she retired to, and in her present disposition I fear she might make away with herself."

Such are the promises on which she returns: these he breaks by repeated subsequent adulteries, and consummates his unworthy treatment by these cruel accusations. If the case turned [772] upon this point, I cannot say how I might feel compelled to decide: but if I were bound to leave the wife without remedy, I should deeply lament the hardship and cruelty of the law which demanded such a decision.

And what is the present situation of this lady according to the husband's prayer to be dismissed? His counsel say her remedy is a suit of restitution. Does then the husband pray that he may be compelled to take home and to treat with conjugal kindness the wife whom he has for years been charging as criminal? that he shall take back to the society and to the management of his children the mother whom he has so branded and degraded by his imputations? Is this wife, who has suffered the grossest injuries, in point of law, from the profligate adulteries of her husband, and the still more distressing insults, in point of feeling, from his groundless charges, to ask the assistance of the law to compel him to take her home to be held up by him as an object of scorn and aversion to her own children? Is this the "consortium vitæ," which she can alone seek? The Court cannot but feel relieved that its duty does not drive it to place her in this miserable and humiliating condition.

On the grounds already stated, that her knowledge of the last adultery with Bradbury is not proved, and that the husband's adultery with Dyke is proved; and without deciding on any of these other points, I think I am warranted in pronouncing the wife entitled to the sentence of separation which she prays.

[773] LADY D'AGUILAR v. BARON D'AGUILAR.(a) Consistory, Michaelmas Term, 2nd Session, 1794.—The husband's conduct is legal cruelty, if by cohabitation the wife is exposed to bodily hazard and intolerable hardship. On proof of such conduct and the husband's adultery with three different women a sentence of separation à mensâ et thoro pronounced at the wife's prayer, and the husband condemned in her costs.—All persons (ex. gr. Jews) who stand in the relation of husband and wife in any way that the law allows have a claim to relief on the violation of any matrimonial duty.—The remoteness of facts deposed to accounts for the witnesses relating them with less precision and distinctness. All that the Court can require is to be satisfied that the evidence is substantially true.—A wife's delay in applying to the Ecclesiastical Court for redress from cruelty does not infer that there is no ground for complaint, nor even raise a presumption against the truth of the charge.—An intermediate separation so approximates two periods of cohabitation that acts of cruelty, happening before the separation, are to be looked upon as if they had happened recently.—The mode in which after a separation a return to cohabitation was effected is material to shew whether there was or was not condonation.—All condonations by operation of law are expressly or impliedly conditional; for the effect is taken off by repetition of misconduct.—Circumstances may take off the effect of condonation which would not support an original cause.—The wife's unwilling acquiescence in a return to live in the same house, but without connubial cohabitation, does not amount to a complete forgiveness.—To domestic conduct friends, dependants, and servants can alone speak; they must have some bias, and the Court must receive their evidence with some drawbacks.—Cruelty may be relative, and depend on the age, habits, &c. of the party.—The husband's rights that may legally be insisted on by the due exercise of marital authority must not be enforced by indignity, brutal violence, nor by threats.—If a wife proceeding against her husband for cruelty and adultery was not originally justified in withdrawing from cohabitation, the Court must pronounce her under the obligation to return.—If the Mosaic law as at present received allows concubines, such a privilege could not be noticed without being specially pleaded. Quære whether it could be noticed at all in the Courts of this country?—Conjugal cohabitation after an act of adultery, avowed by the husband to the wife, may be condonation; but if a wife overlooks one act of human infirmity, it is not a legal consequence that she pardons all other acts.—Condonation is not held so strictly against a wife as against a husband.—In general the husband is bound to defray the wife's costs, and also to provide alimony pendente lite; but when the wife has separate means, which the Court deems sufficient for her defence and subsistence, she is not intitled to alimony nor costs during suit; she then stands on the common footing of a litigant party, and on proving her case has a primâ facie right to costs. It is however discretionary with Courts on a consideration of all the circumstances to relax the rule.

Dr. Nicholl and Dr. Swabey for Lady D'Aguilar.

Dr. Arnold and Dr. Laurence contrà.

Judgment—Sir William Scott (Lord Stowell). This is a cause of separation for cruelty and adultery brought by the wife against the husband. The marriage took place in March, 1767, according to the rites of the Jewish nation, both parties being Jews. The Court does not remember any proceeding between such parties in a case of this nature: there may have been such, but whether there have been or not there is no doubt that the suit may be entertained.(b) The marriages of Jews are expressly protected by the marriage act;(c) and persons of that persuasion are as much entitled to the justice of the country as any others; for I take the doctrine to be that all persons who stand in the relation of husband and wife in any way the [774] law allows, as by a foreign marriage, or by a domestic marriage not contrary to law, have a claim to relief on the violation of any matrimonial duty. Jews in this country have the same rights of succession to property, and of administration, as other subjects; and they come to the Ecclesiastical Court in order to have such rights secured. Many of them are possessed of considerable personal property; and they have the same right to transmit it as others. It would be hard, then, if they had not the same mode of securing the legitimacy of their children, and consequently if the same rights of divorce did not belong to them. I have therefore no doubt that it is the duty of the Court to entertain such a suit between Jews as between others of a different persuasion.

The case comes before me simply upon the evidence on the libel: nothing has been pleaded by the husband in contradiction or explanation. On the admission of the libel the Court directed the part relating to the property to be reformed, thinking that it might embarrass the Court by leading to an inquiry into matters impertinent, and not within its cognizance.(a) [775] Other parts were ordered to be struck out

(b) See the cases of Lindo v. Belisario, 1 Hagg. Con. 216; and Appendix, p. 7; and Goldsmid v. Bromer, 1 Hagg. Con. Rep. 324.

(c) 26 Geo. 2, c. 26. Marriages of Jews are also excepted out of the operation of the marriage act now in force, viz. 4 Geo. 4, c. 76, s. 31. For an account of the legal state of the Jews in this country, see the Addenda to Jacob's edition of Roper's Husband and Wife, vol. 2, p. 476, and the references given.

(a) The eighth article of the libel, in substance, pleaded "that in April, 1773, when the wife withdrew from cohabitation, she was possessed of jewels, and had in her own house jewels, plate, household furniture and other effects, to the value of 8000l., all which were her own sole and separate property; that the husband entered upon the premises and possessed himself of all the said effects, her wearing apparel, and ornaments of her person, except the clothes she had on." On this article the Court said, "It has been objected that this will lead to a discussion upon which the Court may find it difficult to satisfy itself: the husband primâ facie is entitled to the property of the wife: it is only by stipulation that it can be taken from him, and it is discretionary what part shall be communicated to the wife. The Court would be under great difficulty in interposing in such an inquiry: the consequence of admitting as too minute and particular, not because I thought [776] that debarring the wife of her fair indulgences was irrelevant, but because facts, when too [777] minutely pleaded, carry a ridiculous appearance. To consider then what appears in evidence.

Mr. Pereira, the executor of the first husband of the wife, is a witness to whom there is no objection. His account of the manner of their cohabitation gives a striking picture of habitual harshness and incivility. "He observed that in the first week after their marriage he treated her with great harshness; spoke in a loud impe-[778]-rious tone; his manner was so disgusting that witness ceased to visit them; his manner was contemptuous; it brought tears into her eyes." Mrs. Kahlen confirms this account. It is true that in 1770 this witness was very young; and it is a long time ago: and much observation has been made on her minute testimony; but looking at the facts to which she deposes, I think it not improbable they may have made that exact and lasting impression to which she swears. It is truly said that her evidence as to a fact which occurred when she was nine years old would be received with caution even at the moment. But all the Court has to consider is, whether the witness gives an account on which it can judicially depend. Her account of his general treatment is: "She was often at the house; he treated his wife so cruelly as at that time to impress her mind with the idea that he was an ill-natured man: he treated her in the harshest manner. 'Bitch,' and 'damnation seize your blood,' were frequent expressions. She at length avoided going." These two witnesses together describe such general ill-treatment and behaviour as to be highly improper, and which amount to a great degree of harshness; though perhaps not alone sufficient for the Court to take hold of.

But there are two facts on which the Court is bound to interpose. Mrs. Kahlen this article would be an averment in justification of the husband, that it was not the separate property of the wife. The husband has a large discretion over joint property. How is the Court to discriminate and determine on such matters? This part of the article would lead, I think, to an inconvenient inquiry: I shall therefore limit the article to pleading that he deprived her of her wearing apparel, together with the ornaments of her person. A wife has always a right to have her clothes; the law shews a special indulgence to a wife's rights in her paraphernalia and ornaments.

The only part of the ninth article objected to is that which pleads, "That the husband lay in a separate bed." This should not be pleaded as an act of cruelty; it would be too much for the Court to declare it cruelty.

The tenth article pleads, "That he abused her very much, cursed and swore at her bitterly, called her whore, and other opprobrious names; that he held his clenched fists to her face, and declared that he would do for her; that he would be the death of her." It is said these are mere words; but these are acts amounting to an assault at common law, for which he would be bound over to keep the peace. Words of abuse and of reproach create only resentment, and are not legal cruelty; but words of menace intimating a malignant intention of doing bodily harm, and even affecting the security of life, are legal cruelty. The Court is not to wait till the threats are carried into execution; but is to interpose where the words are such as might raise a reasonable apprehension of violence, and excite such fear and terror as make the life of the wife intolerable. If rendering life intolerable be the true criterion of cruelty, what can have that effect more than continual terror, and the constant apprehension of bodily injury? It may be shewn that these were mere words of heat; but primâ facie, it is to be understood that a man means what he says. Until I am instructed by superior authority, I shall hold that the Court is obliged to interpose where words of menace are used. I should feel my responsibility sit uneasy upon me if, in consequence of rejecting a plea charging such an act, harm should happen. But, to interpret such words, the party has a right to refer back to violence formerly used.

The article proceeds to state minute acts: I think they may better be stated in a general way; they throw a levity on the business when pleaded, and are more proper to come from the witnesses. As to spitting on her, nothing can be more gross cruelty, and there is a case in Hetley in which a prohibition was denied, the only act of cruelty pleaded being spitting on the face; and that was adjudged sufficient.(a)

The 11th pleads, "That by imposition and threats he compelled her to execute a deed of assignment of 3560l. South Sea stock." Here is a general averment that this was not only obtained by threats but by imposition also. I cannot, consistently with says, "That one day at dinner D'Aguilar quarrelled with the servant; was then sulky; then flew into a passion with his wife without provocation; and, pushing the deponent aside, he threw the fire-screen with violence at his wife, saying [779] 'Damnation seize your blood.' Deponent believes it would probably have killed if it had struck her: she was alarmed and ran to her aunt's house." The fire-screen then was thrown with an intention to strike, and with a violence which would have endangered the person. It is said that no other witnesses have been examined: but it does not appear that any were spectators, or, if spectators, that they are alive. This, therefore, is an act which the law considers direct cruelty, and I see no improbability that it should make an indelible impression on the mind and memory of a child; and the account corresponds with the husband's character.

Another fact is spoken to by Pereira and Linneard. The former says: "In December, 1772, Lady D'Aguilar came to his co-executor; complained that her husband had beaten her; she shewed her arm; it was bruised; he advised her to swear the peace against him, which she did; and bail was given." Linneard deposes: "At the end of 1772, or in the beginning of 1773, she came to her aunt complaining that her husband had beaten her; her arm was bruised from the shoulder to the elbow; and black as if mortified. She continued ill a considerable time." I am at least satisfied that articles of peace were exhibited against him, and that bail was given.

It is said these facts are remote: they are so; but the Court is to consider that as a fair reason why the witnesses relate them with less precision and distinctness. If I am satisfied the evidence is substantially true, that is all I can require. Again, it is objected that there is [780] no evidence but the declarations of the party herself, and general principles, admit this as cruelty: it would be improper to inquire into this transaction, if the parties did not resort to Courts which can invalidate the act. I, therefore, reject this part of the article. The latter part, which pleads "The mode of compelling her to attend at the office of the accountant general by threats, and by holding up his clenched fists," I shall admit; but I shall not inquire into that part which states "that the object of going there was to receive her separate property; and that he snatched the draft received from the accountant general from her hand, and kept it for his own use against her will."

The 12th pleads, "That she had gone out on a visit with the sister and nieces of the baron; that on his return home he became enraged, swore he would play hell with her, and do for her: servants were alarmed and went out and told her; she did not return." It appears to me that, if words of serious menace importing bodily harm be legal cruelty, it does not differ much whether they be addressed to the person herself or to a third person: the test is, if they raise reasonable apprehension; indeed, they carry with them something of additional strength if they raise apprehension in others, for that shews the wife was not alarmed upon any unreasonable grounds.

The 13th pleads, "That this cruelty affected her health, and that she still remains in an unimpaired and weak state of health."

To the 14th the objection taken is, to the want of specification in point of time. It is alleged, "That he kept certain specified houses to which he took divers women, from 1790 to 1793." The want of specification as to time is supplied by the specification as to places. These are pointed out; the scene of guilt is specified; he will have the opportunity of calling servants to shew that he did not habitually carry home these loose women to these places; he will not be unprovided with defence.

The 15th pleads "an adulterous intercourse for the last fourteen years with Susannah Lewen, and the birth of a child thirteen years ago, maintained and brought up by the baron, and lately acknowledged by him."

The 16th, "That Lewen lived at a small house in the City Road, belonging to the baron, till seven or eight years ago; that he then took her to reside in his own house in Broad Street Buildings, where she has ever since resided as housekeeper; that during the years 1790, 1791, 1792 and 1793, Baron D'Aguilar and Susannah Lewen have slept in the same bed; but the same was not made known to his wife till after the commencement of this suit." There is nothing that necessarily affects the wife with the knowledge of the fact; she has pleaded the contrary; and that his acknowledgment of the child was lately made.

The 17th, 18th, and 19th plead further adultery with other women. Libel admitted as reformed.

that there might be other cause for her bruises; but these declarations are supported by the appearance of the body, and by her act in going to the magistrates. The conduct of the husband likewise confirms this representation; for he might have made a defence before the magistrates, and might have given an allegation in this Court, shewing that the bruises were the effect of another cause; but no such explanation has been offered. From the conduct of both I think I am well founded in drawing the inference that this act did happen as she described at the time. This fact, then, was such gross violence as would entitle the wife to that security which this Court can give.

But it is objected that as no application was made to the Ecclesiastical Court, the inference is there was no ground for complaint. The subsequent history proves that she would have consulted her own interest better if she had resorted here; but it has never been held that a woman's not coming raises even a presumption against the truth of such an occurrence; there may be many reasons against such a course; and here the conduct of this lady is accounted for by the voluntary separation being acquiesced in.

A very indistinct account is given of a subsequent cohabitation for a short time; but there is sufficient to satisfy me that they did again shortly separate; and a witness proves that this lady was then in ill health, destitute of clothes, and he believes that the reason of their separation was the husband's ill-treat-[781]-ment. The separation lasted for nearly twenty years; and this has at least one effect, viz. that it approximates the two periods of cohabitation. If they had lived together the Court would have considered the former acts as pretty much obsolete, and that the husband was emendatus moribus; but as there was a separation it is to be considered as if the intermediate years had not elapsed; and the Court has a right to look at former acts as if they had happened recently.

It is material to observe how the return to cohabitation was brought about, as it will weigh whether there was condonation, and what was the effect. In December, 1792, the wife received some letters which agitated her: they signified an intention of the husband to return and live with her. Accordingly he came; and the wife is heard to say "she could not live happily with him twenty-four years ago, and could not expect to do so now." It was not a voluntary return on her part but it was his determination and his act: and the utmost consent shewn on her part, was a passive acquiescence after considerable resistance. It is said that no charge of former ill-conduct was then produced; but I think the extreme submission and resignation of this lady, which she appears by the evidence to have shewn in the whole of their cohabitation, account for her not expressing herself more strongly than "that she could not live happily with him before." If this acquiescence is a condonation, still it is only conditional. She must have had promises that no ill-treatment should take place: indeed all condonations, by operation of law, are expressly [781*] or impliedly conditional; for the effect is taken off by repetition of misconduct. Condonation is not an absolute and unconditional forgiveness.(a)

(a) "Condonation is merely retrospective; if the offence forgiven is afterwards renewed, the party has a right to revert to former facts; if she brings them in conjunction with later. . . .

"The second consideration is whether there is any bar to this suit, as the wife would be entitled to relief if there is none: here it is said there is something of a condonation; that she suffered the visits of Lord Ferrers after a knowledge that he was cohabiting with another woman as his wife; that this was a sort of compromise. It has been truly said that the doctrine of condonation is not exactly defined as to the time of its taking place; I know no case where it has been held that the mere abstinence from bringing a suit would operate as a legal bar to a suit when brought; and many cases might be put where it would be very hard that it should: the wife may be poor; inops consilii: such a rule would be imposing a cruel necessity tending to deprive the party of a legal remedy. Abstracted from the letter there is nothing like condonation. By the evidence it appears that it was a marriage of continued uneasiness to her, that she remonstrated with and applied to him in every way without success: there is nothing like an offer of acquiescence; on the contrary, there is honest indignation expressed as strongly as it could be without coming to the Court to complain. What is the import of the letter? 'That provided Lord Ferrers would

A question has been raised in argument whether acts of adultery revive acts of cruelty? and a case has been cited in which it was decided by Dr. Henchman, who, I always under-[782]-stood, was one of the most judicious practitioners who ever presided here, that acts of cruelty revived acts of adultery before condoned. The case is Worsley v. Worsley. I have had it looked up. It never proceeded to sentence; but the plea was admitted after an opposition. It alleges that the parties were married in 1712; that the husband treated the wife with cruelty; and that he committed adultery in 1720; and in 1728 the parties were living together, for acts of cruelty are then stated. I presume, then, the objection taken was, that after 1720 they were living together, and the only ground on which the Court could admit the act of adultery was that it was revived by the cruelty. The Court, however, overruled the objection. It has then been considered in this Court that circumstances may take off the effect of condonation which would not support an original cause. Facts of cruelty revive adultery, though they would not support an original suit for it. The condonation in this case is such that it is hardly necessary to resort to the authority of Worsley, but it confirms the doctrine that facts would revive which would not be a sufficient ground for an original proceeding.

It is held that words of heat and passion, of incivility, or reproach, are not alone sufficient for an original cause; nor harshness of behaviour: but I cannot but think that their operation would be stronger in condonation. Words, otherwise of heat, receive a different interpretation if upon former occasions they have been accompanied with acts—if it is apparent that the party was in the habit of following up words with blows: and [782*] on these grounds I am of opinion much less is sufficient to destroy condonation than to found an original suit.

The parties returned to live together—not voluntarily on her part—and I cannot consider her acquiescence as amounting to a complete forgiveness: it was almost an extorted consent. There was no return to connubial cohabitation; for though she slept in the house for a few nights, it was in a separate bed, and though it is suggested that the separate bed was not aired, yet the contrary is proved, and the husband has only insinuated this defence in interrogatories.

As to the manner in which the party lived after this return to cohabitation, four witnesses have been produced: and objections have been taken to them which must necessarily attach in all such cases: for, to domestic conduct, friends, dependants, and servants alone can speak. They must have some bias, and the Court must be on its guard against it; and I shall therefore receive this evidence with some drawbacks. Linneard, a servant, says: "The baron took every opportunity to quarrel; he dined at another house, he did all he could to prevent her eating—to vex her; he threw pieces of meat which fell on her clothes, her plate, or the table-cloth; said 'she might eat or be damned;' quarrelled and abused her every day—swore at and terrified her."

I must never forget that the lady was above seventy, and that there may be relative cruelty: and what is tolerable by one may not be by another. "He took the keys of the closets; [783] deposed her from the management of the family, locked up the tea, cakes, &c." These things would be necessary to persons used to such indulgences, and at such a time of life. "The deponent feared he would do her a mischief; she asked leave to go out—he swore and spit at her several times; made her go and undress; she was terrified at him, and her health was much impaired: he prevented her going to pay a visit to his own sister."

It is said the husband has a right to restrain the visits of his wife, and so he has; but his rights may be enforced in an illegal manner. It is not insinuated he had any just ground to restrain her; and it may be true that it is not necessary to shew such: but the Court is to consider whether he exerted his right in a proper manner. In my opinion he has taken off the effect of any such justification by the manner in which he has exercised his marital authority.(a) The witness continues: "He told her to get return to his lawful bed, she (Lady Ferrers) would not reproach him more;' but to interpret it that if he would divide his pleasures she would be satisfied, is a construction I cannot put upon it: that letter could never amount to a condonation; and if it did, it was a conditional offer which, not being accepted, is to be taken as actually withdrawn." Per Lord Stowell in Ferrers v. Ferrers, (MS. note), Consistory, 5th March, 1791.

(a) See the observations in Waring v. Waring; and the note, 2 Hagg. Con. 159.

ready to go to the Court of Chancery and receive her money; she said she did not want it and would not go: he swore at her, held his clenched fist in her face; said he would do for her: she said she would not go without her trustee: he forced her to go with her maid, who was obliged to hold the smelling-bottle to her nose all the way."

It is said he had a right to insist on her going to receive the money; but this was not to be enforced by brutal violence; but in fact he [784] had no right, for it was her own separate property, and she was well justified in that moderate resistance she made. Again, it is said there was no actual violence, but that was unnecessary; because threats succeeded in compelling her.

The witness further says, "The baron's sister and nieces came on the 19th of August and observed her health and spirits were so bad that air would be of use to her: they asked her to go and visit them." Her conduct seems to have been dictated by a care not to offend him: she hesitates, but at last goes. "He was in a passion, swore he would play hell with her, would take care she should not go out again; he would do for her. The witness and other servants were alarmed for her, and her health was affected." Kahlen confirms this: "He insulted her by asking her to eat pork, &c.: deponent was so apprehensive of his doing mischief that she removed knives, &c. out of the way. He insulted her by talking of his amours before her; was in a passion if deponent spoke to her. Though her regular meals were served, he prevented her eating by terrifying her, so that she did not eat at all—she became ill: deponent was seriously afraid she would die." This witness is confirmed by Coto and Simmonds.

I think this lady was in that state of oppression which fully justified the step she took in withdrawing from her husband. That is the point which I have to determine: for, if she was not justified, I must pronounce her under the obligation to return. I think, in so doing, [785] I should place this woman at an advanced period of life, and who appears to have conducted herself well, in a situation which would expose her person to that bodily hazard and intolerable hardship from which the law of our country is bound to protect innocent subjects. I think that she has proved her case of cruelty.

Next, as to the adultery.

It has been suggested that the Jewish religious regulations allow concubines. By the Mosaic law, as at present received, is there any such privilege? If there be any such among the Jews themselves, it would be a great question how it could be attended to in a Christian Court to which they have resorted; and if it could be noticed, it ought to have been specially pleaded; but I think it could not.

A minute inquiry into the adultery is not necessary, as the Court is satisfied on the other branch, cruelty. Four witnesses—Elizabeth Smith, Mary Vincent, Catherine Fakes, and Harriett Smith, if believed—prove the adultery with Susannah Lewen, with whom the libel pleads he had lived and was living in a state of adultery. No objection is made to Mary Vincent, except from her conversation with Elizabeth Smith, which does not expose her to reproach: for she conducted herself very properly. She says, "His bedroom was on the same floor with Lewen's and communicated; went to separate rooms at night, but only one bed used; impression made of two persons: Lewen confessed it, and with sorrow; had told her that the child living in the house was her daughter by the Baron D'Aguilar." She is [786] confirmed by the evidence of the other three witnesses, and also by Coto, as to the acknowledgment of the child by the baron.

Fakes says, "When she knocked at the door of the room, sometimes one, sometimes the other, came in their shirt or shift: there were two impressions in the bed—witness heard them talk together. The other bed, in which the child slept, was the child's bed, and there was no other bed in the house."

The adultery is almost admitted in the interrogatories by insinuating the defence that the wife was cognizant and had forgiven. There is no evidence which satisfies the Court that she was apprized of it in any other manner than upon general or probable suspicion: it is not shewn she knew it so that she could legally prove it. If it was shewn that he had avowed it to her, it might be a condonation as to that particular fact; here, on the contrary, is evidence inducing a belief there had been no such avowal. His laughing in a sneering way when the child called him "Papa" in her presence proves that it was not openly known. Why should he have so done had he mentioned the subject to his wife?

But if she overlooked one act of human infirmity, it is not a legal consequence that she has pardoned all other acts; that she tolerates all other debauchery: her forgiveness is confined to that one act. Condonation, with respect to women, is not held to bear so strictly; a woman has not the same control over her husband, has not the same guard over his honor, has not the same means to enforce the observance of the matrimonial vow; his guilt is not of the same [787] consequence to her: therefore the rule of condonation is held more laxly against the wife. But it does not follow that, because she overlooked one offence, which she could not prevent, that is to be construed to give an universal licence to unlimited debauchery.

That the baron did indulge himself in other amours is demonstrably proved, partly by Vincent, to whom there is no just exception. She says, "She was with the baron when Fellows came and implored him to do something for her, for he knew he was the father of the child she was pregnant with; he said she was a bad woman when he was connected with her; the child might be another's." This is as near a direct confession of guilt as can be. "At last he ordered the deponent to take a lodging for her; she was supported by him. Fellows told deponent he had seduced her by intoxicating her." She speaks also to another fact, as to Lucy Dean. There are facts laid with others, but these are only proved from the probability as to the use he made of the houses, and therefore I do not lay much stress on them. I am satisfied that adultery with three different persons is proved; and the wife is no doubt entitled to the sentence of separation. It remains, therefore, to consider the question of costs.

In general, the husband is bound to defray the wife's costs; otherwise the wife would be disarmed and denied justice.(a) The husband has by the law of this country all the pro-[788]-perty; and therefore the wife must have the means of self-defence, and of subsistence from him; but when she has a separate fortune, the Court always considers whether such separate means are sufficient for self-defence and subsistence. If it deems them sufficient, she is not entitled to alimony and costs during suit. These considerations press here. The wife stands without that particular claim on the husband, but upon the common footing of a litigant party, who has, on proving his case, primâ facie, a right to the expences to which he has been put by the injustice of the other party. Costs, however, are a matter of discretion in which many things are to be taken into consideration; and the Court may, under circumstances, relax the rule. I have looked into this case for circumstances which would exonerate the husband, but without success. On the contrary, I find considerable aggravation. This lady of advanced age, of infirm health, void of reproach, who behaved apparently remarkably well to her husband, is, without provocation, treated with insult, with ill language, with menaces, and with violence occasioning fear for her life; the husband, at an advanced age, with passions under no degree of control or discipline, committing adultery and indulging himself in unlimited debauchery! There is no favourable ground, then, on which to release him from costs; and, on the whole, I consider I am bound to pronounce that the lady is not only entitled to a separation, but to her costs.

[789] BEEBY v. BEEBY. Consistory, Michaelmas Term, 17th Dec., 1799.—In a suit for separation à mensâ et thoro by reason of the wife's adultery, she, having in a plea of recrimination, or compensatio criminum, proved a long series of misconduct—(adultery, solicitation of the servants' chastity, and venereal disease communicated to her)—for which she separated from him long prior to the adultery committed by her, is intitled to her dismissal; nor will a return to live in the same house, after a former separation on account of the husband's adultery, operate as a condonation so as to extinguish her right to set up his guilt as a bar to his prayer.—Condonation is forgiveness legally releasing the injury and may be express or implied, as by the husband cohabiting with a delinquent wife; but the effect of cohabitation is less stringent on the wife, and condonation by implication is not held a strict bar against her, for it is not improper she should for a time shew a patient forbearance and entertain hopes of her husband's reform.—Unpleaded condonation can only avail as a bar so far as it is fully established by evidence.—The general presumption is that a husband and wife, living in the same house, live on terms of matrimonial cohabitation; but particular circumstances may repel that presumption.—It does not follow that because condonation will bar the remedy of a party agent, it will destroy the defence of a party recriminating.

Judgment—Sir William Scott (Lord Stowell). This is a suit of adultery brought by the husband. The marriage took place in 1790, the woman being a minor; and the parties lived together for six years. It is pleaded that the wife quitted his society in or about June, 1796; but of that fact no proof is afforded on the part of the husband, except by one witness, who says "that they separated about June, 1796." The articles of separation, though called for by the Court, are not produced, but they were executed on the 27th of June, 1796. It seems probable that the separation took place some little time before; it is unlikely that parties in such a state of feeling towards each other should cohabit: on this general presumption then I should be disposed to antedate the fact of separation.

To the character of the lady there are strong testimonials, both as the best of mothers and of wives: her husband himself bears the strongest testimony by committing to her the charge of three female children. From this height of character she has fallen, for it cannot be denied that adultery is proved. The husband pleads that Mr. Rochfort, an acquaintance of his [790] abroad, formed a deep scheme for the ruin of his wife; but of this there is no proof, except that he visited her three times, on the last of which they mounted their horses together and went away. They were found cohabiting together as husband and wife, and identity is completely proved.

But a plea in bar has been given—a plea of recrimination or compensatio criminum —a set-off of equal guilt on the part of the husband. The doctrine, that this if proved is a valid plea in bar, has its foundation in reason and propriety: it would be hard if a man could complain of the breach of a contract which he has violated; if he could complain of an injury when he is open to a charge of the same nature. It is not unfit if he, who is the guardian of the purity of his own house, has converted it into a brothel, that he should not be allowed to complain of the pollution which he himself has introduced; if he, who has first violated his marriage vow, should be barred of his remedy: the parties may live together, and find sources of mutual forgiveness in the humiliation of mutual guilt. On these and similar grounds the doctrine of the civil law has been transplanted into the canon law, and with that received in the ecclesiastical courts of this kingdom, where it has taken deep root.(a) The husband's is no ordinary case of guilt; there are no circumstances of extenuation; it is not the case of a man led away by the sudden impulse of passion, seduced by an unlucky attachment, or driven by the ill [791] temper of his wife to seek the solace of softer society—not a case where the charms of the wife were decaying—not where the illicit pursuits were followed in secret and at a distance; but there is deliberate depravity from the time of his marriage, and habits of low debauchery from the first year of cohabitation to the last—among his own servants, in whose good conduct most persons seek a great part of their happiness—under the notice of his wife—a young wife exemplarily performing all the duties of a wife and a mother.

Many witnesses prove to my mind the husband's misconduct from the time of his marriage. Sarah Prickett lived three months in the family in 1791; she proves that by his attempts she was forced to quit the family, that she gave warning, but that Mrs. Beeby would hardly believe her story; and the nurse says that her mistress was so much affected by hearing of his infidelity that she would not allow her to suckle the infant for two days. The witnesses speak not only to their own adventures, but to the universal complaint of all the female servants—from fifteen years of age to upwards of thirty: he shewed no partiality. Jane Knapp, the cook, speaks to solicitation of herself and of Susan Chandler. As to Cherry Funnel, the cook, the transactions are spoken to by the footman. It is not necessary to go minutely into the matter, but it is impossible to contend, connecting it with the general habits of this man's life, that it does not afford satisfactory proof of actual adultery. Sarah Hildin speaks to attempts on herself and others, and particularly that a child of fourteen years [792] of age was sent out of the house lest she should fall a victim to the persecutions of this husband.

(a) See Forster v. Forster, 1 Hagg. Con. 146 et seq.; Proctor v. Proctor, 2 Hagg. Con. 297-8.

In 1794 the husband communicated the venereal disease to his wife: there is no doubt upon the evidence that such was the case, and that the infection was recent. The husband would have made that excuse if it had been an old complaint breaking out anew. The surgeon gives his opinion that it was recent, but that Mrs. Beeby would incur no future danger by cohabiting as the husband expressed such deep contrition; he, however, is a bad reasoner, for her husband's contrition was short-lived. Sarah Clark speaks to subsequent solicitation, that he was continually taking liberties with her person; and Sandall gives an account of assignations at the same period with Shaw: and looking at other parts of the history, there can be no doubt for what purpose these were made. The declarations of the wife, spoken to by the surgeon, that the husband had again infected her, are no proof of the fact, but they shew her impression: her conduct all this time was perfectly correct—spotless on her own part—patient under all these provocations—endeavouring to remove the objects of his misconduct.

This is the substance of the evidence, and I forbear to make observations on it. What ideas this gentleman has of religion, of the laws, and of the decency of manners of the country which he inhabits I know not; but if such conduct were general, the kingdom would be one universal brothel, and those would introduce corruption who ought most to repress it. The [793] result of all this is, that if it had not been the misfortune of Mrs. Beeby to become the wife of such a husband, she would have filled her station most honorably. She is insulted for years; her health is at last affected; she retires indignant—she is deprived of the lawful pleasures of the marriage bed, to which she was entitled; and at last falls a prey to the schemes of a friend of her husband's worthy of his friendship by similarity of manners: he completes the ruin to which it can hardly be said the husband was not originally and mainly instrumental. These are circumstances of extenuation in the fall of the wife; and if the case rested here I should clearly dismiss her from this suit.

But condonation has been set up in order to take off the effect of the compensatio criminis. I will first consider the proof and then the effect of condonation. Now condonation is forgiveness legally releasing the injury: it may be express or implied, as by the husband cohabiting with a delinquent wife, for it is to be presumed he would not take her to his bed again unless he had forgiven her; but the effect of cohabitation is justly held less stringent on the wife; she is more sub potestate, more inops consilii; she may entertain more hopes of the recovery and reform of her husband; her honour is less injured and is more easily healed. It would be hard if condonation by implication was held a strict bar against the wife. It is not improper she should for a time shew a patient forbearance; she may find a difficulty either in quitting his house or withdrawing from his bed. The hus-[794]-band, on the other hand, cannot be compelled to the bed of his wife; a woman may submit to necessity. It is too hard to term submission mere hypocrisy. It may be a weakness pardonable in may circumstances.(a) Here no [795] condonation is pleaded: it is only taken up

(a) So, again, on the admission of the allegation; "Condonation is objected. But the Court is not to hold that strictly as to the wife; it is a merit in her to bear, to be patient, and to endeavour to reclaim; nor is it her duty, till compelled by the last necessity, to have recourse to legal remedy."

The same sort of language was again held by Sir William Scott (Lord Stowell) in Dance v. Dance, Consistory, 22nd April, 1799.

Per Curiam. "This is a suit brought by Catharine Dance against her husband, on account of adultery of an aggravated kind, incestuous with the wife's sister. The parties were married on the 1st July, 1791; they were fruiterers in Oxford Street, but it does not appear on what terms they lived together prior to 1796, when the history commences: the parties then had separate beds, which does not seem imputable to the wife, but to have been the determination of the husband: though on what ground there is no evidence. They never, as far as appears, bedded together afterwards, and, therefore, what has been said of condonation is quite out of the question: there must be something of a matrimonial intercourse presumed, in order to found it; it does not rest merely on the wife's not withdrawing herself. But the Court does not hold condonation so strictly against the wife, from whom it looks for a long in argument from a passage in the evidence; if clearly proved, though not pleaded, I will not say it may not be sufficient, but the Court will never help it out, as it would operate as a surprize on the other party. If pleaded, equivocal facts might be explained: it therefore shall avail so far only as it is fully established by evidence. What are the facts here? The wife, when informed of her husband's misconduct at first, hardly believes it; then is surprised and concerned when satisfied of it by many unhappy proofs; and endeavours to reform him: when she is infected she declares she will quit him; she flies to her mother, is not received, and is obliged to return. The husband expresses contrition, but continues the same misconduct. She makes declarations of being again infected; the husband does not amend; he again solicits the chastity of his servants; he is proved to have done so as late as April, and she quits his house, certainly as early as June, but I think sooner.

I am told, "I must presume that she forgave [796] him; that she voluntarily returned; that she continued to admit him to her bed, as they were not in separate houses; that the separation took place on the ground of another misunderstanding—temper; that they separated in perfect friendship; that they mutually engaged when they parted to live chastely, and that she was bound to presume that the husband had never violated that engagement, and to act accordingly." If I am bound to act upon presumption, I should presume in almost every instance the reverse—that such conduct, especially the communication of disease, must have raised the anger of the wife; the communication of a painful and nauseous disease in the midst of conjugal endearment! Surely if there is an injury almost beyond forgiveness, it is what had taken place here, and this was treatment under which beyond all others the door of a parent ought to have been open to her child. Her mother however refused to receive her, and her return consequently was the result of necessity: but if it had been voluntary, still there may be circumstances in which, even under such injuries, it may be right for a wife to return; there may be hopes of the husband's reformation. How the husband was reformed is apparent from the evidence; some of the witnesses say that after her return they lived on good terms; others—not. The general presumption is, that a husband and wife living together in the same house do live on terms of matrimonial cohabitation, but particular circumstances may repel that presumption; and, taking together all the evidence before and after that [797] return, I lean the other way. I think that here it is more probable they did not; and the deed of separation recites that unhappy disputes had occurred. Again, the presumption is that the husband's conduct continued the same as before; for that this man should devote himself to chastity is as probable as that the Ethiopian should change his skin. These are the presumptions to which the evidence would draw my mind.

It is, however, sufficient that that evidence is only equivocal. Condonation, if set forward in this manner, must be fully proved; but here it is left equivocal. But what is the effect of condonation? In general it is a good plea in bar; it is not fit that a man should sue for a debt which he has released; but here the plea in bar is compensatio: and condonation is not in bar of the action, but a counter-plea. Here the wife does not pray relief, but prays to be dismissed. It does not follow that the suffering and patience not expected nor tolerated in the husband: he is expected to complain to the Court immediately. The wife is more inops consilii; she may hope to reclaim her husband. Now, the sister of the wife lived in the house, and gross and odious familiarity is proved: she laced her stays before him without a handkerchief on: she undressed to her shift, when going to bed, in the presence of this man; his wife, his sister, and others were also present: and as it is not stated what was said by them, it has been argued that they were not offended. It however appears that the brother did remonstrate, and it is not to be presumed that this conduct was not disapproved of by the others, for there was nothing to lead the witnesses to mention their expostulations, if any such were made."

Note.—Three maid servants, examined about the same period, proved acts of indecent familiarity, of gross indelicacy; and that she was seen coming out of his bed-room on the morning of the 25th of May, 1797, in her shift, without shoes, and no clothes on, and desired the witness not to tell the wife, her sister: the witness however did inform her at or about that time, and in consequence she withdrew from his house on the 29th of December.

The Court pronounced for the separation.

same act which will bar the remedy will operate on the other side. And unless it is an universal rule that whatever is a plea in bar, and disables a party from bringing the suit, likewise destroys the defence, the present attempt cannot avail the husband. A man, it is true, who has forgiven adultery, cannot bring a suit; but when he complains of his wife, will her forgiveness of his previous misconduct make him a proper person to receive the sentence of the Court? Does her act bind the Court? If both are equally guilty, will her condonation make him rectus in curiâ and enable him to procure a sentence?

There may be cases where a wife may by [798] forgiveness, by cohabitation, by the reformation of the husband, be so barred that an obsolete fact shall not be a defence. This bar would not, however, be effected so much by condonation as by the general state between them, and the consequent impossibility of reviving former follies. It is impossible to assimilate this to the cases I have put, unless I can compel my mind to a belief that Mr. Beeby has complied with the vow of chastity supposed to exist in the articles of separation: that, however, I cannot do in the present instance.

It is said that condonation is favoured because it induces the parties to live together again; but here the effect would be to separate them, to shut the door more completely against a return: here, if the Court does not pronounce a sentence of separation, is no impossibility of a return. Both have much to be forgiven: the wife for the injury done to the children, whom she has deserted, to her husband whom she has dishonoured, to her own character, which she has disgraced, and to society, which she has outraged. The husband has still more to be forgiven, even as the means of his wife's misconduct. It has been much pressed that the children will be injured by a dismissal of the parties; but this is a bad plea for the father who has occasioned the mischief: and the answer is prompt and legal; he must not press on the Court considerations for those whom he has not himself considered. The consequences are to be warded off by other means. It frequently, however, happens that these consequences fall by law, as by Nature, on the [799] innocent connexions of guilty persons; but the effect is to bind duty more strongly on all. I think if a divorce is granted under these circumstances it will be granted in such as never before founded a sentence; and I shall be content to receive such a precedent from the superior tribunal: but my opinion is that Mr. Beeby is not entitled to the sentence he prays; and I therefore dismiss the wife.

APPENDIX.

[1] APPENDIX A. (Vide p. 3.)

Rules to be observed by the Proctors of the Arches Court of Canterbury, and signed by the Judge, Advocates, and Proctors of the said Court. Ter. Mich. 1684.

CONCERNING CITATIONS.

Upon return of a citation, if the person cited being personally served, or by viis et modis duly executed, doth not appear either by himself, or proctor, the first day, then to be excommunicated without any reservation; that if a party be cited and appear (though the process be not returned), he shall be dismissed with costs—viz. six shillings and eight-pence, præter three shillings and four-pence, pro monitione, in case the party agent will not proceed.

CONCERNING LIBELS.

Every proctor shall be provided with his libel upon the day of the return of the process, and if he hath no libel ready, the party cited to be dismissed with six shillings and eight-pence charge, præter three shillings and four-pence pro monitione.

CONCERNING PROCTORS' ANSWERS.

That the proctor of the party cited shall be obliged to answer affirmative, or negative, the same time that the libel is admitted.

That when the proctor, to prevent the cause being assigned ad concludendum, shall say he gives in an allegation, he shall really give it in, and he shall swear that he believes he can prove it, if required by the adverse proctor, and that he gives it in non animo differendi litem.

O. J. Pullen v. Clewer.

[See Combe v. De la Bere, 1881, 6 P. D. 157.]

The following, extracted from the process deposited in the registry of the Court of Delegates, is a summary of the proceedings in a cause of office, instituted originally in the Court of Peculiars, by Pullen, a parishioner of Croydon, against Dr. Clewer, the vicar thereof; wherein the Judge pronounced a sentence of deprivation; and that sentence was affirmed in the High Court of Delegates.

1682. June 30. Before Sir Richard Lloyd, surrogate of Sir Robert Wyseman, Dean of the Arches—sitting at St. Vedast, Foster-Lane.

Clewer, D.D., in person, and Pullen, consented to day, place, and Judge.

Clewer alleged his suspension for not attending the visitation of the archbishop in Croydon church, and prayed it to be relaxed.

Pullen dissenting and alleging that Clewer had committed very many crimes, and had neglected his cure; and that he, Pullen, was ready to promote the office—upon which the Judge assigned him promoter; and the articles were immediately exhibited.

These articles were in the name of Sir Robert Wyseman, as Dean, or Commissary, of the Arches, against William Clewer, S. T. P., vicar of Croydon, county of Surrey, and deanery and jurisdiction of Croydon—"for his soul's health, and for the reformation of his manners and excesses, and especially for the neglect of his cure of souls, and of the execution of his clerical office in not preaching, nor reading the common prayers (as set forth in the book called the Common Prayer Book) on Sundays and holidays; in not baptizing infants; and not reading prayers for the burial of the dead; and for omitting the due celebration of the sacrament."

The presentments of the churchwardens of Croydon were annexed to the articles, which also objected that the vicar was of a quarrelsome temper; and, in the nineteenth article, "that, after the decree of suspension had been read in Wimbledon parish-church, and, on the same day (Sunday) had been, before the time of divine service in the afternoon, made known to Clewer, he did not desist from officiating."

[3] The twenty-sixth article prayed that Clewer might be punished for his excesses, and condemned in costs.

Upon these articles being exhibited, Clewer again prayed his suspension to be relaxed; and alleged that an attachment had issued against him from the Exchequer, on which account he had not dared to attend at the visitation; and he then produced a witness who swore to the attachment being out.

At petition of Pullen the articles were then admitted; and Clewer was assigned to answer "quatenus de Jure astringitur, et non aliter."

On 6th July Sir Richard Lloyd decreed the suspension to be relaxed, and letters testimonial to be made out, and admonished Clewer to be attentive to his cure in future.

Clewer then gave a negative issue to the articles, and witnesses were examined in support of them.

On the 12th of December (1682) an order—dated 4th December—was exhibited from the Barons of the Exchequer, empowering the Judge to proceed in the Peculiars, notwithstanding the order to stay the cause (dated 28th November, 34 Car. 2), obtained by surprise, on the part of Clewer: it was, however, a part of the order of the 4th of December that Pullen should shew cause on the first day of the following term why prohibition should not go to the Ecclesiastical Court—there being an information against Clewer, then pending in the Exchequer, for the said offence.

On the production of this order, Pullen alleged that Clewer was vicar of Croydon, &c.; and, after enumerating all his clerical defects "in grave scandalum Christianæ religionis, et periculum animarum parochianorum," prayed—and the Judge (having heard advocates) decreed—suspension pendente lite; and that a proper minister, to be approved by the ordinary, should be appointed, and the profits of the vicarage sequestered.

On the 20th of December the proctor of Clewer alleged an appeal from this order—as made during the term probatory. This appeal seems to have been abandoned, as, on the next Court-day, 20th of January, the cause proceeded, and the proctor for Pullen exhibited an order "pro exoneratione regulæ pro prohibitione."

An allegation had been admitted, on the part of Clewer, in the preceding Michaelmas Term: and he had been assigned to give in his further allegation, if any; when on the 15th of February he prayed further time.

[4] Pullen (in person) objected, and porrected a definitive sentence, which the Judge then signed.

The sentence was to this effect:—

"Pronunciamus Gulielmum Clewer à Vicariâ, et ecclesiâ parochiali de Croydon, cum suis Juribus membris et pertinentiis universis privandum penitus et amovendum fore ac privari et amoveri debere. Eandemque vicariam et Ecclesiam parochialem de Croydon, vacuam de personâ Gulielmi Clewer, esse et sic esse debere ad omnem Juris effectum pronunciamus, decernimus et declaramus, sicque privamus, amovemus et pronunciamus per præsentes"—and condemn him in costs.

Guil. Trumbull. RICH. LLOYD, Surr.

From this sentence Dr. Clewer appealed, and the following notice of the case in the High Court of Delegates is extracted, with the marginal observations, from a folio common-place book (in the library of the College of Advocates at Doctors' Commons), in the hand-writing of Sir Richard Raines,(a)[1] and Sir Charles Hedges,(b)[1] [p. 867].

Dr. Clewer, vicar of Croydon, in the year 1666 was presented for neglect of duty, and dismissed with a monition; and anno 1681 he was presented for not reading prayers, not burying, nor christening, and then again monished sub pœnâ suspensionis; he not appearing at the visitation next following, was suspended; after which he appeared and the suspension was taken off, and he was again monished: but he, taking no more care than formerly, was articled against in June, 1682, from whence he appealed to the Delegates, but the sentence was confirmed against him by the Judges at Serjeants' Inn.(c)[1]

The Bishop of London, the Bishop of Peterborough, Lord Chief Justice Jefferies, Mr. Justice Withens, Mr. Justice Holloway, Sir Thomas Exton,(d)[1] Dr. Falconbridge, Dr. Pinfold, Dr. Hedges—for deprivation.

The Bishop of Ely, Mr. Justice Charlton, Mr. Justice Windham—dissenting.

[5] The truth of the fact was, that several persons died unbaptized; several wanted Christian burial: non-residence, not reading prayers; and to these neglects were added obstinacy, and no amendment, notwithstanding the several monitions.

For the doctor it was urged that his absence was for the benefit of the church, that for omissions and negligences the punishment was but suspension. Canons 68, 69. Jacob (1603).

RICH v. GERARD AND LODER. (Vide p. 47, supra.)

This was an appeal in a cause of office promoted by William Loder and Henry Gerard, churchwardens of the parish of Stalbridge, in the county of Dorset, against Samuel Rich, D.D., rector of Stalbridge aforesaid, "for neglect of his clerical duties, and for the crime of adultery, fornication, or incontinency with one Elizabeth Snook, wife of Thomas Snook, of the same place."

The suit was, originally, brought before the Reverend Richard Rodderick (sitting in the parish church of Blandford, loco Consistorii), surrogate to Henry Jones, LL.D., Official Principal and Vicar-General of the Episcopal Consistorial Court of Bristol.

The articles, eleven in number, pleaded the neglect of Dr. Rich to pray with the sick when sent for to visit the same; to read the Divine Service according to the rubric, and further objecting that he frequently read the same hastily and irreverently, and out of the canonical hours; and that he absented himself from his cure of souls—did not procure any person to reside or officiate for him; and that, particularly within the months of October, November, December, and January last (viz. 1688), he had neglected to repair the barn belonging to the rectory of Stalbridge, whereby the same had become dilapidated.

The sixth article objected that, contrary to the laws, canons, and constitutions of the realm, he was a sower or fomenter of discord and strife among the neighbours in the parish of Stalbridge and parishes adjacent, and promoted several vexatious suits against them, particularly for tithe before it was due.

[8] The seventh, that whoever commits adultery, fornication, or incontinency ought to be canonically punished.

The eighth, that notwithstanding the premises he did [in certain months specified] all, some or one of them frequent the company of Elizabeth Snook, wife of Thomas Snook, and particularly at his house, during his absence, use unchaste behaviour, dalliance, and embraces with the said Elizabeth Snook in very suspicious and indecent ways, and commit the crime of adultery: and more particularly in the month of November, 1688, in the chamber of the said Elizabeth Snook; and that so much hath been confessed by the said Samuel Rich and Elizabeth Snook.

The articles concluded with a prayer that Dr. Rich should be deprived, and be condemned in costs.

The cause having come up to the Court of Arches on an appeal from an interlocutory order of the Court below; the appeal was pronounced against, the cause retained, and a definitive sentence ultimately pronounced; it was to the following effect:—

"Tenor Sententiæ in principali ex parte Gerard lata:

"Idcirco nos Georgius Oxenden Legum Doctor, &c. pronunciavimus maturèque deliberavimus præfatum Samuelem Rich, annis et mensibus in hâc causâ articulatis fuisse virum conjugatum, viz. maritum cujusdam Annæ Wilks, alias Rich, et Clericum sacris ordinibus Diaconatus et presbyteratus insignitum et Rectorem de Stalbridge; et Elizabetham Snook, in processu hujus causæ nominatam, annis, &c. &c. fuisse fœminam conjugatam, viz. uxorem cujusdam Thomæ Snook, &c.; et quia etiam invenimus præfatum Samuelem Rich, annis, &c. carnalem copulationem cum dictâ Elizabethâ Snook, &c. &c., habuisse, et crimen adulterii cum dictâ, &c., commisisse et adulterum esse et de crimine adulterii reum fuissi et esse—'præfatum igitur Samuelem Rich, propter præmissa, à Rectoriâ Ecclesiæ parochialis de Stalbridge prædictæ, et ab omni beneficio ejusdem Rectoriæ de Jure amoveri et privari debere pronunciamus, &c. &c., sicque eundem Samuelem Rich à dictâ Rectoriâ et ecclesiâ parochiali de Stalbridge prædictæ et ab omni beneficio ejusdem rectoriæ amovemus et deprivamus per præsentes, dictumque Samuelem Rich etiam secundum canones puniendum et corrigendum esse decernimus et declaramus præfatum Samuelem Rich in expensis legitimis ex parte et per partem dictorum Gulielmi Loder et Henrici Gerard tam in primâ quam in hâc [9] instantiâ, hujus causæ factis et faciendis eisdemque seu parti suæ solvendis condemnandum de Jure debere pronunciamus, &c.'"

On an appeal to the High Court of Delegates this sentence was affirmed, with costs; and the cause was remitted to the Court of Arches.

The last notice of the case in the Delegates' Assignation Book is the attendance of Dr. Bramston, at Newgate, to absolve Rich from his contempt; but a formal definitive sentence, dated in June, 1690, was found in the Delegates' Registry, signed by—

REPORTS of CASES ARGUED and DETERMINED in the ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS at DOCTORS' COMMONS and in the HIGH COURT of DELEGATES. By JOHN HAGGARD, LL.D., Vol. II. Containing Cases from Michaelmas Term, 1828, to Trinity Term, 1829, inclusive; and some Cases of an earlier Date in the Supplement and Appendix. London, 1830.

[1] REPORTS OF CASES ARGUED AND DETERMINED IN THE ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS AT DOCTORS' COMMONS; AND IN THE HIGH COURT OF DELEGATES.

COURTAIL v. HOMFRAY. Arches Court, Michaelmas Term, 2nd Session, 1828.—In a defamation suit, the defendant having been enjoined penance, and condemned in costs; and, to an appeal from his dismissal without such penance being duly performed, having given an affirmative issue, the Court directed the penance to be performed, as originally decreed, and condemned the defendant in the further costs.—Though an affirmative issue to a libel of appeal from a definitive sentence be given, the process must be transmitted, where the Court of Appeal has to take any step requiring a knowledge of the proceedings, or of the sentence of the Court below.

An appeal from Llandaff.

This was originally a cause of defamation brought by Harriett, wife of Charles Courtail of the parish of Llandaff, against Jeston Homfray of Cardiff.

An affirmative issue having been given to the libel, the Judge of the Consistory Court at Llandaff enjoined the defendant to perform the usual [2] penance; (a) and condemned him in costs; and further ordered that he should on Thursday, 6th of March, 1828, certify, under the hands of the minister and churchwardens, the due performance of the penance.

On the 6th of March Homfray presented the schedule of penance (but without the certificate) and alleged that he had duly performed the penance, and had given the necessary notices, but that no one of the parties attended.

The reception of this schedule was opposed on the ground that the penance had not been duly performed; and upon the affidavits of Mr. Courtail, and of several individuals, in support of this averment, a decree issued against the defendant for him to shew cause why the penance should not be performed conformably to the order of Court and to the tenor of the schedule. To this decree Homfray appeared, and the Judge, having heard an affidavit verifying the schedule of the defendant, dismissed him upon his paying all the costs of suit. From this dismissal Mrs. Courtail appealed: an affirmative issue was given to the libel; the process from [3] the Court below was brought in, and the cause now stood for sentence.

(a) The tenor of the schedule of penance was thus: "That Jeston Homfray shall, after giving twenty-four hours' notice at least hereof to Harriett, wife of Charles Courtail, repair in the day time to the vestry-room of the parish church of the united parishes of Saint John and Saint Mary, Cardiff, and there in the presence of the officiating minister and one of the churchwardens (and who are to have the like notice) and such other persons as the party complainant shall bring with her, audibly and distinctly make the following confession:" viz. to the effect "that he had defamed Mrs. Courtail; that he asked her forgiveness; and that he would not again offend in the like manner."

Lushington for the appellant.

The King's advocate contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This case comes up by appeal from the Consistory Court of Llandaff, where it was originally a cause of defamation brought by Harriett Courtail against Jeston Homfray; and the præsertim of the appeal is "and more especially from the said Judge having, on the 27th of March, dismissed Jeston Homfray from all further judicial observance in the said cause." The alleged grievance then is that the party was improperly dismissed, and as an affirmative issue has been given to the libel of appeal, it is confessed and admitted that the party was improperly dismissed. On a former day it was objected that as the appeal was from a definitive sentence, and as Homfray had given an affirmative issue to the libel, there was no need of proof, and that the process therefore ought not to be transmitted, as such transmission would occasion the defendant unnecessary expence. The Court, however, thought it essential to justice that the process should be laid before it; for how could the Court know what to do unless the process informed it what was the nature of the proceedings, and what had been decreed in the first instance? I have looked through the process, and it is perfectly clear that the penance has [4] not been duly performed; and the party is now bound to do it, and to certify his obedience to the order of the Court within a reasonable time.

I pronounce therefore for the appeal, retain the cause, direct the penance to be performed in the manner decreed by the original sentence of the Court at Llandaff, and that the due performance thereof be certified by the fourth session of this term; and I also condemn the respondent in the further costs occasioned by this appeal. The decree as to costs must be taken down in that form, because in consequence of the affirmative issue, nothing remains for this Court but to affirm the sentence of the Court below in every thing but what respects the dismissal: and the respondent has been already condemned by that sentence in the costs of that Court.

The retractation of the defamatory words must be fairly made, and in the form directed; that is, in the vestry after twenty-four hours' notice to the party, to the minister, and to one of the churchwardens; and in the presence of the minister and one of the churchwardens. This cannot therefore be during divine service. I must here remark that the original notice given to the appellant of the time of performing penance is couched, and was served in rather a strange and insulting manner. It concludes, "Yours affectionately," and was delivered to the party in the public street of the county town by the town crier. If an injury to an individual has been done, or if the law has been violated, the most honourable and creditable mode is to [5] make the amends which the law requires. Such amends are due to society, whatever may be the private feelings and opinions of the party towards his adversary.

BROWN v. BROWN. Arches Court, Michaelmas Term, 3rd Session, 1828.—An assignment, apparently fraudulent and colorable, by the husband of all his property after the commencement of a suit by the wife for divorce, cannot affect her title to alimony pendente lite. The Court allotted alimony pendente lite at the rate of £50 per annum out of an income of £140, and refused to allow the monition not to issue till after fifteen days.

This was a cause of divorce brought by the wife against the husband; and the present application respected alimony pendente lite.(a)

The King's advocate and Lushington for Mrs. Brown.

Phillimore and Addams contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The affidavits upon which the husband's counsel have commented were made a year and a half ago, and for the purpose of allotting money on account of alimony: I infer that from the date of them, just prior to the long vacation in 1827, when a sum of 50l. was decreed to the wife. The Court cannot now advert to them. If, as it has been asserted, the wife is entitled to a separate income of forty guineas, payable by a Mr. Rowlett, the husband should have stated that circumstance in his answers or put it into plea; but the assertion is directly in op-[6]-position to Rowlett's affidavit: "That he does not consider there is the slightest obligation upon him to continue the allowance." The question then must be decided on the answers.

The suit is brought by the wife against her husband for cruelty and adultery, and she was put to a considerable difficulty at the outset, for the husband having denied the validity of the marriage, she was compelled to prove it. This necessarily entailed on her much expence, and only 50l. has been allotted on account of alimony. The Court saw in the aspect of the suit sufficient to wish that it might terminate in some arrangement out of Court, but that recommendation failed, and the wife is now proceeding in her original suit. There being then a valid marriage and no proof of a separate income, the wife is entitled to a maintenance pending the cause, and that maintenance must be allotted according to the husband's faculties. He does not deny that at the commencement of the suit, and I should think up to a pretty late period, he was possessed of certain property and income now conveyed in trust for the children of a former marriage. Some of them are grown up; for the son has been examined as a witness, and a daughter is the wife of the trustee to whom the property is assigned. Brown has thought fit to abandon farming, and has conveyed away not only the land but his stock, crops, and even household furniture; and this too since the suit began; the intended effect of this assignment then is to deprive his wife of her maintenance. I do not mean to suggest that this assignment was made with the knowledge, much less by the advice, of the prac-[7]-titioners here; but I must consider it fraudulent and colourable. If such a contrivance could avail, no injured wife could ever hope for justice. I shall consider the case therefore as if no such circumstance had appeared.

What is his income? A person who would resort to such contrivances will not have the credit of over estimating his property; he would rather be suspected of undervaluing it. He admits that at the commencement of this suit he had a copyhold farm of eighty acres of the value of 420l.; but that it is incumbered with a mortgage of 120l.; he admits, however, that this property is tithe free; and that the husbandry implements, the stock and crops communibus annis were worth 500l., and that his furniture was worth 50l.; but he asserts that now there is nothing remaining to him except his mere wearing apparel. If the effect of the assignment has been to leave him so destitute, I am surprised that he has not applied to sue in forma pauperis. However, the income out of his farm was at least 200l., but it was reduced to 140l. by the payment of the interest of the mortgage. Mrs. Brown is entitled to be alimented as if living with him as his wife, and the wife of such a person could not maintain herself decently for less than 50l. per annum. I shall, on these grounds, and more especially seeing the means to which he has resorted for reducing his faculties, allow her that sum; and he must betake himself to some occupation in order to enable him to provide the necessary funds for this allowance. I must repeat strongly my earnest recommendation that this case should be settled out of Court.

I allot 50l. a year as alimony, pending suit, to [8] commence from the return of the citation, the money already paid on account being first deducted.

The proctor of the husband prayed that the monition should not go out till after fifteen days.

The Court said that the suit had already been depending two years; that the wife had had only 80l., and that consequently there was still a balance due to her. The delay in the issue of the monition was quite unusual, and it saw no reason for departing from the ordinary practice.

HAMERTON v. HAMERTON. Arches Court, Michaelmas Term, 3rd Session, 1828.—When no indecent familiarity, proximate act, or personal freedom (except two kisses) and no circumstances inferring adultery, are proved; letters from the alleged paramour found in the wife's possession, but not necessarily implying the commission of adultery, will not support a sentence of separation by reason of her adultery: but if the evidence raises a suspicion that an adulterous intercourse is carrying on between the parties accused, the Court may upon affidavits rescind the conclusion, and allow the husband to give in an allegation.—The Court cannot separate on improper conduct short of actual adultery. The law does not require direct evidence of the very act committed at a specific time and place; but the Court must be satisfied that actual adultery has been committed.

[Affirmed, p. 618, post.]

This case, in some of its earlier stages, is reported in vol. i. p. 23. It was now, at the hearing, argued by Lushington and Dodson for Major Hamerton; and by the King's advocate and Addams contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a suit for separation à mensâ et thoro, by reason of adultery, brought by the husband against his wife. The parties, Major William Hamerton, an officer of artillery, and Miss Isabella Romer, were married at the British Ambassador's chapel at Paris in December, 1818, and of that marriage, which is confessed and sufficiently proved as the substratum of the [9] suit, there is issue one daughter now living and about nine years of age.

The parties cohabited together from their marriage and up to the 25th of March, 1827, at various places, principally abroad; but, for the last seventeen months of that period at Cheltenham: they then separated, he having dismissed her his house on finding certain letters; and no subsequent cohabitation is suggested; for she soon after went with her mother to Tours in France, and has ever since remained abroad.

During their residence at Cheltenham, which began in August, 1825, they lived, first, at a house in Montague Place till the spring of 1826, and then removed to Fancy Hall, where they continued the remainder of the time. At No. 1 Bellevue Place, near their former residence, there dwelt an elderly lady, the widow of an officer of rank, Mrs. Mathews, who had been the intimate friend of Mrs. Romer, the mother of Mrs. Hamerton, and of Mrs. Hamerton herself from her infancy.

The libel charges adultery with Mr. Bushe, a married man, who with his wife, Lady Louisa Bushe, lived at No. 2 Oxford Terrace. The acquaintance is alleged to have commenced at a fancy ball given by Mrs. Hamerton in January, 1826; though from some part of the evidence it appears that an acquaintance between Mr. Bushe and Major Hamerton subsisted previously.

The fifth article of the libel pleads that Mrs. Hamerton and Bushe first became acquainted at the fancy ball to which I have just referred, and then alleges, "That soon after the commence-[10]-ment of their acquaintance an improper intimacy, entirely unknown to the husband took place between them, and that at such time they have committed adultery." The sixth pleads "that in the spring of 1827 Bushe availed himself of every opportunity, unknown to Hamerton and during his absence out hunting or elsewhere, to keep up an improper intercourse with Mrs. Hamerton; that he very frequently met her by appointment (particularly at the house of Mrs. Mathews, No. 1 Bellevue Place, Cheltenham), and on many occasions gave her notes or letters, conversed with her for considerable periods of time, and occasionally in French." No adultery nor indecent familiarity is specifically alleged in either of these two articles; no impropriety but this correspondence by notes. Now, that subsequent to this acquaintance a great intimacy arose, and that frequent interviews in the streets and at other places by appointment, and that improper conduct took place, is pleaded in the eighth and ninth articles.(a) The eighth alleges, "That in March or April, 1826, Mrs. Hamerton, being out in the carriage with her little girl, met Bushe, who said to her in French, 'If you will go to No. 1 Bellevue Place, I will meet you there;' that she immediately returned home, left her daughter, and proceeded to No. 1 Bellevue Place, where, on her arrival, she was met by Bushe: that Mrs. Mathews went up stairs; and that Bushe and Mrs. Ha-[11]-merton remained alone together in the parlour (the blinds of which were drawn down) for upwards of twenty minutes, and during such time committed adultery." Here is an averment of adultery, but the witnesses examined do not prove in this parlour (for there it is laid) any indecent familiarity nor any thing beyond a mere visit. It is true that the blinds were down, but that was the habit of the house: it cannot be pretended that these averments of adultery are in any way proved, so that the Court can receive them as a fact established against the wife.

(a) The seventh article in substance pleaded, "That Mrs. Hamerton, after her intimacy with Bushe, entirely changed her usual habits, and became very inattentive to her child, of whom she had been previously exceedingly fond."

The ninth article pleads, "That a few days afterwards, being in or about March or April, 1826, Mrs. Hamerton being in her carriage in the High Street, Cheltenham, met Bushe, who, after conversing with her, ordered the carriage to go to Malcolm Ghur (a retired spot in the outskirts of the town), the residence of Major and Mrs. Croker; that the footman then told Mrs. Hamerton he had just seen them pass by, but she desired him to go to Malcolm Ghur: that on arriving there, the footman knocked at the house door, and returning to the carriage found Bushe with Mrs. Hamerton, and they remained together alone for above half an hour."

I do not understand that any impropriety or familiarity is alleged on that occasion.

The tenth article alleges, "That about a month after the meeting pleaded in the ninth article (being therefore in March or April), Major Hamerton, having reason to believe that Bushe was a person of loose morals, desired his wife to break off all acquaintance with, and to cease speaking to, him; that notwithstand-[12]-ing such direction, she continued clandestinely to meet Bushe, and keep up an adulterous intercourse with him."

Of this interdict at this time there is no proof. Two witnesses are examined on this article. Parsloe, who was in Captain Mathews' service while at his mother's at Cheltenham in the spring of 1826, knows of no interdict. Welch, Major Hamerton's footman, speaks to an interdict in January, 1827. Undoubtedly, if Major Hamerton was persuaded that Bushe, a man of dissolute habits, was in pursuit of his wife, though he cannot be suspected of criminal imprudence or connivance; yet it would have been an act of more caution if he had withdrawn from Cheltenham, a mere casual residence, where his frequent absences in hunting exposed his wife more unprotectedly to Bushe's approaches. Though this does not amount to connivance, one of the basest offences that can be imputed, yet it does amount to want of prudence, particularly considering the opportunities that the habits of such a town as Cheltenham furnish. The eleventh and twelfth articles plead facts which I will consider hereafter.

The thirteenth charges adultery in London and at a house near Fulham; but there is no proof that the parties ever met in London or at Fulham.

On the fourteenth article there is no evidence that any thing criminal occurred at Pittville in July, 1826.

The fifteenth alleges a meeting at the house of one Adamson; but there is no proof that they were ever in the house together. This is laid as happening the latter end of February, 1827, and it is proved that Mrs. Hamerton was seen com-[13]-ing out of that street and going to Colonel Ollney's, and that Bushe also came out of the street soon afterwards and went to his own house. This may be suspicious, but it is no proof that they had seen each other, much less that they had met at Adamson's, and there committed adultery. It is charged that she was much flushed, and that her dress was disordered when she arrived at Colonel Ollney's and on her return home. If it had been proved that she had been at Adamson's, these other circumstances might have aided, but no meeting is proved; and considering she was naturally of a florid complexion, and had walked through the air in the month of February, it is not surprizing that her colour should be heightened: at Colonel Ollney's she sat by the fire and had a hand-screen; she again walked through the air home, and appearing flushed when she arrived there, her husband asked, "what made her face look so red?" and said, "it looked very odd;" he was suspicious and shewed himself jealous; but there was no disorder of dress that the servant observed either at that time or when she dressed her hair before dinner; no agitation of manner that attracted attention; nothing to shew improper personal correspondence.

The next charge, on the sixteenth article, is at a house called the Pavilion. Bushe took this house on the 4th of March, 1827, and the separation took place on the 25th; and there is no proof that Mrs. Hamerton ever was in that house, nor is it even to be inferred from the letters of Bushe found in her possession.

As far then as the oral evidence goes there is no proof of actual adultery. If there is any [14] proof, it must be on the eleventh and twelfth articles, which plead the letters. These letters begin in January and end on the 15th of March; and Bushe, in the last of them, talks of returning to Cheltenham on the 25th, on which day the discovery was made.

What, then, are the proofs on the libel of actual adultery? for the Court cannot separate on improper conduct, short of actual adultery; such conduct may lead up to the proof of guilt; and it is true that the law does not require direct evidence of the very fact committed at a specific time and place, but it does require the Court to be satisfied that actual adultery has been committed. That is the principle laid down and admitted by the counsel on both sides—"that there must be a surrender of her person to the embraces of the party with whom the offence is charged." Though the intercourse is alleged to have been kept up for above twelve months, and though thirty witnesses have been examined, yet no indecent familiarity is even laid; no proximate act is pleaded in the libel; and no personal freedoms are observed, except that two witnesses speak to a kiss; one, on a staircase at a ball; the other, while Bushe was handing her into the carriage, the witness standing at the door of the house. These kisses are not pleaded in the fifth article, on which the witnesses depose to them, and are not strictly evidence on that article, and should scarcely have been taken down. Herbert, a confectioner at Cheltenham, of the age of twenty only at the time of his examination, speaks to the first. It was at the fancy ball in January, 1826—the very commencement of their acquaintance; [15] though Welch says that Hamerton and Bushe were acquainted long before. Mrs. Hamerton undoubtedly ought to have resented this conduct; but it is a slight circumstance, except as shewing the assurance and libertinism of Bushe.

The other witness is Main: he says "that he was waiting at a party at Colonel Crowder's, about March, 1826, and that while at the hall-door he heard the sound of a kiss after Bushe had handed Mrs. Hamerton into the carriage; and that they afterwards shook hands." The kiss then might be on the hand; for it is not very credible that she should have ventured further in sight of this servant. The fact, I repeat, is not pleaded, and at the utmost it is slight. No other personal familiarity is then spoken to, except the shaking of hands, which is so almost universally practised in modern manners that it cannot lead to an inference of improper intimacy: whether the constant habit tends much to support the delicacy and propriety of females may admit of different opinions; it is to be considered as the common intercourse of society that may occur without guilt.

What, then, is the proof of guilt at Mrs. Mathews'? The charges are laid in the sixth, eighth, eleventh, and twelfth articles. The sixth is a mere general and introductory article; and I have sufficiently noticed it. The eighth also has been adverted to; and I may here again remark that in that room the blinds were usually down; there was no sofa in it; no familiarity was seen, and the door was not fastened. No witness, though three have been examined, ventures upon any sufficient ground to swear to [16] a belief that adultery was committed in that parlour. Welch rather negatives it.

The eleventh and twelfth articles are very loose: hardly time or place is so specifically fixed as to afford an opportunity to meet the charge. The eleventh pleads, "That notwithstanding the direction given by Major Hamerton to his wife (as set forth in the tenth article), and within a few days afterwards, she stopped and conversed with Bushe in Sherborne Walk; that they again shortly afterwards made an appointment to meet at Mrs. Mathews', at No. 1 Bellevue Place, at the door of whose house he met her, and they went in together, and remained in one of the rooms with the blinds drawn down for a considerable time; and on that occasion committed adultery." But the twelfth article is the most important. It pleads "that during the summer, autumn, and winter of 1826, and the beginning of 1827, Bushe and Mrs. Hamerton continued clandestinely to carry on their intimacy; that on several occasions, and particularly in July and December, 1826, and also in January and February, 1827, they met at No. 1 Bellevue Place, and remained for considerable spaces of time alone together in a room belonging to that house, and then and there on each of these occasions committed adultery."

This is laid in such a way that it is impossible for the party to defend herself. Nothing but very clear evidence that they did meet on some occasion would very consistently with justice warrant the Court in concluding that she was guilty of the crime imputed: it must be [17] such evidence as would allow the wife to counterplead even after publication.

Two maid-servants, Hargrave and Bright, depose to these articles. To what does their evidence amount? Mrs. Hamerton was almost an adopted child of Mrs. Mathews; she was very frequently at her house, at all times of the day. Mrs. Mathews had a son, Captain Mathews, who, according to the evidence of Parsloe and Bright, was staying at her house eight or nine months till June, 1826. Bushe was intimately acquainted with Captain Mathews, and often called upon him; Bushe, too, probably might go still more frequently for the sake of seeing and of endeavouring to seduce Mrs. Hamerton; but after Captain Mathews left Cheltenham in June, 1826, Mrs. Romer, Mrs. Hamerton's mother, was at Mrs. Mathews' for three or four months in that year: and Hargrave says, "that during that time Bushe did not come at all to Mrs. Mathews';" and the libel leaves a chasm in the meetings from July till December, 1826. The same witness says, "that after Mrs. Romer was gone, Bushe and Mrs. Hamerton were never left alone together by Mrs. Mathews, except for a few minutes:" and Bright thus deposes: "She well remembers that for some time before the separation Mrs. Mathews did not ever leave Bushe and Mrs. Hamerton alone together."

Mrs. Hamerton had a husband who suspected and cautioned her, and she would have acted more properly and prudently if she had carefully avoided Mr. Bushe upon any occasion. Upon one occasion, however, Mr. Hamerton dined out, and she took an early dinner with [18] Mrs. Mathews; while they were at dinner Bushe called; he was shewn up into the drawing-room; there Mrs. Hamerton immediately went to receive and entertain him. There is nothing extraordinary or unusual in this interview disconnected from other circumstances—the kisses and meetings; it is only what might occur in any family: the hour of visiting was not passed; a visitor was announced; Mrs. Hamerton might have said, "I'll go up stairs and entertain him while you finish your dinner." The old lady staid and finished her dinner; afterwards, according to her custom, she went to her bed-room, attended by her maid, and then came down to Mrs. Hamerton and Mr. Bushe into the drawing-room. Here then they were alone together for some time, and there was a possibility of the act of adultery. But if any one else had called, the transaction would have taken the same course. Thus viewed, it is an ordinary occurrence, from which no inference of adultery can be drawn. One of the witnesses, the cook, thinks they must have committed adultery; but she is a very forward witness. The housemaid can say nothing as to the adultery; she can form no belief as to that; and there is nothing to warrant the Court in drawing that conclusion; no fastened doors; no forbidding of interruption; no marks on the sofa; no discomposure of dress; no familiarity seen. The husband has not ventured to cross-examine Mrs. Mathews. There is nothing, therefore, but what is consistent with the most perfect innocence. It may, connected with other circumstances, be suspicious: there might be familiarities, a pressing to the heart, as the letters would seem to indicate; but [19] there is nothing to justify the Court in concluding that which must consign Mrs. Hamerton to disgrace.

There is another circumstance not entirely to be laid out of the case. From the libel it is to be inferred that Mrs. Mathews was privy to, and conniving at, the adultery. The cook seems to suggest that. If so, Mrs. Mathews must be one of the most infamous, most abandoned, and most profligate of women. She would be a procuress, and be almost prostituting her own daughter. Up to this time Mrs. Mathews was considered as a most respectable person. Sir Alexander Bryce, and the Reverend Dr. Yates, two of her intimate acquaintance, give her the highest character. She was also the intimate and dear friend and benefactress of Mrs. Hamerton's mother; she had almost brought up Mrs. Hamerton as her own child; she has been examined as a witness, and consequently exposed to a cross-examination, but Major Hamerton has not addressed to her a single question. She states "that she would on no account have lent herself to any connection of a criminal nature between Isabella Frances Hamerton and John Bushe, or any other parties." And at the end of her evidence on the second article is this passage: "Deponent verily believes that on no occasion of the meeting of the said parties at her house did they commit adultery: the thing was morally impossible." So then Mrs. Mathews, as far as in her lies, negatives the commission of adultery at her house, and if the offence was not consummated there, there is no other place where there is any semblance of its having been effected; the hus-[20]-band then has failed in his charge, though he has examined thirty witnesses, and the wife is entitled to her dismissal upon the oral evidence.

But there are letters exhibited, addressed by Mr. Bushe to Mrs. Hamerton under the feigned name of Mrs. Godolphin; and it is proved that she fetched and received these letters from the post office. They are written, as I have before said, between the 10th of January and 15th of March, 1827. There is an allusion in several of them to Mrs. M., and in one of them, No. 8, to a note from Mrs. Hamerton inclosed by Mrs. M. If by Mrs. M. was meant Mrs. Mathews, it would give a very unfavourable colour to her conduct and evidence—perhaps even a different aspect to the charge. But who Mrs. M. is, has not been explained in the evidence. It has not been pleaded that by Mrs. M. was meant Mrs. Mathews. There is, I observe, at the end of the letter No. 8, a reference to a Miss M. Now in the evidence there is no mention of Mrs. Mathews having any daughter, and therefore I see no reason to suppose that Mrs. M. meant Mrs. Mathews. No interrogatory has been put to Mrs. Mathews to know whether she had forwarded a note, and if she had, to explain how it happened.

The letters have been much examined and commented upon. I have read them over and over again; but I do not intend to follow the counsel in their comments. They are written in an ardent and romantic strain; Bushe soliciting interviews for criminal purposes, for it is impossible his object, in thus addressing a married woman, could have been other than crimi-[21]-nal, or that when a married woman receives such letters from a married man, but that she must know they were for licentious purposes. Still, however, some women will go a great way without proceeding to the last extremity of guilt; and the Court must be satisfied not only that there has been a surrender of the mind, but of the person. It has been argued that these letters shew that actual guilt had passed; but on reading them, and after the argument, I think they contain no unequivocal reference to, nor inference of, any act of adultery committed. The parts relied on are capable of explanation, though attended with much suspicion: and when the oral evidence has entirely failed in establishing the offence, and no occasion can be pointed out when adultery was actually committed; and when even these letters do not refer retrospectively to meetings at any particular time or place, it would be too much to say that such equivocal documents can be admitted as sufficient and conclusive proof.

The letters seem to shew that she had consented to an interview, and had promised that she at last would meet him at the Pavilion. They are, as already observed, strange extravagant stuff, breathing the most ardent affection, and soliciting interviews, written by a profligate libertine, professing something like an honourable attachment to a weak, vain, silly woman: he a married man and she a married woman. It was highly blameable on her part to allow this correspondence, but it is hardly possible, considering the profligate character of the writer, but that they would have contained some strong and unequivocal reference to an [22] adulterous connexion having previously taken place, some more direct and more gross allusions to past criminality if she had surrendered her person. I do not go so far as to say that they negative adultery, but, coupled with the want of oral evidence, they do not sustain the charge.

Thus then stands the evidence on the libel, and on it I do not feel myself warranted in pronouncing the adultery to be proved. There is, however, an additional article alleging a renewal of adultery at Paris, where it is pleaded Mrs. Hamerton took up her residence in the early part of February, after she had removed from her mother's house at Tours. Now the only witness to this part of the case is an attorney's clerk, a young man not more than twenty years' old, and he was sent over to Paris, in March or April, for the purpose of collecting evidence. Surely, if such was the object of his journey, it is a further reason why the Court must consider the only proof, now adduced on this article, insufficient and unsatisfactory. The whole of this witness' evidence is, "that on the 5th of April he saw Mrs. Hamerton get into a carriage at No. 51, in a street he describes, and that after driving about for nearly an hour, she returned to a street close adjoining, and there entered a house, No. 3; after which the carriage drove away with a lady in it. He says Mrs. Hamerton remained in that house for about four hours, and then walked home alone; and that shortly afterwards he saw Bushe come out of the same house, dressed as if he had not been out before on that day." How could that be known to the witness? Bushe might have [23] gone in dressed, while the witness was absent, and besides it is not proved that Mrs. Hamerton knew Bushe was in the house. "In less than a week afterwards he saw Bushe get into a coach at No. 3, and at No. 51 Mrs. Hamerton and another female, with bundles, get into it." This is a circumstance leading to a suspicion that Bushe and Mrs. Hamerton were renewing their intercourse. She happened casually to be at Paris; and there is nothing to shew that the meeting was other than accidental. If innocent, she might be ignorant that Bushe was at the house, No. 51; and the female accompanying her, when seen with the bundles, might be her mother; they might then have been going back together to Tours; and Bushe might have called to make contrite apologies for having, by his former attentions, brought upon her these accusations. The circumstance however is certainly suspicious; but the wife is abroad, and this forms no part of the original charge. The Court, therefore, would not be warranted in drawing a conclusion of criminality, when the facts were capable of a construction of innocence. It must have proof of guilt, and it cannot listen to any excuse offered on the ground of the expence that would be necessarily incurred in examining witnesses by commission at Paris.

As was strongly urged by the counsel for the husband, it is a great hardship for him to remain liable to cohabitation with a wife so imprudent, and so culpable, as to allow of this correspondence: but still the presumption is in favour of innocence, and without proof of actual criminality—of real adultery—it would be an [24] injustice to cast her upon the world without a provision. No application is, as I understand, at present made to the Court, on the part of the husband, to rescind the conclusion, and permit him to go into further evidence, or to give in further articles. If he is desirous of doing so, the Court would be very unwilling to refuse an application of that kind, when there is proof of such culpability on the part of the wife.

Upon the application of the counsel for Major Hamerton, the cause was directed to stand over; and on the third session of Hilary Term, 1829, his affidavit was exhibited, which, after stating that his proctor, and William Gyde, had about the 25th of November, 1828, gone to Paris in order to make inquiries respecting Mrs. Hamerton; and after stating the result of those inquiries, thus proceeded: "That he has been informed and verily believes that, on or about the 20th of December, 1828, and not before, it was ascertained that evidence could be adduced in proof of the facts pleaded, and that the facts have come to his knowledge since the said 25th of November, and that he verily believes he shall be able to prove the contents of his allegation." This affidavit was corroborated by that of Mr. Gyde.

Upon these affidavits the Court rescinded the conclusion of the cause, and allowed an allegation to be brought in.(a) From this order an appeal was immediately entered.

[25] THE OFFICE OF THE JUDGE PROMOTED BY BENNETT v. BONAKER, Clerk. Arches Court, Michaelmas Term, 4th Session, 1828.—The Court is bound to admit articles by a churchwarden against an incumbent for frequent irregularities in the performance of divine service, and of parochial duties, and also for his violating the churchyard: nor (the suit being commenced in April, 1828, and the alleged offences being laid from September, 1824, till January, 1827) is the lapse of time any bar. By the general law the church service ought to be regularly performed every Sunday morning and evening. Any relaxation is to be supposed to have been permitted by the diocesan, owing to the circumstances of the parish; and the terms prescribed must be strictly observed.

[See further, 3 Hagg. Ecc. 17.]

On the admission of articles.

This suit was instituted by the churchwarden of the parish of Churchhoneybourne, Worcestershire, against the vicar and incumbent of that parish "for and concerning his soul's health; the reformation of his manners and excesses, and, more especially, for neglect of and irregularity in the performance of divine offices as vicar of the said parish, and for indecently and irreverently digging the ground or soil of the churchyard, and of the said parish, and thereby disturbing the bodies of the dead buried therein, and for other irregularities and excesses."

There were twenty-seven articles; they pleaded the institution of Mr. Bonaker in May, 1817; and charged specifically neglect of, and irregularity in, the performance of divine service, and the public offices of the church from the 19th of September,

(a) It is a known maxim in the civil law, "Causa nunquam concluditur contra judicem:" Oughton, tit. 117, s. 3, m. "Quoad judicem," says Gail, "nunquam in causâ concluditur, et ideo ex officio conclusionem rescindere, ulterioremque probationem partibus injungere potest." Pract. Obs. lib. 1, observ. 107, s. 5, et seq. This principle has frequently been adverted to and adopted in matrimonial causes. See Elwes v. Elwes, 1 Hagg. Con. 292. Searle v. Price, 2 Hagg. Con. 191. Wyatt v. Henry, ib. 219. And the editor has printed, in a Supplement, some notes of other cases where he same principle has been recognized and acted upon by Lord Stowell and the late Sir William Wynne. Vide "Supplement," p. 134, et seq.

1824, to the 11th [26] of January, 1827, inclusive: but they contained no charge of a later date.

Phillimore and Addams in objection to the articles. Considerable irregularities on the part of the vicar in the performance of his clerical duties are pleaded, but much time has been allowed to elapse before the suit was instituted; and it is not pleaded that the offences have been repeated since the early part of 1827; nor that they are likely to be renewed. The parish would seem to be small, and the vicar may have been prevented by illness, or by unavoidable accident. The Court will regard the offences as bygone, and presume them condoned; but if it admits the articles it will admit them with such observations as will put an end to the suit.

Per Curiam. Why was not the process taken out sooner?

The King's advocate and Lushington in support of the articles. Some time was necessarily consumed in communicating with the chancellor of the diocese, and in considering with him the propriety of instituting the present suit. The lapse of time is the only objection of importance; but it must be recollected that prosecutions of this nature, though conducted by individuals, are for no private interests; but ad publicam vindictam, and to assert the rights of all the parishioners. At present the Court cannot, upon bare suggestion, presume that the vicar was prevented by illness or by accident: nor is the smallness of the parish any excuse.

[27] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a suit brought by the churchwarden of Churchhoneybourne, Worcestershire, against the minister of the parish for neglect of duty, and for violating the churchyard. It is highly creditable to the clergy, considering the number of that body within the province, that suits of this nature are of such rare occurrence in these Courts.

By the general law the church service, according to the form prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer, is to be regularly performed every Sunday in the morning and evening. If less duty is required, it is to be supposed that the relaxation has been adopted with the approbation of the diocesan, and has been permitted owing to the circumstances of the parish; and as the service is to be performed for the use of the parishioners, such relaxation may properly be granted in certain cases: but, if it be so granted, the minister must strictly adhere to the terms prescribed, and must not vary them at his own pleasure, for his own convenience, and on his own authority. It is the diocesan who is to judge of the degree of relaxation to be allowed.

In this parish it is stated what was the usual service before the present minister's incumbency; and it was sufficiently indulgent, viz. during the winter months, from October to March, morning service at eleven every Sunday; and, during the rest of the year, service alternately in the morning at eleven, and in the afternoon at three.

[28] The articles charge various departures from the rule, and various omissions and neglects without any just cause. It neither is likely, nor would it be proper, that the parishioners should complain of occasional accidental omissions, but here the number of times shew that the vicar's neglect was habitual; and this conduct may possibly have arisen from a mistaken notion of his own rights, and from a belief that he might vary or altogether omit the duty at his own pleasure. These numerous irregularities however only prove the forbearance of the parish: but when the vicar is at length proceeded against, the accumulation of the facts constitutes the weight of the charge, and makes it more incumbent on the Court to receive the articles.

Primâ facie it cannot be denied that there have been a breach and neglect of duty of which the parish have a right to complain, and to such complaint the lapse of time offers no bar. In some instances no service was performed; in others, instead of morning there was evening service. Sometimes notice of the sacrament was given, particularly on Easter Sunday, and none was administered. All these are matters to be complained of, and for which the minister is to be admonished by the Court. If the charges are not true the minister must defend himself by denying them, or he may from circumstances be able to justify his conduct; but if they are true, and he has acted from a mistaken notion of his rights, he may admit them in acts of Court and thus avoid expence. There are however two or three very special charges. One that in February, 1826, he refused to [29] christen an infant brought to the vicarage house when very ill; and in his conduct there are circumstances of aggravation. It is not likely that the child would have been brought unless it was really ill: the very circumstance of its being brought by the nurse is primâ facie evidence that the family was apprehensive the child would die. The vicar, instead of consenting to do it, flies into a passion and asks, "Whether she will swear that the child would not live twenty-four hours; and on her saying she could not do so, he declared, 'Then I'll not baptize it, you may bring it to the church, and I'll christen it.'"

Now if these circumstances are all true, they will render this an improper refusal; for if there was reasonable ground for fearing that the child's life was in danger the vicar was bound to do what he was then requested: though undoubtedly, if the child was not ill, the refusal was justifiable.

The twenty-second article imputes a still more extraordinary offence: he publishes the banns of marriage of two persons on two successive Sundays; but as there is no service on the third Sunday no publication then takes place, yet he gives a certificate of their publication as on that day. The parties are married, and he publishes the banns the third time on a subsequent Sunday. Here then, besides the neglect of having no service on that day, the vicar grants a false certificate, and then is guilty of a further irregularity by subsequently publishing the banns.

The last article of charge is one of a still more offensive nature; viz. removing the earth from [30] the churchyard, consecrated ground, together with the bones of the dead, into his garden. I cannot conceive any thing that would be more highly offensive to the feelings of the parishioners, nor indeed more grossly indecent. It is to be hoped and believed that irregularities of this kind are very rare.

On the whole, I think I am bound to admit these articles, and if the admission should have the effect of convincing the vicar of the impropriety of his conduct, and inducing him to refrain for the future, the churchwarden no doubt will not press these charges, nor proceed with any degree of vindictiveness, nor put this gentleman to further expence: but my duty is to admit the articles to proof; strongly, however, recommending the churchwarden to be satisfied, if an affirmative issue is given.

THE OFFICE OF THE JUDGE PROMOTED BY MOYSEY, D.D. v. HILLCOAT, D.D. Arches Court, Michaelmas Term, 4th Session, 1828.—A chapel being shortly before 1735 built by private subscription, and the subscribers agreeing, out of the pew rents, to pay the rector of the parish a yearly stipend for performing divine service, a licence was obtained from the bishop to the rector and his successors, who, from time to time, performed therein parochial duties, but there was no proof of consecration, nor of any composition, between the patron, incumbent, and ordinary; such chapel is merely proprietary, and the minister, nominated by the rector of the parish and licensed by the bishop, cannot perform parochial duties therein, nor distribute the alms collected at the Lord's Supper.—The incumbent of the parish has a right without licence to perform divine service in any consecrated building within the parish. Semble, therefore, a licence to the rector from the ordinary, to perform divine service in a chapel, tends to shew that the chapel was not consecrated.—Proprietary chapels are anomalies unknown to the constitution, and to the ecclesiastical establishments of the Church of England, and can possess no parochial rights.—Primâ facie all parochial duties are committed to, and imposed upon, the parish incumbent, and all fees and emoluments arising therefrom belong to him; and such rights can only be granted to a chapel, or its officiating minister, by composition with the patron, incumbent and ordinary: quære, whether not also with a compensation to future incumbents.—The performance of baptisms, marriages, and burials, in a chapel existing from time immemorial, might possibly be presumptive evidence of consecration, and of a composition: aliter as to a chapel, the origin of which is ascertained.—Alms, collected in chapels as well as in parish churches during the reading of the offertory, are by the direction of the rubric at the disposal of the incumbent of the parish and the churchwardens thereof, and not of the minister or proprietors of the chapel.

[Referred to, Liddell v. Rainsford, 1869, 38 L. J. Ecc. 20; Richards v. Fincher, 1874, L. R. 4 Adm. & Ecc. 264.]

This cause came by letters of request from the Chancellor of Bath and Wells; and was promoted by Dr. Moysey, Archdeacon of Bath, and Rector of Walcot, against the Rev. Dr. Hillcoat, officiating minister of Queen Square Chapel or Oratory, in the parish of Walcot.

[31] The citation called upon Dr. Hillcoat to answer to certain articles, more especially "for publishing the banns of matrimony, solemnizing marriages, baptizing children, churching women, and burying the dead in the said chapel or oratory without lawful authority, and contrary to, and in defiance of, the orders and injunctions of Dr. Moysey, and in breach of the ecclesiastical laws of this realm; and also for appropriating the alms received at the administration of the sacrament."

The articles, after setting forth the institution and induction of Dr. Moysey in June, 1817, to the rectory of Walcot, Bath, pleaded in the fourth and fifth "that in 1735 the Earl of Tilney and eleven other individuals caused Queen Square Chapel to be built for the celebration of divine service according to the rites of the Church of England, and agreed to allow a yearly salary of £40 to the rector of Walcot for officiating therein; and in consequence thereof, on or about the 20th of August, 1735, the Bishop of Bath and Wells granted his licence and authority 'to the Reverend James Sparrow, the rector of Walcot, and to his successors, to preach, administer the sacraments, and perform all other public offices of religion in the said oratory or chapel.'"

Sixth and seventh. "That on the 7th of April, 1821, Dr. Moysey nominated Dr. Hillcoat to perform the office of officiating minister in Queen Square Chapel within the parish of Walcot, and to receive all stipends, salaries, and emoluments of and belonging or theretofore usually paid and payable to the offici-[32]-ating minister in the said chapel by the proprietor or proprietors thereof." That on the 22nd of June, 1821, the Bishop of Bath and Wells granted his licence to Dr. Hillcoat "to perform the office of officiating minister in the oratory or chapel called Queen Square Chapel, in reading the common prayers and performing the ecclesiastical duties belonging to the said office."

Eighth and ninth. A notice in writing sent by Dr. Moysey to Dr. Hillcoat, which was as follows:—"I give you this formal notice to abstain from any encroachment on my rights as rector of Walcot, and to abstain from marrying, churching, burying, or performing any other such services within the parish of Walcot, as you will answer the same at your peril." And again, on the 8th of March: "I return the fee for churching which you have sent, and deny any right you may claim to interfere in my parish beyond reading prayers, preaching, and administering the Lord's Supper in Queen Square Chapel according to your licence." And again, a letter dated on the 2nd of April, as follows:—"I hereby withdraw my permission to appropriate to yourself for distribution by your hands any the smallest portion of the sacramental alms collected at Queen Square Chapel within my parish, and require you to pay those collected yesterday and all other such alms to me, as rector of the parish of Walcot, and, further, I repeat that you are forbidden henceforth to exercise any sort of ministry within my parish beyond reading prayers and preaching, and administering the Holy Communion within [33] that chapel or oratory according to your licence."

Tenth. "That in June, 1827, Dr. Hillcoat caused to be set up in Queen Square Chapel a notice 'that banns were published, and marriages, churchings, baptisms and burials solemnized in the chapel as aforetime:' and that the clerk publicly gave a similar notice from his desk."

The eleventh to the eighteenth inclusive pleaded (with a specification of dates and names) "that frequently and without any authority, and in defiance of the aforesaid notices, Dr. Hillcoat published in the chapel aforesaid, banns of marriage; solemnized marriages and made entries of the same in a book kept by himself for that purpose; and, further, that without any authority or urgent necessity he baptized several children, and made entries of the same in a book kept by himself, and described baptisms solemnized in the parish of Walcot in the year 1827." And, further, "that bodies were interred in the vaults under the chapel; that Dr. Hillcoat performed the burial service, and made entries of the burials in a book kept by him for that purpose." It was also set forth "that he performed the office of churching."

Nineteenth. After pleading "that by the general law, sacramental alms should be paid over to the incumbent and churchwardens of the mother-church, to be disposed of according to the rubric;" went on to object "that Dr. Hillcoat (notwithstanding the notice as pleaded in the eighth and ninth articles) had administered the Lord's Supper or Holy Communion at least once a month in Queen Square [34] Chapel, and particularly on the 3d of February, 1828; and that on every such occasion there were many communicants, and that the money given by them at the offertory was received by Dr. Hillcoat, who had refused, and still does refuse, to pay over the same to Dr. Moysey, in order that it might be disposed of to such pious and charitable uses as he and the churchwardens should think fit, agreeably to the directions of the rubric and ordinances."

Upon these articles no witnesses were examined, as the proof by Dr. Hillcoat's admissions was considered sufficient.

In answer to the articles an allegation on the part of Dr. Hillcoat was given in and admitted without opposition. It consisted of six articles, and pleaded:—

1. "That Queen Square Chapel or Oratory was completed in or about August, 1735, at which time it was duly consecrated by the Bishop of Bath and Wells, and set apart for the performance of divine service, for preaching the word of God, administering the holy sacraments; for the solemnization of marriages, churching of women, and the burial of the dead, according to the rites and ceremonies of the Church of England: that a search had been duly made in the registry of the Consistory Court of Bath and Wells for the deed of consecration of the chapel; but that the same could not be found. That for several years after the consecration of the chapel, burials took place in the vaults, and the burial service was read by Mr. Sparrow and other ministers in holy orders officiating in the [35] chapel; and that from 1735 to 1819 divine service had been performed, the holy sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper administered, banns of marriage published, marriages solemnized, and women churched therein according to the rites and ceremonies of the Church of England, by Mr. Sparrow and his successors; that register books for the entry of the performance of such offices had been duly kept; and that the sacramental alms received in the chapel had been constantly, since the opening thereof, at the uncontrouled disposal of the minister therein officiating, and of the proprietors thereof." It further pleaded, "That the chapel had at all times been, and now was, accounted and reputed by the parishioners of Walcot to be duly consecrated."

2. Exhibited the ledger book kept by the proprietors of the chapel, in which were entered the receipts and disbursements in respect of the same; and pleaded "an entry of the payment of 10s. for a copy of the 'Act of Consecration,' and that the same referred to the consecration of the chapel." It further pleaded "Certain entries of fees paid and received on account of burials."

3. "Exhibited thirteen original licences granted for the solemnization of marriages in Queen Square Chapel; that the marriages were there celebrated by the minister thereof; and that the name 'C. A. Moysey,' written in the margin of the thirteenth exhibit, was of the handwriting of Dr. Moysey."

4. "That in 1817 Dr. Hillcoat became legally possessed of the freehold and inheritance of the [36] chapel; and that in respect of the same all the estate of the original proprietors vested in him."

5. "That the licence granted to Dr. Hillcoat had not been revoked, but was in full force; and that it was in the words and according to the usual form of licences granted to curates and ministers of the Church of England requiring licences to perform the regular duties of the church; and that such licences were deemed a sufficient authority for the performance of all such duties."

The sixth was the general article.

To this allegation Dr. Moysey gave in his answers; and also in support of the first article the Reverend Dr. Falconer of Bath and Robert Clarke, solicitor, were examined. Clarke, after speaking to the performance of divine service in Queen Square Chapel, and of the public offices of the church, deposed "That he had inspected the registers of marriages deposited in the rectory house, Walcot, and found No. 5, entitled 'The Register of Banns and Marriages published or solemnized in the chapel in Queen Square in the parish of Walcot,' wherein were entries of banns and marriages in the chapel from 1754 to 1778 inclusively. That No. 9 was endorsed 'The Register of Marriages belonging to Queen Square Chapel,' and began in 1779 and concluded in 1788. That Nos. 11 and 15 were respectively entitled 'The Registers of Marriages solemnized in the parochial chapel of St. Mary, in the parish of Walcot.' That No. 22 was entitled 'Register of Marriages in the chapel of St. Mary, Walcot,' which books severally con-[37]-tained entries of marriages solemnized in the chapel from the time at which No. 9 ended; such entries following in regular course; and that the last bore date on the 26th of July, 1819. That these books or registers were distinct from the register books kept for the parish of Walcot, although they were in the same chest. The deponent did not refer to the register of baptism; but from occasionally requiring certificates of baptism, he knows that a register has been kept separately for Queen Square Chapel."

On the second interrogatory he answered, "That he knew not of any burial in the chapel vaults after 1738." And on the third, "That prior to 1813 he believed a separate register of baptisms was not kept for the chapel."

Dr. Falconer deposed, "That from 1798 to 1800 he was assistant minister to Mr. Sibley, the rector of Walcot, in his (Mr. Sibley's) separate office of minister of Queen Square Chapel; and that, as assistant minister, and not as parochial curate, he had in the said chapel administered the sacrament, baptized, published banns, solemnized marriages, and churched women, according to the rubric." This witness deposed, "That at the time he officiated in the chapel the entry of baptisms was made in the register of baptisms for the parish of Walcot." He further said "that he did not, of his own knowledge, know in what manner the sacramental alms were disposed of, save that the same were taken possession of by the clerk."

[38] The King's advocate and Lushington for Dr. Moysey. The question is, whether Dr. Hillcoat be entitled to perform all divine offices in Queen's Square Chapel, contrary to the prohibition of the rector of the parish? The right is not claimed for any particular district, but as co-extensive with the rector's. Now, whatever its character may be, we deny that any such right can be sustained. It is clear law that the incumbent has the cure of souls throughout the parish; he alone has authority to perform duties within the parish; no other can, unless by prescription, without his consent. There are chapels in many parishes, such as free chapels, chapels of ease, parochial chapels, proprietary chapels. What this particular chapel is does not appear. It would seem to be proprietary, with an agreement that the rector should perform the duty in it for a stipend of 40l. per annum. We admit that banns have been published in the chapel, marriages, baptisms, churchings, and burials performed. But if all this were irregular, the abuse is not sanctioned by the mere sufferance of former incumbents. No power of nominating the officiating minister of this chapel is reserved to the proprietors, nor is there an instance of any person performing in it the several services, but the rector of Walcot and his curates, before the appointment of Dr. Hillcoat. He was nominated by Dr. Moysey, and on his nomination obtained a licence, the same as a common licence to a stipendiary curate.

It is alleged that this chapel was consecrated in 1735; and it rests with the defendant to prove [39] it. It has no chapelry annexed; and we are not aware that there are any such consecrated, except noblemen's chapels. It is also assessed; it pays all taxes; and has contributed to the church rate. There is no precedent for a consecrated chapel paying taxes. No deed nor act of consecration has been found, nor any papers relating to it. There is no lapse of time to account for its non-production; no accident, as from fire, by which the registry might be destroyed and the muniments lost. There is, it is true, an entry in the book of receipts and disbursements for a charge of 10s. for "a copy of the act of consecration;" but there are no other charges for the expences incident to a consecration. This "copy of the act" might then be something preparatory to a consecration, but from which the proprietors evidently desisted. It will be contended that the acts done, and the services performed, would infer the consecration of the chapel. Now, in the account-books there are charges for preparing the instruments, but none for the actual consecration. The first charge is "three guineas for the rector's licence." A licence for the rector leads to this presumption, that it was for an unconsecrated place; he wants no licence for a consecrated place. Burials, it would seem, took place in this chapel till 1739. Three, however, are noticed to have occurred before March, 1735, the date of the alleged consecration. These, therefore, do not shew the place to have been consecrated. After 1739 no burials occur; and there is a charge, about 1740, in the ledger for the opinion of Dr. Strahan "as to the power of burial in the chapel:" the service was discontinued at that time; the inference then is, [40] that his opinion was against the existence of any right; and as the rector officiated at that time, the only question could be whether the place were proper for reading the funeral service; and it was considered as not proper. In 1743 there is a charge for depositing two bodies in the vault; and there are others of a similar nature; these strongly confirm the presumption that the chapel is unconsecrated. There appears also to have been a treaty in 1791 about letting the vaults to some brewers, and in 1798 to a wine merchant, which treaties certainly infer no consecration; and no repute of consecration.

In respect to marriages, there is no proof of a publication of banns before the marriage act of 1754. The two licences that have been discovered for marriages in this chapel previous to 1754 give no authority to Dr. Hillcoat for the exercise of such a privilege in it. The right is not claimed for any particular district. How could any parties be said to inhabit within the district of a chapelry where there is no district annexed? If a marriage be solemnized in a chapel it must be in a chapel with a chapelry annexed. The King v. The Inhabitants of Northfield (Douglas, 658).

This strengthens the presumption against consecration. Some irregularities, however, arose from the rector thus being the officiating minister in this chapel; and these seem to have led to the notion that he might perform all ecclesiastical duties in any place within his own parish, for which he was licensed; and this notion continued to prevail till 1819, when marriages in [41] this chapel were suspended. From these circumstances it appears there was no consecration.

But if the chapel had ever been consecrated, it must be presumed due care would have been taken of the rights of the rector. This was the duty of the bishop and the interest of the patron and of the incumbent. A consecration, however, would not oust the rector of his rights; the cure of souls would remain, and the right of officiating in the chapel. No office of the church could be performed there without his leave. His rights could only be infringed by an act of the legislature, in which case a compensation would be provided for the patron and incumbent of the mother-church. If it were otherwise, there would be great danger to the incumbents: all duties would be left on them, and the emoluments might be frequently diverted. The minister of this chapel is only the curate of the rector. The original licence here was to the rector; not separating the person of minister of the chapel from that of incumbent of the parish; but certain individuals agreed to give a stipend for the convenience of being able to attend divine service in this chapel. If the rector chooses to employ a curate for this chapel only, it does not convey any of his rights. The curate's licence gives him but a qualified authority: and Dr. Hillcoat's licence only enables him to perform the offices named in it. If the chapel is not consecrated, he is not authorized to exceed the terms of his licence: he could not be compelled to perform these duties, as there is no district annexed; there is no person who has a right to enter this chapel, or to have the offices of the church performed there. Mr. [42] Sparrow, the rector of Walcot, at the time this chapel was first opened, had a pew in the chapel, and paid for it. The chapel is not restrained to the use of the parishioners of Walcot; it has no rights of a parochial character, it is sui generis, and Dr. Hillcoat cannot legally do any acts in it, in prejudice of the rector. We therefore contend that, whether the chapel be consecrated or not, the rights of the rector remain, and exclusively entitle him to perform all offices of the church within his parish, and to forbid other persons.

Dodson and Haggard for Dr. Hillcoat. The performance in Queen Square Chapel of the different offices enumerated in the articles is, under the circumstances of this case, perfectly justifiable and legal—ratione loci, et ratione personæ. Their performance is in a place duly consecrated, and by a person duly qualified. It is admitted that marriages were solemnized in this chapel during a period of more than sixty years—from 1754 to 1819: and in this latter year we have a licence from Dr. Moysey himself, in his character of surrogate, for the performance of the marriage service in this very chapel. True, the consecration deed has not been found; but after such a lapse of time it may fairly and reasonably be presumed. Read v. Brookman (3 T. R. 151). Various matters may be presumed, even an act of parliament, and in Smith v. Clay (3 Bro. C. C. 639, n.) Lord Camden said, "That Courts of Equity had adopted principles analogous to those established by the statutes of limitation." We [43] admit there must be circumstances to found a presumption of consecration: in the present case, in the ledger book, there is a charge "for a copy of the act of consecration, and for the carriage of deeds to the bishop." If a consecration in this instance were not to be presumed, a charge of neglect on the part of the then bishop, archdeacon, and incumbent would necessarily ensue.

The licence is, to perform all the services of the church in this chapel—administer the sacraments—baptisms also; which it would not have been if the chapel had not been consecrated. The offices actually done in this chapel give ground for presumption: they amount to a reputation. Successive rectors and their curates would not have officiated, as they have done for a long series of years, if they had not been satisfied of the consecration. The repute of consecration is more especially manifest from the long course of marriages that have taken place within this chapel. Dr. Moysey himself has performed the ceremony of marriage in the chapel; and his nomination of Dr. Hillcoat to the bishop contains no restriction.

Per Curiam. In 1819 the performance of marriages and other occasional duties in this chapel were restrained; then, when the bishop granted to Dr. Hillcoat his licence, it was subject to such restrictions. The licence was to enable him to perform the other duties of officiating minister.

Argument resumed.

It is said the burials were discontinued, and an opinion has been mentioned; but it does not appear when or by whom taken. The nomination of Dr. Hillcoat to be officiating minister is [44] to be interpreted "to act as others had done in that chapel before him," viz. to read, preach, and perform other duties. As officiating minister, the sacrament money is distributed by him.

Per Curiam. Where would he find the churchwardens to assist? What, too, is the nature of this chapel?

Argument resumed.

We apprehend it is of a mixed character—proprietary and parochial—proprietary, with the enjoyment of parochial rights. It has been objected that there is no chapelry annexed to this chapel; and, in support of this objection, the case of The King against The Inhabitants of Northfield has been cited from Douglas. But there the chapel was erected after the marriage act of 1754, which is an important distinction. Again, it is objected there is no charge, in the book of receipts and disbursements, for the expences of a consecration; but such expences may have been defrayed by the individuals who took an interest in building the chapel. Upon the whole, we submit that this is a consecrated chapel, and that the licence of Dr. Hillcoat authorizes him to perform all parochial services within it.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This suit is brought in the form of criminal articles by Dr. Moysey, as rector of the parish of Walcot, Bath, against Dr. Hillcoat, the licensed minister of Queen's Square Chapel in that parish. The object is to try whether Dr. Hillcoat has the right to publish banns, so-[45]-lemnize marriages, administer baptisms, church women, bury the dead, and appropriate alms collected at the sacrament in that chapel.

The suit seems to have been conducted in a liberal and fair manner: for, in order to avoid the expence and delay of examining witnesses, most of the facts pleaded in the articles are admitted in "acts of Court"—a species of practice much to be commended. Indeed, nearly the only fact in controversy or doubt is whether the chapel was ever consecrated. It is not a chapel which has existed beyond memory, and of the origin of which no traces can be ascertained; for its building and history are fully shewn. The facts are these: Previous to 1735, several individuals, twelve in number, built this chapel in the parish of Walcot (which was becoming very populous), and agreed to allow the rector 40l. a year for officiating in it. They considered themselves as the proprietors; they let the pews, paid the rector's and clerk's salaries and other outgoings, and divided the surplus of the profits.

Whether this chapel was consecrated or not does not appear by any consecration act: there are some presumptions bearing both ways. The only evidence on this head is to be found in the tenth page of the ledger book; and in the accounts for the year 1734-5 there is this entry:—

For Mr. Sparrow's licence	£3 3 0
For a copy of act of consecration	0 10 0
For carriage of writings to the bishop	0 2 6

This is no proof of actual consecration; and there is no proof whatever besides this. The instrument sent might be the draft submitted to [46] the bishop for his approbation, and which he rejected, though still the carriage for sending it would be paid. He might prefer granting a licence to consecrating this chapel. Here is a licence to Mr. Sparrow, the rector, but that does not infer consecration: it is rather adverse to that notion. If the chapel had been consecrated, the rector of the parish would not require a licence specially to officiate therein, for he has a right, without licence, to perform divine service in any consecrated building within the parish. A licence may be necessary, and is often granted, to officiate in a place not consecrated, because there the party could not perform the church service without such authority.

No deed of consecration has been produced, nor can be found in the bishop's registry. The absence of it is a most material defect: since if it were forthcoming it would shew the endowment, if any, and the other terms upon which this new place of worship was set up in the parish of Walcot: it would shew what rights, if any, were granted to it—by what authority, and under what conditions and limitations, they were granted. If no such rights were granted, nor granted by competent authority, nor with all the necessary consents, the chapel became merely what is commonly known by the name of a proprietary chapel. A proprietary chapel is perfectly anomalous; it is a thing unknown to the constitution of our Church and in our ecclesiastical establishment. It can possess no parochial rights; and the exercise of any such rights would be a mere usurpation in the view of the law. The rector of the parish in this instance [47] was the licensed minister of the chapel. The original licence to Mr. Sparrow, the rector, was "to him and his successors," which perhaps is the least objectionable shape the matter could have assumed. And the very terms of this licence, describing it as "an oratory or chapel," and making no mention of its consecration, seem to confirm the idea already expressed that the licence was granted because the chapel was not consecrated.

The licence recites the erection of this chapel, "in order that the inhabitants of Walcot parish might more conveniently meet together for the celebration of divine service according to the rites of the Church of England; that the rector of Walcot was to have 40l. per annum for officiating therein; and that, to promote so good a work, the bishop of the diocese granted his full power, licence, and authority to the rector, Mr. Sparrow, and his successors in the rectory, to preach, administer the sacraments, and perform all other public offices of religion in the said oratory or chapel, according to the form prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer of the Church of England." This is a mere permission to the rector, and to his successors, to do the duty in the chapel, and puts the whole under his control. The rectors usually performed the offices in this chapel, though they sometimes employed their curates to do so; but the latter were mere assistants to the rector.

Up to 1821 the duties were thus discharged: but in the month of April of that year Dr. Hillcoat was nominated by Dr. Moysey, the rector, and was licensed by the bishop as the officiating minister. That nomination I shall pre-[48]-sently examine more accurately, to see whether it made any alteration in the general character of the chapel, and the rights of these parties.

As far then as appears, it was originally, and still continued till 1821, a mere ordinary proprietary chapel; whether consecrated or not may not very materially vary the question, unless it could be shewn that certain rights, otherwise belonging to the rector of the parish, were then granted to it with all the proper consents: for, primâ facie, all parochial duties are committed to and imposed upon the parish incumbent, and all fees and emoluments, arising from the performance of those duties, in like manner belong to him. How are such rights to be granted to a chapel or to its officiating minister? Only by composition with all the parties to whom they belong; namely, by the concurrent consent of patron, incumbent, and ordinary, and, possibly, with some compensation to future incumbents for any rights transferred. There are rights belonging to each of these parties which would, pro tanto, be taken away if a proprietary chapel should acquire them.

Of common right all parochial dues, whether from tithes or other sources, belong to the presentee of the patron; and the value of the patronage is diminished if the emoluments of the living are decreased. The incumbent alone cannot give a valid consent to any alienation; for he has at most a life interest, and he cannot injure his successor, and thereby deteriorate the rights of the patron; so, again, the incumbent must consent, for the whole cure of souls is committed to him; the whole emolument of the [49] living belongs to him during his incumbency. Without his consent neither his duties nor emoluments can be lessened by the joint act of the patron and ordinary. The ordinary, too, has rights; he has the general superintendence and guardianship of the Church establishment; he is to protect it against any improvident or corrupt bargain on the part of the patron and incumbent; he is to see that the general welfare of religion is duly consulted; that proper care is taken of the parishioners and their interests, as well as those of succeeding incumbents, and that such interests are not infringed by the other two parties. Nothing can be altered but by the joint act of all three. Hence chapels possess no parochial rights, unless acquired by a composition with the patron, incumbent, and ordinary. Nay, it is reported to have been held by Lord Chancellor Northington that all three uniting will not be sufficient without a compensation to future incumbents.(a)[1] Such composition and the endowment, if any, are usually recited in the consecration act, when the building is consecrated; but here is no trace of a deed of composition, nor of an endowment shewing the consent of the patron or ordinary: there is only an undertaking [50] by the proprietors to allow an additional stipend to the rector for performing duty in this chapel: it seems originally to have been a mere speculation of the proprietors, probably for a very good purpose and from very honourable motives, and not merely for the sake of the emolument arising from letting the pews. If they cannot from any cause let these pews, what is there to prevent them, even if the chapel be consecrated, from shutting it up; and if not consecrated, from converting it to any secular purpose?

It is contended that, the several offices of baptism, marriage, and burial having been performed in the chapel in question, amount to presumptive evidence that there was originally a composition and consecration; so they possibly might, if the chapel had existed from time immemorial; and the performance of these duties in it, if not otherwise to be accounted for, might by lapse of time be attributed to a lawful origin. But here is the origin of the chapel ascertained, and here is the bishop's licence to the minister of the parish to do duty in it, and no mention of consecration or composition. That licence is a material document, as it gives the history and character of the chapel. It is "to the rector and his successors:" the rector then, being the officiating minister, accounts for his occasionally performing these offices in the chapel; he might not be aware of the law: but such irregularities would not convey any privilege to the place when it went into other hands, nor would they affect the rights of future incumbents; and he might think it better to lay bodies in these vaults under the chapel [51] than that the proprietors should let them, if not consecrated, for other purposes.

The payment for the use of these vaults was received by the proprietors, and the fees for the funerals were accounted for to the rector (who was the officiating minister), as appears from the books. These funerals only continued for a period of three or four years, and from 1738-9 were discontinued for a great number of years. The exact reason why they were discontinued does not appear, but there was a contemporaneous opinion of Dr. Strahan, a learned civilian, "upon the power of burial in this chapel," which would tend to confirm the notion that the reason of discontinuance was the want of consecration; and the objection may have proceeded from the feelings of parties whose relations, connections, or friends had been buried there, rather than have been raised by the rector. The building is assessed to the parish rates: this, again, affords a further argument against consecration. However, to the dues arising from the different offices which have been performed in this chapel, the rector has a right, and a material injury might accrue to him from the transfer of those dues to other hands.

There is another point that is very important, though not much noticed in the argument. The entries of the funerals performed in this chapel used to be made by the parish minister in the parish register: (a)[2] but now Dr. Hillcoat sets up a right to keep separate registers of [52] baptisms, marriages, and funerals, quite independent of the parish minister and parish registers; and though there have been some separate registers, yet I see no authority for that course. Great public inconvenience might arise if chapels were allowed, without some authority lawfully given and publicly known, to set up separate registers: they could not be received in evidence; and the policy of the law and the convenience of the public require that parish registers shall be carefully kept and duly preserved, as authentic records, and that, except in the cases of chapels with chapelries annexed, "where the ceremonies of baptism, marriage, and burial have been usually and may according to law be performed," (a) there should be only one parish register, entitled to be considered as making faith, so that parties should know where to resort in order to make their search.

(a)[1] Dixon v. Kershaw, Ambler, 532, S. C. 2 Eden, 360. In Farnworth v. The Bishop of Chester, 4 B. & C. 568, Lord Tenterden (then Chief Justice Abbott) observes: "In Dixon v. Kershaw Lord Northington says 'that a mere arbitrary agreement, made even with the consent of the parson, patron, and ordinary, without a compensation to the incumbent of the mother church, will not be sufficient.' Perhaps that expression requires some qualification: and where nothing is taken from the income of the incumbent, the consent of the parson, patron, and ordinary, without a compensation, may be sufficient."

(a)[2] The registers of the banns and of the marriages solemnized in Queen Square Chapel were, from 1754 to July, 1819, distinct from the parochial registers, though they were kept in the same chest.

In my view then of the case up to 1819 this chapel, under the original licence of the bishop "to the rector and his successors," is a proprietary chapel, and nothing more, in which the rector and his curates performed the service: they did for some short time bury in the vaults, but that was discontinued after 1739 or 1740; they did frequently perform other offices—baptisms and marriages; and they administered the Lord's Supper; but this was [53] done wholly by the rector himself or his curate (which is the same thing), the rector receiving all the emoluments. These acts do not appear to alter the character and quality of this chapel; it was still a proprietary chapel, in which the rector was permitted by the bishop to perform divine service and religious offices, and the proprietors who received the pew rents paid him a salary for doing duty: but I am not aware of any chapel where the patrons or proprietors (forming themselves into a sort of joint-stock company) can appropriate a portion of the church dues.

The question then is, whether any thing has been subsequently done to vary the rights of the parties, or to alter the character of the chapel. It appears that in 1817 Dr. Hillcoat, by purchase, became the sole proprietor of this chapel, and in the same year Dr. Moysey became rector of Walcot: and as rector he had a right to do the duty of this chapel according to the original licence and the practice of his predecessors. In 1819 Dr. Moysey, on consultation with the bishop (and this is not unimportant), saw the irregularity of a part of that practice; he discontinued the occasional services of baptisms and marriages, and the use of separate registers at this chapel. No burials had for a long antecedent period been there performed. The chapel was then again put upon its legitimate footing, and matters were restored to a correct practice. The chapel was treated as a mere oratory in which divine service only could be performed; and payment was to be made to the officiating minister by a portion of [54] the pew rents; but there was nothing to break in upon the rector's rights.

In 1821 Dr. Moysey, as rector, nominated Dr. Hillcoat to be the officiating minister of this chapel; not to be the curate of the whole parish, but to officiate in this chapel in the manner the rector had determined it should be used. The nomination is exhibited and is material; for if any thing conveys a right it is this nomination, and no greater right can be supposed to have been conveyed to the officiating minister by the rector of the parish, even as against himself, than what the terms of this document specify. It appoints Dr. Hillcoat "to perform the office of officiating minister in Queen Square Chapel within the parish of Walcot, and to receive all stipends, salaries, and emoluments of and belonging, or heretofore usually paid and payable, to the officiating minister in the chapel aforesaid, by the proprietors of the said chapel."

Here is nothing that appoints Dr. Hillcoat to the exercise of all parochial rights, to the cure of souls, and to the occasional administration of offices to all the inhabitants, and in all parts of the parish. It is only to act "as officiating minister of that chapel;" and though it does not strictly prescribe his duties, it prescribes his fees. It only grants what was "paid by the proprietors." The words can only be so construed. It does not grant any thing which belonged to Dr. Moysey, as rector; neither the parochial duties, nor the surplice fees of this great and populous parish; nor the power of interfering and intromitting in all rights, [55] duties, and offices which had been committed to Dr. Moysey, as incumbent of the parish. Dr. Hillcoat was the curate of Dr. Moysey so far as respected the officiating in this chapel, but no further or otherwise. The character of a proprietary chapel and no other still remained to it; and in this chapel the rector might officiate under the original licence, or he might nominate an officiating minister to be licensed by the bishop.

(a) 52 Geo. 3, c. 46, s. 1. By s. 4 the certificates of baptisms or burials, performed in any other place than the parish church or church-yard, or chapel or chapel-yard of any chapelry providing its own registers, are directed to be transmitted to the minister of the parish or chapelry in order to be entered in the registry. And by 4 Geo. 4, c. 76, s. 5, the provisions relative to marriage registers are extended to certain chapels.

Dr. Hillcoat, on presenting his nomination, obtains the bishop's licence, which is one of the printed forms usually granted in that diocese to stipendiary curates; but the blank for the "stipend or salary" (those printed words being first struck through) is filled up with "all stipends, salaries and emoluments of and belonging, or heretofore usually paid and payable, to the officiating minister in the chapel aforesaid," omitting, which is rather extraordinary, the words in the nomination, "by the proprietor or proprietors of the said chapel." Whether this omission was accidental on the part of the officer who filled it up, or otherwise, does not appear; but to this instrument it must be remembered that the rector was no party; it was obtained by the nominee, and the rector is not bound by it: he had limited the emoluments to those "usually paid by the proprietors." Dr. Hillcoat had now united both characters; he would have the whole benefit of letting the pews, as well as of the stipend originally agreed upon. But even the licence itself, as it stands, will admit of the same construction: "All emoluments, usually [56] paid or payable to the officiating minister," could only be properly construed "paid to him in his character of officiating minister" (and as such he was entitled only to the 40l. per annum), and not those paid to him in his character of rector, the former officiating minister uniting both characters.

I am of opinion, therefore, that nothing was done by Dr. Moysey to give this proprietary chapel any new rights, nor the officiating minister any part of the incumbent's emoluments as rector, and that there is nothing to entitle Dr. Hillcoat, contrary to the rector's prohibition, either to restore or to continue those duties which belong exclusively to the rector, unless some composition can be shewn.

The alms, received during the reading of the offertory before the communion, are specially directed by the rubric to be collected "in a decent basin to be provided by the parish," which shews that the collection, wherever made, is a parochial matter, with which persons connected with a private chapel have no concern. Again, "After the divine service is ended, the money given at the offertory shall be disposed to such pious and charitable uses as the minister and churchwardens shall think fit: wherein, if they disagree, it shall be disposed of as the ordinary shall appoint." These directions, as to the "parish" and "the churchwardens," who are officers of the parish and not of the chapel, lead me also to construe the "minister" to mean the "minister of the parish;" and they shew that the rubric intended that all alms received at the commu-[57]-nion, as well at private chapels as in the parish church, should be at the disposal of the minister of the parish and of the churchwardens, and should not belong to the officiating minister nor to the proprietors of such chapel.

In any view that I am able to take of this case, I cannot consider that this chapel has acquired any legal rights at all encroaching upon the parochial rights which belong to the parochial incumbent, beyond those to which he has directly and specifically consented, viz. the performance of public service for the accommodation of those who take pews. To the emoluments arising from those pews Dr. Hillcoat, uniting both characters of officiating minister and sole proprietor, is entitled; but to them he is limited. Here is no district, no chapelry which connects any particular inhabitant with this chapel—here is nothing carved out of the parish nor out of the parochial rights of the rector. The general duties of the parish rest upon the rector; he is bound to perform them; and he is entitled to all the emoluments derived from them. It is the policy of the law to keep these duties entire and simple, unless they have been subdivided and parcelled out by competent authority. It is also the policy of the law that these public offices (the records of which are of considerable importance to the public in respect to the descent of property) should be performed in the parish church and be recorded in the parish or chapelry registers.

The suit has been amicably and liberally conducted; and though the articles, in the usual form, pray costs, and though in regularity [58] I am bound to allow them, yet I presume they will hardly be pressed.

The King's advocate stated that he could not consent to waive the costs, as Dr. Hillcoat might possibly appeal: if, however, the reverend gentleman would rest satisfied with the present decision, that part of the sentence decreeing costs would not be enforced.

[59] IN THE GOODS OF MARTHA STEADMAN. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 1st Session, 1828.—Administration de bonis non, limited to a certain legacy, granted to the representative of the substituted legatee, without citing the representative of the residuary legatee resident abroad, but by practice entitled to the general de bonis grant; no claim to this legacy having, since the death (in 1797) of the residuary legatee (also the executor and legatee for life), been made by his representative.

On motion.

The deceased died a spinster; and by her will bequeathed a legacy as follows:—"I give to Frances Coventry £300 three per cents., and after her death to Thomas Coventry, and after his decease to Mrs. Margaret Coventry, his sister, for ever." In 1764 Thomas Coventry, sole executor and residuary legatee (Frances died in the testatrix's lifetime), took probate, and received the dividends upon the above stock till 1797, when he died. The chain of executorship being now broken, and there being no personal representative to Martha Steadman—

The King's advocate moved for an administration (with the will annexed, of the goods left unadministered by Mr. Coventry) "limited to the sum of £300 three per cents. and the dividends accruing thereon since the death of the executor in 1797," to be granted to Thomas Darby Coventry, the administrator of Margaret, the substituted legatee in the said sum.

[60] Per Curiam. In order to reduce this sum of stock into possession, it is necessary to have a personal representative to the original testatrix. The person, by practice entitled to the general de bonis grant, is the representative of the residuary legatee; but he is abroad in Italy and is not expected to return for some years. He has no beneficial interest in the £300. Since the death of Thomas Coventry (in 1797), the residuary legatee, the executor, and the legatee for life of this sum, no claim has been asserted on behalf of his representative to this £300, and this non-claim for so many years strongly confirms that he has no interest therein. The present claimant is the representative of the substituted legatee who, having survived Mrs. Steadman, took a vested interest. Under these circumstances, I think the Court may safely make the grant, without the formality of citing Thomas Coventry's representative.

Motion granted.

IN THE GOODS OF ANNE MIDDLETON. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 1st Session, 1828.—Administration de bonis non, with a will annexed, granted to a representative interest entitled to seven 12ths of the residuary estate, without citing those having a direct interest as entitled in distribution.

[Applied, In the Goods of Kinchella, [1894] P. 264.]

On motion.

The deceased died a widow. By her will she bequeathed the residue of her personal property to her two daughters. One died in the lifetime [61] of the testatrix, who, therefore, as to a moiety of the residue, was dead intestate. In November, 1823, Mrs. Herbert, the other residuary legatee, took administration with her mother's will annexed; and upon her death, also a widow, her executors, as her representatives in the character of residuary legatee, now applied for an administration de bonis non of Anne Middleton.

The property, about £2500, was in a course of administration under the directions of the Court of Chancery; and in addition to the moiety, as residuary legatee under her mother's will, Mrs. Herbert was entitled to one-sixth of the remainder, in distribution under the intestacy. Of the other persons in distribution there were only two (the rest being minors, or out of England) to whom administration could be granted, the one entitled to a twelfth; the other to a fourth of one-twelfth.

Lushington moved for the administration.

Per Curiam. According to the general practice a party having a direct interest is preferred in such a grant to those entitled in a representative character; but, considering that Mrs. Herbert, at the time of Mrs. Middleton's death, was a next of kin, while the others in distribution were not, and that Mrs. Herbert's representatives are entitled to seven-twelfths of the residuary estate, I think the form of citing those who have a direct interest may be waived, and that the administration de bonis non may be granted to Mrs. Herbert's executors.

Motion granted.

[62] HARRIS AND WIGGINS v. MILBURN. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 1st Session, 1828.—An administration (limited to substantiate proceedings in Chancery)—which was decreed, on the next of kin being cited and after due inquiries for a will, and was called in by the executors of a will, not produced till long after—directed to be re-delivered out, and the executors, who might have taken a cæterorum probate, condemned in costs.

[Referred to, Hewson v. Shelley, [1914] 2 Ch. 25.]

On petition.

Addams prayed the Court to direct the limited administration to be re-delivered out, and to condemn the executors in costs.

Phillimore for the executors. We have a will. The decree taken out by the limited administration alleged an intestacy. It was not served upon those who have a right to the general grant, which is an invariable practice.

Per Curiam. In cases of limited administrations, parties entitled to the general grant may take out a cæterorum representation. As it was not known that a will was in existence, it was not possible, and therefore not necessary, to cite the executors. Why do they not now take out probate? How was the administrator to know there was a will, and that your parties were executors?

Phillimore. It appears in the solicitor's letter of September, 1827; at least I infer it from that letter.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The circumstances of this petition are as follow:—William Joynson died in March, 1827, and left two daughters, both married; he made a will of which he appointed Harris and Wiggins two of the executors, and made his daughters residuary legatees. A suit in Chancery by a gentleman, named Barr, against the deceased [63] abated by the death of the testator. From time to time search was made, on the part of Barr, if any will had been proved, or administration taken; but without success; and in October, 1827, Milburn, the solicitor of Barr, wrote letters to the husbands of the deceased's daughters, inquiring whether there was any will, or whether they would take out administration, and apprizing them of the necessity of obtaining a personal representative to the deceased's estate. Seven months had then elapsed since the deceased's death: in September, also, Milburn had written to the nephew and to the solicitor of the deceased making similar inquiries, and informing them of Mr. Barr's intended application to the Court: but to these letters no answers were returned; all possible pains were taken, and in consequence of no answers being returned, and no intelligence of a will being received, a decree with intimation was then extracted, calling upon the daughters to shew cause why a limited administration should not be granted to Milburn, the nominee of Barr. Every exertion was made, every possible diligence was used, as appears from the certificate endorsed upon the decree, to serve the decree on the next of kin; but the husband of one would not permit access to his wife, and would give no information as to the other sister, whose residence could not be discovered. There was, then, a manifest intention to defeat justice. In December, 1827, the limited administration was decreed. The proceedings in Chancery were revived; a heavy expence has been incurred; and if the limited administration be now revoked, all those proceedings will be void, and must be commenced [64] de novo. In Easter Term, 1828, the executors, who at last prove the will, call in this administration. On what ground? Because the decree was not personally served. But they do not deny the receipt of the letters; they do not deny that the husband refused access; they do not deny that the inconveniences, to which I have adverted, will result, and that the proceedings in Chancery must be commenced de novo. It is a mere colourable pretext. They were fully aware that a representation was necessary. The death took place nine months before the limited administration was decreed. It was the duty of some of these parties to have taken out probate, or administration, long before that time. This hanging back has much the appearance of fraud, especially under the circumstances. The excuse offered is that the property is small; but it is not asserted that the executors and the next of kin were not aware of the proceedings in which the representation was necessary: nor do they state any inconvenience which will result from the continuance of the limited administration. The regular course would have been to take probate cæterorum, and if there was any fear of collusion, the executors might have intervened in the Chancery suit. However, the usual mode is to take a cæterorum grant; but that is not even yet taken out, which, at all events, is great neglect and delay.

The whole bears the appearance of contrivance, and as I am of opinion that the limited administration was properly granted, I am bound to direct it to be re-delivered out, and to condemn the executors in costs.

Petition sustained.

[65] RAVENSCROFT v. HUNTER AND OTHERS. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 2nd Session, 1828.—Ink alterations in a will being carefully made and not improbably final, the Court will not, on the non-appearance, after personal service, of executors appointed—and of minor legatees materially benefited—thereby grant probate, in common form, of the paper as originally executed.—Alterations in ink (in the margin and body of a duplicate will) carefully made and conformable to long entertained and lately expressed intentions, held to contain the testator's final intentions and entitled to probate.

[Referred to, Francis v. Grover, 1845, 5 Hare, 47.]

On motion.

Edward Ravenscroft, late of Portland Place, died on the 19th of August, 1828. On the 18th of April, 1825, he executed his will in duplicate, and thereof appointed his wife, Mr. Wilkinson, and Mr. Moore (his solicitor) executors. The two parts of the will were sealed up in separate envelopes; the deceased kept one part; Mr. Moore the other; and in the early part of February, 1828, shortly after the latter's death, his partner, Mr. Lake, sent such duplicate to the testator at his request. In June the testator observed to Mr. Lake (as he had before) "that he should soon trouble him to prepare a codicil to his will, or to make an alteration therein." On the 7th of August the testator was taken ill; on that and the following day he grew worse; a fever which then attacked him, and which was accompanied with frequent aberrations of mind, wholly incapacitated him for business, till he died. At his death was found, locked up in the drawer of his writing table, one part of his will loose and unfolded; and in it were several alterations and marginal notes written by himself.(a)[1] For instance, in the appointment of executors, the name "Daniel [66] Moore" was erased; the names of Henry Lanoy Hunter and James Rivett Carnac being substituted by an interlineation; so in other parts of the will: and opposite to a bequest in favour of his daughter, Elizabeth Head, "to her separate use, and free from the control of her husband," the deceased had written in the margin, "Mrs. Head is now a widow, therefore this clause must be modelled accordingly." And in the margin, opposite to the residuary clause,(a)[2] which was crossed out with a pen, were these words: "One of the sons is dead, and the remaining three sons being otherwise provided for, I intend to bequeath one thousand pounds to each of the three sons, and the residue of my fortune not before herein disposed of, to be equally divided between the two daughters of my said late son George Ravenscroft. My meaning is, which I do not think is clearly expressed in this will, that none of these bequests to the three sons and two daughters of my late son George Ravenscroft shall take effect until after the death of my wife Emma Ravenscroft."

Of these five children, the grandsons (one only being of age) were in the East Indies; the grand-daughters (both minors) were living with and wholly under the care of Mrs. Ravenscroft, the widow of the deceased in this cause. The property consisted entirely of personalty.

A decree had issued, at the instance of Emma [67] Ravenscroft, widow, citing Mr. Hunter, Mr. Carnac, and also the deceased's grand-daughters "to propound the said will with the alterations made and written in one part thereof, if they or either of them should think it for their, his, or her benefit so to do, otherwise to shew cause why probate of the said will as originally executed, and with the residuary clause reinstated, should not be granted to the surviving executors therein named, or one of them."

This decree was personally served, and no appearance being given; Lushington moved for a probate to be granted, in common form, agreeably to the tenor of the decree.

Per Curiam. I think the executors ought to propound the paper as altered; for (a)[1] The duplicate was also found in the same room; but locked up in a drawer under a book case, and with the seal of the original envelope unbroken.

---

(a)[2] "The residue upon trust to divide the same into sixteen shares and pay the same to the four sons and two daughters of my late son, George Ravenscroft; viz. to each of the two daughters, at twenty-one or day of marriage, four sixteenth parts; and to each of the four sons, who shall attain the age of twenty-one, two sixteenth parts, with benefit of survivorship."

the daughters, who are minors, are giving up a great advantage, and may be misled by the process served upon them, and still more by a decree, into a belief that the Court was of opinion the alterations were invalid. Observing then that the change of the intentions and wishes of the deceased are carefully expressed, and on very reasonable grounds, I cannot feel justified in granting this motion.

An allegation was accordingly given in and admitted, pleading the facts already detailed; and, further, in some additional articles, "that in the beginning of July, 1828, the deceased, alluding to the appointments he had obtained for his grandsons in India, declared to his sister, 'he had now only to provide for the girls,' thereby meaning his grand-daughters, and the [68] residuary legatees in the will as altered; that he at other times expressed to her an intention of altering his will for the purpose of so benefiting them; saying, 'Be easy, be easy, all shall be right.'"

Upon the evidence of these facts the cause was argued by the King's advocate and Dodson for the will in its altered form; and by Lushington and Addams contrà.

Hilary Term, 4th Session, 1829.—Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This case lies within a narrow compass. The deceased died on the 19th of August, 1828, having made a will in duplicate on the 18th of April, 1825; of which he appointed several executors; among others, Mr. Moore, his solicitor. He left the residue to his wife for life, and after her death to his six grandchildren (the four sons and two daughters of a deceased son), but in different proportions; for to each of the daughters he gave four-sixteenths, and to each of the sons two-sixteenths. One grandson was dead, and the three others were sent out to India with appointments. Mr. Moore was dead. The deceased's daughter was become a widow. After these events, the deceased sent for the duplicate left at his solicitor's, and with his own hand in one duplicate erased the name of Mr. Moore, and in that respect corrected the paper in several places; he noticed in the margin his daughter's widowhood, and also in the margin wrote a different disposition which he wished to make of the residue.

From what appears on the face of the will at the time of the deceased's death, and from its being found in the drawer of his ordinary writing [69] table, in his study, and the other part in a drawer of his bookcase, there is reason to suppose that the duplicate altered was the one which he got from his solicitors. The question then is, whether the paper is to take effect with the alterations, or whether these are to be held as mere deliberative memoranda, on which he had not made up his mind, and which therefore are not to operate. From repeated declarations to his solicitor, Lake, it is clear he had long intended some alteration: from conversations with his sister, two or three months before his death, it is equally clear he intended to do something more for his grand-daughters: and in his last conversation with her, on the 29th of July, he talked of it prospectively as a thing to be done, not as then in progress. He was at that time in remarkably good health, though between seventy and eighty years of age, and was much engaged about the Devonport Dock Waterworks, of which company he was chairman. On the 7th of August he was to have gone to the play with his grand-daughters, but was prevented by illness; and on the 8th, though ill, he was in his usual sitting-room, where the will was found after his decease. On the next day he was so much worse, and so feverish, that he could hardly speak, and he grew worse till his death.

It is pleaded that these alterations were made before the 7th of August, but there is nothing in the evidence to fix the time. It is clear that on the 29th of July they were not made. Now, I do not think it at all improbable that the deceased wrote these marginal directions and the alterations in the body when ill on the 8th, or [70] on the evening before: if so, the completion was prevented by the act of God. Here, then, we have an alteration intended in favour of his grand-daughters: it was long decided on, and meant to be done with his solicitor's assistance; but the delay is pretty satisfactorily accounted for from his being in very good health, and occupied with collateral matters.

What, then, is the construction of the paper itself? The alterations might be in some degree deliberative—as to the form, for the testator might intend to effect his purpose more regularly by a codicil, and through an attorney—but not as to the disposition, since upon that he had made up his mind, and considered, meant, and thought the paper would operate as now altered: if he had not so thought, he would not have taken so much pains in altering, even to the end, the names of the executors for that would not have been necessary as mere directions or instructions. On the variations in the benefits it may be inferred that he had definitively resolved; for the changes are written in ink carefully, and not as if on a casual reading over; and the former disposition of the residue is struck through as if meant to be finally altered. He always intended the grand-daughters to have double portions, and he now decided to give them a still larger share, apprehending that the grandsons were provided for, for so he has expressly written, though the extent of that provision does not appear. This departure from the original disposition being then no hasty, transient thought, but long intended, and now thus written, probably as late as the 8th, I [71] am satisfied was his fixed and final intention. Being written on the margin of a formal, executed will, with an alteration not merely directory in the body of it, it bears a very different character from alterations written on a separate loose piece of paper, or in pencil. It is rather to be considered as an act done and intended to take effect, in case from accident or otherwise the testator was prevented from having a formal codicil prepared. In this view, coupled also with the probability that it was written on the very day he was taken ill (the further progress and formal completion of the act being in that case prevented by his increasing illness and by the act of God), I am of opinion that by pronouncing for the will as altered, that is, that the grand-daughters should take the residue with the exception of 1000l. to each of the grandsons, the Court will be giving effect to the real intentions and last will of the deceased, without violating or breaking in upon any established principles that guide this Court.

The parties have altogether conducted the matter very honourably, and with proper delicacy towards the absent grandsons: they have brought the case fully and fairly before the Court, to whose judgment it was necessarily submitted, and therefore they are entitled to their costs out of the estate.

[72] TYRELL v. JENNER, AND v. T. J. AND MARY SPITTY, BY THEIR GUARDIAN. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 2nd Session, 1828.—The Court will not, when a competent party is opposing a will, stay the admission of the executors' allegation propounding such will, till the appointment of a committee of a lunatic next of kin be confirmed, more especially such committee being already a party to the suit as curator of other next of kin.

On motion.

This was a cause of proving, in solemn form of law, the last will and testament of the Rev. John Jenner, D.D., late of Billericay, Essex; promoted by Sir John Tyrell, Bart., the sole executor, against John Tyrell Jenner, the only child, and Thomas Jenner Spitty, and Mary Spitty, respectively minors, the grandchildren of the deceased.

An allegation, propounding the will, had been brought in; and on behalf of the next of kin Lushington now applied that its admission might stand over, under circumstances detailed by the Court.

Per Curiam. The will in this case is propounded by the executor against John Tyrell Jenner, the son of the deceased, and against two grandchildren, by a deceased daughter, who appear by Thomas Spitty, their father and guardian. The allegation is dated on the fourth session of last Trinity Term, and an affidavit was then exhibited to the effect that proceedings had been instituted in Chancery for the purpose of obtaining a commission of lunacy as to the son, and on that account it was prayed that the allegation might stand over. That application was granted, and now a further very long affidavit has been [73] brought in, detailing the proceedings in Chancery, and stating that Thomas Spitty, though appointed committee, has not yet given security, and that therefore the appointment has not been confirmed; but that is no reason to postpone the admission of this allegation, for there is a party competent to oppose the will—Thomas Spitty, the curator and guardian to the children of a deceased daughter; and it is not necessary to delay the cause till he can appear also in the character of committee of the lunatic. The solicitor supposes, because the Court of Chancery, in arranging trusts, may require all parties interested, and in all characters, to be before it, that the same rule must prevail here; but that is not so. The executor has a right to go on and propound the paper; otherwise his witnesses might die. If there is any risk from a want of appearance on behalf of the lunatic, it is the risk of the executor alone; but this want of appearance is a mere pretext:

there are parties competent to oppose, and it so happens that the very same person who is now before the Court, opposing the paper, is the person appointed to be the committee of the lunatic; so that on the ground of collusion there cannot by any possibility be an objection to the executors going on.

Experiments of this nature, made on a fancied analogy of the principles of proceedings in this Court with those of other Courts, must be watched narrowly, as they may lead to a very inconvenient practice. The present affidavit, instead of furnishing grounds for delay, furnishes a reason for allowing the executor to proceed; for in July it did not appear that Spitty was the committee; but this affidavit [74] proves that his appointment to that office only wants a formal confirmation, and that then he will unite in his own person the double character of committee of the lunatic and curator of the minors; and, in that latter character, as I have already said, he is a party to the cause.

The introduction of the affidavit of the solicitor is so improper that I shall reserve the question as to the costs of the application, and also as to the propriety of allowing an affidavit in reply, to be filed.

On the third session the allegation was admitted, unopposed.

MITCHELL v. MITCHELL. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 3rd Session, 1828.—The indorsement "Heads of Will" on a paper fairly written, signed, and dated, lets in parol evidence of intention; but the primâ facie inference rather is, that such paper was intended to operate, if no more formal instrument were drawn up. An allegation propounding such a paper, with alterations made from time to time, adapting it to the deceased's circumstances and pleading facts inferring adherence, admitted to proof: but, on the parol evidence, the paper pronounced against.

On admission of an allegation.

William Mitchell died on the 2nd of September, 1828. After his death was found locked up in a private drawer of his writing desk a testamentary paper, in his own hand-writing, dated the 29th of June, 1821, and near to it a statement of his property as it stood in 1827. On behalf of two of the executors this testamentary schedule was now propounded, in an allegation, as his last will and testament.

Lushington in support.

Phillimore contrà.

[75] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The real question is, whether the deceased did mean and intend that this paper should operate. It is all fairly written, though there are several alterations made at different times; it is signed and dated by him on the 29th of June, 1821, and contains a complete and very natural disposition: for it appears that he left a wife and six children—all minors; and that his wife had a separate property.(a) If the paper had remained in its original state and without endorsement, it would have been entitled to probate, in common form, on a mere affidavit of handwriting: and parol evidence would not have been admissible. Even though endorsed "Heads for the will of William Mitchell," yet being fairly written, signed, and dated, the primâ facie inference would rather have been, that he intended it to operate in case no more formal instrument were drawn up, the whole effect of the endorsement, under the authority of the case of Mathews v. Warner (4 Ves. jun. 186)—a most highly important and highly proper decision—being, that it leaves the case open to the admission of parol evidence. That decision was in conformity with the practice of these Courts in earlier cases, and with the judgments of Sir George Hay in the case of Habberfield v. Browning (4 Ves. jun. 200, n.); and of Dr. Calvert in Cobbold v. Baas (ibid.). The sentences however of the Prerogative Court in those [76] cases, admitting parol evidence, were, on appeal, both reversed, the Delegates holding that the papers, being wills both of real and personal estate, were, reddendo singula singulis, perfect dispositions of personalty, and therefore good wills; and that parol evidence was inadmissible. Though the latter case was determined by a commission consisting only of two common law Judges and one civilian, these Courts, in submission to two solemn decisions of the superior Court, felt themselves bound, contrary to their former invariable practice, to reject parol evidence in similar cases.

(a) The deceased directed the residue of his property to be equally divided among his children, except that he gave a double share to his eldest son.

But at length the law was correctly ascertained, and the original doctrine of these Courts was restored by the conclusion at which the Commission of Review in Mathews v. Warner arrived: and in that case it clearly resulted from the parol evidence that the deceased did not intend the paper to operate. The whole effect then of that case is, that the endorsement opens the paper to a question of intention; and lets in parol evidence.

If Mr. Mitchell had died the day after he wrote this paper, no doubt can be entertained but that it would operate. It appears however that, though originally written in 1821, he had from time to time made certain alterations in it, adapting it to the change of his circumstances, particularly on the death of his uncle in 1823: these alterations may possibly operate as so many recognitions, and shew that he still acknowledged it in its original character, namely, to operate if he made no more formal will.

In the latter end of March of the present year it is pleaded that one of the deceased's brothers [77] consulted with him on making his own will; and the deceased, in the course of a confidential communication with him, entered into the particulars of his will, particularly as to what he had left his wife and as to taking away from her the guardianship of his children. It has been argued that as the clause respecting the guardianship cannot take effect, because the paper is not attested according to the exigencies of the statute (12 Car. 2, c. 24, s. 8), it must therefore be presumed that the deceased did not consider it as operative: but I do not think that that is necessarily to be inferred; for the law requiring two witnesses to render such an appointment by will effectual is not by any means so generally known as that which renders essential the formal attestation to a will disposing of realty. On the contrary, this conversation with his brother may be a proof of adherence and of intention that this instrument should operate.

In July the deceased went to Worthing: he was not then in good health; he grew gradually worse, but still he shewed no anxiety about his affairs. An inference from this negative conduct might be drawn that he considered his affairs settled; for, by writing this paper and by the subsequent alterations, having shewn a fixed and decided intention to die testate, his silence might furnish an argument that he expected this document would carry his wishes into effect.

Under all these circumstances it is fit that this case should go to proof.

Another circumstance now mentioned is, that [78] the freehold estate devolved to the house of trade, and that the deceased took it as a tenant in common with the other partners: he possibly then never considered it otherwise than as part of his stock in trade: and though it is true that for a devise of land in Jamaica the same formalities are required as in the case of real property in England, yet the deceased may not have regarded this property as subject to such provisions.

The last article had better be reformed;(a) by the insertion of these facts respecting the freehold property; and, on that being done, I shall admit the allegation.

On the fourth session of Hilary Term the cause came on for hearing, when the Court was of opinion that, the evidence bearing rather against the intention that the paper should operate, the Court would not be justified in granting probate; and therefore pronounced that the deceased was dead intestate.

[79] IN THE GOODS OF THOMAS DAVIES. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 4th Session, 1828.—The 38 G. 3, c. 87, only authorizes the grant of a limited administration durante absentiâ of the executor when there are proceedings depending in Chancery.

On motion.

The deceased of his will appointed Joseph Nourse and John Charlton executors, who, on the 2d of July, 1795, took probate. Nourse survived his co-executor, and upon his death his sons Joseph and Henry proved their father's will in 1802, as (a) The fifth article, as reformed, pleaded: "That the deceased, at his death, was possessed of a share of a real estate in Jamaica, which share was of the supposed value of £16,000, and came to the deceased in December, 1826, as a partner in a mercantile firm." It then pleaded the amount of his personal property, stating the share each child respectively would take under the paper propounded and under an intestacy, and that, in either case, the widow would be entitled to nearly the same benefit.

executors thereof. Joseph was since dead, and Henry was resident at the Cape of Good Hope, and had no agent in this country.

Mr. Davies died possessed of a leasehold house and premises in New Bond Street, held under the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of London for forty-one years, renewable every fourteen; this lease, the only part of his property that remained unadministered, was now renewable, but this renewal could not be effected without a personal representative to him.

Lushington moved for a grant of administration to Topham Davies (the son, surviving residuary legatee of Thomas, and tenant for life of the house and premises in Bond Street), limited to his being made a party to a renewal of the lease from the city of London. He submitted that the case was within the spirit of the 38 Geo. 3, c. 87, by which power was given to the Ecclesiastical Court (wherever an executor had left the kingdom after he had obtained probate) sufficient to authorize the grant of the present motion.

[80] Per Curiam. This case is under circumstances of hardship; but how can the Court grant this application? The executor of the executor is living at the Cape of Good Hope it is true; but still he is a full and complete representative. Mr. Simeon's act does not apply to the present case; it applies only when there are proceedings depending in Chancery: but it is to be lamented that this statute was not made more extensive; for at present there certainly is a defect in the law and in the power of these Courts. There is, however, another remedy, viz. a power of attorney from the executor at the Cape. Whenever this Court exercises its discretion in making a grant durante absentiâ, it is on the ground that there is no legal representative.

I must reject the present application.

Motion refused.

IN THE GOODS OF ELIZABETH CROSLEY. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 4th Session, 1828.—Of wills of the same date, that in the testatrix's possession and to which she last added codicils is entitled to probate, together with the codicils found therewith, and unrevoked codicils found with the other will.

On motion.

The deceased, a widow, died on the 31st of August, 1827. On the 25th of September probate of her will and eight codicils was taken by the executors. The will was dated in 1815, and the codicils at different times between January, 1820, and January, 1826. In April, 1826, a sealed packet, endorsed (but not in her hand-writing) "the will and two codicils of Mrs. E. Crosley," in the care of Messrs. Child and [81] Co., was discovered; it contained a will of the deceased, of the same date as the one proved, and also two codicils; one, dated July, 1816, was annexed to the will by a seal; the other, dated August, 1817, was separate, but enclosed and thus endorsed, "The last and only codicil to my last will." A legacy in this latter codicil was repeated in one dated 1820, and of which probate had been taken.

The residuary legatees in remainder were minors.

Lushington, upon affidavits, moved the Court for directions in respect to these papers.

Per Curiam. These two wills were executed on the same day, and attested by the same witnesses; they are both engrossed, and are duplicates with some slight variations: she keeps one by her, and from time to time adds codicils to it. She says that her will is in an iron casket; and there were found the will, which has been proved, and eight codicils. If any doubt is entertained which is her will, I think this which was in her own possession and to which she added several codicils, some in her own handwriting, must be so considered, but probate must also be taken of the other two codicils, as there is nothing to revoke them.

Probate of codicils decreed.

[82] IN THE GOODS OF GEORGE HULME. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 4th Session, 1828.—Original papers brought into the registry by A., in a suit between A. and B. as to the will of C., cannot be delivered out to D., on an affidavit of D.'s attorney that D., as heir at law of C., was in possession of certain premises, and that these papers were muniments of title thereto.

On motion.

George Hulme died in December, 1813. Upon his death two causes were carried on in the Prerogative Court as to the right of administration to his estate. The suits had long been terminated; and this was an application for certain books and letters annexed to the pleadings and proceedings in the two causes, and now remaining in the registry, to be delivered out (upon their being first duly registered) to Elizabeth Duncalf, spinster, heir at law of the deceased.

Lushington moved on the affidavit of Miss Duncalf's solicitor, stating, "That in July, 1828, actions of ejectment were brought on her behalf to recover possession of two freehold houses of which the deceased died seized; that the verdicts established her claim to the premises as heir at law; and that she was now in quiet possession of them, and that the title deeds had been delivered up for her use; that the books and letters (now applied for) were important documents in aid of her title, and were produced in evidence on the ejectments: that they were muniments of title, and belonging to the title deeds of these houses."

Per Curiam. The same benefit will result to the party, if office copies of these papers are delivered to her and the originals remain in the registry; for [83] they may be of importance to some other person who may set up an adverse title; and there is no risk that they will be delivered out to any one else, so as to be lost to the heir at law.

Motion refused.

IN THE GOODS OF AGNES BLAGRAVE. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, By-Day, 1828.—Administration to A. granted to the son of B., the brother and sole next of kin; those entitled in distribution to A., and the widow, sole executrix and residuary legatee of B., having renounced.

On motion.

The deceased died in June, 1824, a spinster and intestate leaving John Blagrave her brother and only next of kin who was also dead; and of his will, Frances Blagrave his widow, sole executrix and universal legatee, had taken probate.

A proxy was now exhibited from the widow, and also from the nephews and nieces (children of a deceased brother) of Agnes Blagrave, whereby they severally renounced the administration of her effects.

No administration had yet been taken out.

The King's advocate, referring to the case of The Goods of Mary Keene (vol. i. p. 692), moved for administration of the effects of Agnes Blagrave to be granted to the son of John and Frances Blagrave.

Per Curiam. Though the party has not a direct interest, he is acting under a person entitled to a moiety of the property.

Motion granted.

[84] MARSH v. TYRRELL AND HARDING.(a) Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, By-Day, 1828.—A feme covert having, under certain powers, made a will and codicil in February, 1818 (eight months after marriage), by which, after making provision for her husband and leaving sundry legacies, she bequeathed the bulk of her fortune to and appointed executors strangers in blood; such disposition (except the provision for the husband) being similar to a will in 1816; made a will on the 9th of March, 1827, and a codicil thereto on the 21st of April (she dying on the 8th of May), 1827, which papers, except legacies to three servants and rings to three friends, left all her property to her husband, and appointed executors, him and a total stranger: the Court holding that the latter papers were obtained by the husband's undue influence, when her faculties were much impaired, pronounced for the will and codicil of 1818, and condemned the husband (who though he denied the validity of the powers and nominally prayed an intestacy, was the real party setting up the latter papers) in the costs of the executors of the will of 1818.—Where there is a great change of disposition and a total departure from former testamentary intentions long adhered to, it is material to examine the probability of the change, especially if at the time of making the latter disposition the capacity is doubtful, still more if the person in whose favour the change is made, possessing great influence and authority, originates and conducts the whole transaction.—A person who can understand and answer rationally questions may still not be capable of making a will for all purposes. The rule of law is, that the competency of the mind must be judged of by the nature of the act to be done, and from a consideration of all the circumstances of the case.

[Reversed by consent, 3 Hagg. Ecc. 471.]

Lushington and Nicholl for Mr. Tyrrell.

Phillimore for Mr. Harding.

The King's advocate and Addams contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This cause was very ably and fully argued in the former part of this term, and the material parts of the evidence were then stated and discussed: it is not therefore necessary to recite in detail much of the depositions. The grounds of the decision must be looked for rather in the conduct of the parties and in the documents than in the oral evidence. The necessary inferences to be drawn from that conduct will afford a solid and safe basis for the judgment of the Court; where the oral evidence harmonizes with those inferences a moral conviction rightly follows, but the depositions, where they are at variance with the conduct of the parties and with the res gestæ, are less to be relied upon.

Some parts of this case afford a strong illus-[85]-tration of these remarks, and induce me to consider with more than usual attention the conduct of the several actors in the matters which are the subject of inquiry.

The question arises on the testamentary acts of a married woman; and for the purpose of deciding it the Court must assume that she had a right to make a will, since the consideration of the validity of the deed, under which the power is asserted, belongs to the jurisdiction of another Court.

The alleged testatrix, Mrs. Sophia Harding, wife of John Harding of York Place, Walworth, died on the 8th of May, 1827, and left property amounting to 20,000l. or 25,000l., exclusive of a sum of 10,000l. due to her from the estate of Marsh and Son. Two wills are propounded. The first, dated on the 28th February, 1818, with a codicil of the same date, by Mr. Arthur Cuthbert Marsh, one of the executors and a joint residuary legatee. The other, dated on the 9th of March, 1827, with a codicil of the 21st of April, 1827, by Mr. John Tyrrell, one of the executors. Of this latter will Mr. Harding, the husband, is also an executor, and is a party in the suit; appearing, however, separately, for the purpose of reserving to himself the right of questioning the deeds under which these wills were made: not opposing the factum of this latter will, for in truth he is substantially the party setting it up. The real question is, upon the factum of this latter will, for to the validity of the former will no serious objection has been, or can be, taken; though some insinuations have been thrown out against the conduct and [86] supposed influence of the parties benefited under it.

The general substance of the two wills is to the following effect:—By the former will the dividends on 5000l. navy five per cents. are given to the husband for life, and then the stock itself is bequeathed to his eldest son. Her leasehold house and furniture at Walworth are given to her husband absolutely, and several remembrances to friends, and legacies to servants are also bequeathed by it; but the bulk, the residue, is left to the children of Mr. William Marsh, "by Amelia Marsh his first wife, formerly Amelia Cuthbert, deceased." William Marsh, Arthur Cuthbert Marsh, and Richard Creed are appointed executors, and to each of them is given a legacy of 1000l., "as a compensation for their trouble." It is sufficient at present to state the substance thus generally, though it may be necessary hereafter to examine some of the contents more in detail. Here, then, is a provision for, and benefit to, the husband and to his eldest son, but the principal objects of her bounty are the children of Amelia Marsh, formerly Cuthbert. No other children of William Marsh are mentioned: and the two Messrs. Marsh, and Mr. Creed, are selected as her confidential exècutors and trustees.

The contents of the latter will, of the 9th of March, 1827, are more brief, for by it every thing is left to the husband, Mr. Harding, except legacies to three servants of 300l. each; and the codicil of the 21st of April bequeaths only rings to three ladies, sisters, two of whom were dead; but it contains a clause confirming the [87] will. Here then is a great change of disposition: the character and objects of the former will are totally abandoned.

In inquiring then into the factum of the latter will it becomes material to examine the probability of this great change of intention, and it becomes the more necessary to examine that probability, if at the time of making the disposition the capacity was in any degree weakened or doubtful; still more if the husband, in whose favour this great change is made, and who, from the relation in which he stands to the deceased, must almost necessarily have great influence and authority, should be the person originating and conducting the whole business of the new will. To examine, then, the probability of this change, it may be proper to consider the grounds and circumstances of making the first will; if that were made upon hasty, capricious, temporary considerations, the departure from it becomes less improbable; but if made under motives long existing, and quite naturally inducing it, the adherence to it will be the more strongly presumed, and the circumstances to account for the complete revolution in her intentions will be required to be more forcible.

The deceased was, originally, Miss Sophia Smyth; and derived the principal part of her property from a brother, William Smyth, who about the year 1779 was in the East Indies, and succeeded Mr. Cuthbert as naval store-keeper and agent victualler of the fleet in India under Sir Edward Hughes. There is no proof that Smyth acquired that situation though the recommendation of Mr. Marsh, who was navy agent to Mr. Cuthbert; but it is admitted, in [88] Harding's answers to the second article, "that William Smyth may have professed and felt a great regard for Mr. Cuthbert," and he had also a great regard for and confidence in Mr. Marsh, for upon his death in 1784 he by will appointed Mr. Marsh his executor and trustee, and under that will the deceased and her sister, as joint residuary legatees, became entitled to a considerable part of William Smyth's fortune.

In 1785 Mr. Marsh married Miss Amelia Cuthbert, daughter of Mr. Cuthbert, and she died in 1793, leaving four children, two sons and two daughters. Mr. Marsh married again, and had a family by his second wife. After the death of the first wife, Mrs. Amelia Marsh, the friend of the deceased, it was not likely that any great intimacy would be maintained between the deceased and Mr. Marsh; but there is no appearance of her having at any time withdrawn her confidence in him, still less her regard for the children of his first wife. Messrs. Marsh and Creed continued her agents, and had the management of her property as her friends and the executors of her brother.

In 1813 the deceased's sister, Miss Elizabeth Smyth, died intestate, and her joint share of her brother's fortune devolved upon Miss Sophia Smyth, the testatrix. There is no proof that previous to the death of the sister the deceased had made any will, and probably she had not, as the sister died intestate; but she now was left alone; her father and mother were dead, her sister was dead, and she had no known relation. She was about fifty years of age, past the hopes of having a family of her own; she had a large fortune, and it was not unnatural that she should [89] wish to make a settlement of it. It was not unnatural, it was highly probable, that the children of Mrs. Amelia Marsh, formerly Miss Cuthbert, should be adopted as the principal objects of her bounty; there were no persons presenting themselves likely to stand in competition with them in the deceased's affection and regard. It was not improbable, nor unwise, that she should vest her property in trustees to her separate use, and at her own disposal in case of coverture. She might at her time of life, and with her large fortune, suspect herself, and wish to guard against her own imprudence, lest she should fall a sacrifice to the designs of some artful person, who, for the sake of her fortune, might inveigle her into marriage. She might do this without having any person specially in view, or without being even solicited by any individual: or she might do so because she was addressed by some particular person, and suspected his motives and designs. Accordingly, in 1816, there were several acts done for the arrangement of her property, vesting it in trustees for her separate use, and making a disposition of it by will, which, being revocable, she might at all times alter upon any change of circumstances.

By the deed of the 20th of February, 1816, recited in a subsequent deed, 10,000l. were left in Marsh's hands as executor of William Smyth, to answer all outstanding demands on Marsh in that character. The rest of the property was invested in the funds. This was no extraordinary security, considering that William Smyth was a public accountant, having been naval store-keeper and agent victualler to the fleet in the East Indies. In such transactions, [90] in a distant part of the globe, it is hardly possible to say when the representatives of public accountants are quite safe from demands; but, in the present arrangement, there was nothing particularly advantageous beyond mere indemnity, for the principal was to remain for ten years, and then it, or what then remained of it, was to be transferred to Miss Smyth or her representatives, and in the mean time interest at four per cent. was to be paid to her: which, considering the war was over, and there was a prospect of a very permanent and firm peace, was a fair interest and not disadvantageous to Miss Smyth; for the credit of Mr. Marsh, at that time, stood quite unsuspected.

On the 8th of March, 1816, all the other property of the deceased, both as surviving residuary legatee of her brother and as administratrix and sole next of kin of her sister, having been invested in the public funds in the joint names of William Marsh, Arthur Cuthbert Marsh, and Richard Creed, a deed or declaration of trust was executed, by which this funded property was held in trust to the separate use of Miss Sophia Smyth, subject to her disposal by will at her death, notwithstanding any future coverture, and as if she continued a feme sole; "independently of any husband who is not to intermeddle therewith, nor is the property, or the dividends, to be liable to his control, debts or interference." The 10,000l. at the end of ten years were to be invested in the like trusts, with an additional power of disposal by deed in her lifetime. If Miss Sophia Smyth made no disposition of the property, either by deed or will, it was to go according to the statute of [91] distributions, as if she had died intestate and unmarried. This is the substance of the deed of the 8th of March, 1816.

On the 12th of March, 1816, she executed a further deed, irrevocably giving the 10,000l. at her death to Mr. Marsh; but there was perhaps nothing very extraordinary or improvident in this gift. He had had the whole trouble of winding up and managing the concerns of her brother, her sister, and herself; he was to have the additional trouble of this trust; he was married again, and had a second family: her fortune still remaining at her own disposal was ample. It was not astonishing that she should consider it but a reasonable remuneration to Mr. Marsh to secure to him this 10,000l. at her death, reserving the interest of it for her life.

Shortly after this she made her will, which probably was in preparation at the time the deed of gift was executed. This will was executed on the 23d March, 1816, and its contents are material. It directs that she shall be buried at Highgate, in the vault with her sister. It appoints as her three executors and trustees, William Marsh, Arthur Cuthbert Marsh, and Richard Creed, and leaves them as a compensation for their trouble 1000l. each. To Edward Rigden, if in her service at her death, it gives 500l.; if not, 200l.: to Mary Apostles, if in her service, the same; if not, 100l.; also her wearing apparel, and 2s. 6d. a week to take care of her dog: to Mary George, the cook, if in her service, 50l., and to the coachman, 20l., and her carriage, harness and horses. Rigden and Apostles are to live in her house for three months, and to be [92] paid a guinea a week as board wages; and her wines and liquors are to be divided equally between them. These are the provisions for the servants, and she then proceeds to give remembrances to her friends. To Charlotte Hillyer is left a diamond ring with her late sister's hair; to Sybilla and Sarah Hillyer, each diamond ear-rings: to the three Misses Binstead, an annuity of 100l. with benefit of survivorship: to Mrs. Isherwood, for a ring, 20l.: to Mrs. Rogers, for a ring, 21l.: to Mr. Creed, her house and furniture at Walworth, but with a stipulation that there shall be no auction on the premises. It is her "express wish" that the family paintings should be burnt, or otherwise destroyed. The miniatures of her brother and sister are to be put in her coffin and interred with her remains. The residue of her property is given to the children of William Marsh, by Amelia Marsh, his first wife, formerly Amelia Cuthbert, spinster, deceased, to be divided equally between them; and if only one of them be living at her death, then to that one.

This will has features strongly marking the mind, character, and testamentary intentions of the testatrix: here are friends recollected with tokens of remembrance, some with pecuniary benefits: here are old servants provided for according to their stations and length of service: here is her confidence continued to her brother's executors—Messrs. Marsh and Creed—one of the former, the husband of her late friend Mrs. Amelia Marsh: but the great objects of her bounty are the children of that friend, Mrs. Amelia Marsh; to these the bulk of her fortune is given in exclusion of Mr. Marsh's family by a second wife. [93] On the 26th of March, 1816, she made a codicil, merely giving an additional 50l. to her servant Rigden, and 100l. to her solicitor, Martelli. It is observable that in this will no notice whatever is taken of Mr. Harding; and although, in three months afterwards, he procured a marriage licence, yet there is no proof that she acknowledged him as a friend when this will was made still less that he at that time, nor in the month of June, was received as an accepted lover, nor that the marriage was delayed by her ill health. If she was in ill health, it is more probable that she should make her will while she remained a spinster, than enter into a matrimonial engagement.

A twelvemonth afterwards, however, she did accept and marry Mr. Harding; but not with any peculiar marks of confidence or affection; for, a few days only before the marriage, she executed another deed of trust settling the house and furniture, and some other property at Walworth, to her own separate use; in the same manner as she had the year before settled the funded property. Whether this deed, executed just before marriage, is or is not valid, may depend upon circumstances: but the fact is, that the other deed of March, 1816, is furnished by Harding himself, as the foundation of the will made by his own solicitor in his favour; and is pleaded by Mr. John Tyrrell, Harding's co-executor, so nominated by Harding himself, and who, it is apparent, merely lends his name in this cause. Thus then Mr. Tyrrell, though he does not admit the validity of the deed of June, 1817, sets up the validity of the deed of 1816 as the very groundwork of the will [94] which he propounds; but Mr. Harding, though obtaining, and sworn executor to, that will, now denies the validity of both deeds and all wills made under them. That is the shape the case assumes.

In June, 1817, Harding became the husband of the deceased, he being about sixty-three years of age, with a family by a former wife; she a spinster about fifty-one. On the 28th of February, 1818, about eight months after the marriage, the deceased made a new will, the will propounded by Mr. Arthur Cuthbert Marsh. It was very natural and proper that she should now make a provision out of her ample fortune for the husband to whom she had united herself. It was not made in the first moon; eight months had elapsed since the marriage; she could therefore form a fair estimate of his qualities, his society, his real affection, and his just claims. She accordingly applied to Mr. Delmar, the successor of Mr. Martelli, who had prepared the former will of 1816, but who had since died; and there is not the least ground to suspect that this was not her own free, voluntary, uninfluenced act. Mr. Delmar's account of her first visit is as follows:—

"On the 21st of February, 1818 (deposing from his books), the deceased called upon him in Norfolk Street; she came in her carriage, and was introduced to deponent by a clerk who had been many years with Mr. Martelli: she told deponent 'she wished to make an alteration in her will:' deponent referred to her papers, and took out the draft of the former will: he went through it, item by item, with the deceased: she specified the alter-[95]-ations she wished, and deponent noted most of them in the margin. He afterwards directed a clerk to copy the draft embodying the pencil alterations; deponent revised the same, and after the draft had been settled by a conveyancer, deponent had two copies made ready for execution. On the 28th of February (again deposing from his books) deceased called again upon deponent, when he read over, or explained the contents of, one of the duplicate copies of the will, item by item, to the deceased, and she signified her approbation as he proceeded, but he does not remember in what terms."

The will being thus executed in duplicate, each part was sealed up and indorsed; one part was deposited at the office of her agents and trustees, Messrs. Marsh, in a box in which her other deeds and papers were deposited, and in which it was found at her death: and the indorsement on the envelope expressly states, "Duplicates in Mrs. Harding's possession." In conformity with this the other packet was delivered to herself, was retained by her for several years, was then delivered for safe custody to her confidential servant, Mary Apostles, since dead, who delivered it over, shortly before her death, to a friend of hers, Mr. Easton, in whose custody it remained unopened till after the commencement of the present suit.

Such being the history of the will propounded by Mr. Arthur Cuthbert Marsh, in the making of which there is not the slightest appearance of Mr. Marsh's interference, or even of his being privy to its contents, it becomes material to con-[96]-sider what alterations were by it made in the will of 1816. There is a provision made for the husband, £5000 navy five per cents., part of the trust stock, are bequeathed to him for life, and then to his eldest son. The house, furniture, plate, &c. at Walworth, before given to Mr. Creed, are now given to Mr. Harding; there is a trinket given to his eldest son's wife; the other trinkets are given as before, and the rest of her trinkets to the eldest Miss Marsh: but all the peculiar features of the will remain; she is to be buried at Highgate with her sister; memorials are given to various friends, legacies to servants, an annuity of £100 to the three Misses Binstead, and to the survivor; the pictures are to be destroyed; the miniatures to be buried with her; all is nearly verbatim as in the former will; but, above all, the same confidence is given to her executors, with the same legacy for their trouble; her husband is not even one of her executors; and what is still more important, the bulk of her fortune is still given to the children of Mrs. Amelia Marsh. Looking then to the considerations on which this disposition was originally made; looking to the change which had taken place by the marriage, the estimate of and provision for it thus fixed; looking to the full confirmation thus given, after an interval of two years, and after the intervening marriage, even to the peculiarities of the will and to all the testamentary intentions of the deceased, it is difficult to suppose a case in which adherence to the disposition is more strongly to be inferred and presumed.

The next subject for consideration and examin-[97]-ation are the circumstances, subsequent to this will of 1818, either inferring the continued adherence to the will, or departure from it.

To shew adherence in the first place there is time. No testamentary act is suggested to have been done for nine years, till Harding's will of March, 1827, which was set about the latter end of February, 1827: but there are intermediate circumstances in aid of the proof of adherence. In 1823 the deceased had a severe paralytic attack, which caused a state of great bodily infirmity, whatever might be its effect on her mind. It was natural that such an event should have induced the deceased to have made an alteration in her will, if she were dissatisfied with the existing disposition. Six years of matrimonial cohabitation had taken place: if it had produced this "growing affection and confidence," so much relied on by Mr. Harding's counsel, she would not have remained in that deplorable state without expressing some wish, or taking some measures, to increase the benefit to the husband; but nothing was done in consequence of that attack.

In 1824 Mr. Marsh's misfortunes took place; in September of that year he became a bankrupt; from what circumstances does not appear in the evidence. His bankruptcy did not induce her to alter her will; not even to substitute a different executor. Some communication with Mr. Delmar took place as to whether it might not be necessary to make a slight alteration, not hostile to Mr. Marsh, but to secure the benefit to him in exclusion of his creditors: but that was not done, and on Marsh's obtaining his certificate in November, 1825, it became unnecessary. This [98] cannot infer departure from the disposition of 1818. There is no reproach expressed with regard to Mr. Marsh: the evidence is all the other way: it is pity and compassion for his misfortunes which she evinces. She does not take the management of her concerns out of his hands: the Messrs. Marsh are continued as her agents —that is a fact not disputed in the evidence—indeed the navy agency house was not bankrupt at that time, and did not become so till within a few days of her death. There is not only the simple fact that she did not take away her agency from them, but that fact has much increased force when it is admitted that the husband recommended and pressed her to take her concerns out of the hands of the Messrs. Marsh. This is admitted and justified: but it is proved that very urgent and harsh means were used to induce such a measure; and if the advice were justifiable, the urgency might not be so. Yet notwithstanding all the advice, whether properly or improperly administered, notwithstanding all the supposed increase of affection, and this marital influence and authority, the act is not done; the influence is resisted above two years till this new will is obtained; and yet, if it were her wish, what would have been more easy and practicable? Where were the risk and danger, she living at this time under the protection of her husband—he constantly with her? It is unnecessary to rely minutely upon the evidence of the servants who are releasing witnesses—the fact speaks for itself, and their evidence is in accordance with the fact, and it is confirmed by another witness (who is entitled to full credit), Mr. Delmar, and who speaks to [99] circumstances strongly corroborative, some of which will be presently stated. It is further confirmed by another part of the case. In answer to Marsh's allegation, which set forth matters inferring adherence to this will, a responsive allegation was given, which consisted of above twenty articles: to above half of those articles not a witness is examined. Most important would it have been to have produced something demonstrating dissatisfaction at the former will—some intention of altering it, and making a new one; but there is not a circumstance of the sort: not a single declaration of that tendency.

Two servants and a woman who was principally employed in the garden are brought up all the way out of Devonshire to prove that in 1822 the deceased and her husband appeared to be living on kind and conjugal terms together. A few ladies, who made occasional calls at Walworth, are produced to prove that Harding was outwardly attentive to his wife, and never ill-used her in their presence; and some of these say that, "in their opinion, the deceased had a testamentary capacity." But in this mass of responsive evidence, which was to support the condidit and factum of the last will, there is not a single circumstance coming from the deceased herself shewing dissatisfaction at the former disposition, or the intention to make a new will. There is a total absence of any such supplementary evidence, important as it would have been to lead up to the factum of this new will.

The evidence as to adherence and departure, as well as the inferences and presumptions, are all on one side. Nay, the only circumstance relied upon, the bankruptcy of Marsh, instead [100] of affording a probable ground for this altered disposition, operates on my mind in the contrary direction. What could afford a stronger reason for her adhering to her former intentions of giving the bulk of her fortune to the children of Mrs. Amelia Marsh, two sons and two daughters, than the misfortunes of their father, now a bankrupt, with another family to provide for? But, further, why should Marsh's bankruptcy induce her to depart from all the characteristic peculiarities of this will? the place of her interment; the memorials to her friends; the burning of these pictures, and the placing of these miniatures in her coffin: for the change is total and complete. Looking then at the circumstances which preceded the first will, and those which intervened between February, 1818, and February, 1827, nothing can in my judgment be more improbable that the disposition contained in the will propounded by Mr. Tyrrell.

With this foundation of improbability the next inquiry is whether there are not circumstances leading to a strong suspicion that this will was obtained by the husband through undue influence, and circumvention exercised over a testatrix incapable of protecting herself, and of resisting his marital authority. Mr. Harding's object and motives in marrying this lady can only with certainty be known to himself; but circumstances may afford some inferences. He suggests that he was not aware how her property was settled till after Marsh's bankruptcy. Some facts, however, render it difficult to suppose that to be true, and that he was not apprized of it at the time of, and before, the marriage. Did he marry this lady sup-[101]-posing that her property was not vested in trustees to her separate use, and that by marriage he at once acquired the right to it? How came it then that no settlement was made on the marriage? Had she no sense? no friends? And had he no honesty, so as to make a settlement out of this large fortune, if he supposed that by marriage he became entitled to it? How came it that from the first moment after the marriage he never interfered, in the slightest degree, in the appropriation or management of the property? With every allowance for his disinterested liberality, it is hardly credible that in seven years he never should have interfered. He must therefore have been at all times fully aware, as his conduct proves, that her property was settled to her separate use. Here are also these facts leading to the same conclusion.

Harding produced a copy of the deed of trust of 1816, to enable Tyrrell to draw the will of 1827. Shortly after Marsh's bankruptcy he went to Delmar and told him "that he came from Mrs. Harding, who wished to have her settlements and will sent to her." Delmar went there shortly after, taking the drafts of these papers with him, not having the originals, for they were in the box at Marsh's office: but Harding then told him "that he had copies:" that is, copies of the settlements: for his own case is, that he did not know the contents of the will of 1818 to the last. How and when, then, came he by these copies? It is true indeed that Delmar says "he believes that, about that time, Harding received from the deceased a copy of the settlement of the 8th of March, 1816:" but that is contrary to the whole of [102] her conduct; for she was, at that time and at all times, most anxious to keep him ignorant of her concerns of every sort. But there is another circumstance that renders it not improbable, that he had these very copies communicated and delivered to him before the marriage, as in common fairness they ought to have been, and as his conduct, in never attempting to interfere in the management of this property, strongly infers; that circumstance is, that the very copy of which Harding was in possession was a copy certified by two of Martelli's clerks in 1816. This copy was then in existence before the marriage, and the whole conduct of the parties renders it by no means improbable that he was in possession of it at that time.

It is true that, if he then knew of these instruments, he may appear the more disinterested in marrying the deceased without any settlement being made of some part of the property in his favour. It may be so: but an artful, cunning, experienced man might feel some confidence that, when married, he should have sufficient influence to persuade his wife to appoint and dispose of the property in his favour. If he had such a design and such a hope he would probably adopt two modes of effecting his purpose: first, by wheedling and coaxing to get her affairs and confidence into his power; and next, if those failed, by importunity and rigour to subdue her into acquiescence and submission. The two modes are by no means inconsistent with each other.

The letters of Mr. Harding to his wife have been exhibited by Mr. Tyrrell, and they are [103] rather of an extraordinary tone, considering the age of the parties: they display something of a character and plan not irreconcileable with the design just suggested. Mr. Harding had a cottage in Devonshire, and was engaged in manganese works, from which, as he represents, he was deriving considerable profit—about 1000l. a year: he goes down to this cottage soon after the marriage—the first month is scarcely over, and he is absent from his bride about two months. These are passages in his letters. The first is dated July, 1817, he having been married in the June preceding. After giving an account of his journey into Devonshire, he writes, "I have air and exercise in abundance, but I sigh that you do not partake of both with me; for happy should I have been to have had my dear, my beloved wife with me; but to this our separation I must be reconciled, knowing it to be necessary and not of long duration; but in my fond imagination you are and ever will be present, for while I live my bosom will ever glow with warm affection, and with the purest regard for you, and with these sentiments do I now subscribe myself, my dearest Sophia, most tenderly and most affectionately your's."

The next is from Ilfracombe, and is dated on the 25th of July. "Thus, my beloved Sophia, I am separated from you by necessity, or by a sort of destiny not to be commanded or controlled. My heart is yours, and in mind and thought you are ever present; for you my fond imagination is my present comfort, and my only bliss. Yes, my dearest Sophia, be assured I am with affectionate regard and [104] the most tender love truly and affectionately yours."

The third is on the 11th of August: that concludes: "I greatly regret that my absence from you is so long, but I shall not stay one hour more than is absolutely necessary. To me this separation is more than painful, for not a day or hour passes but I think of my much loved Sophia, my beloved wife: for be assured I am most faithfully and most affectionately yours."

The next is dated on the 3d of September, from Manchester: . . . "Do write to me, and let me hear from you; that will be the highest pleasure I can now receive. I trust in Heaven, that a few days more will dismiss me from this wretched place, and enable me soon to embrace my much loved wife, who has my warmest affection, my highest regard, and the tender love of him, who is, my beloved Sophia, your J. Harding."

The letter of the 15th of September thus concludes: "Oh! how I anticipate the joy I shall experience on seeing you. Yes, my Sophia, this thought throws a glow of happiness over my whole frame, and makes me feel that I am wholly and truly yours."

The next is much in the same tone. "I know not how to express to you the pleasure I felt on reading your last letter: it was the language of an affectionate wife; it was the harbinger of my future happiness, for nothing on earth can be more pleasant to me than your presence. Yes, my dearest Sophia, my greatest wish is, and always will be, to be inseparable and ever near you. My heart glows with [105] a warm affection for you, and I love you with tenderness and with truth."

These are passages from some of the letters written at this period of time. Why, the very heyday of life, the most ardent affections of youth, could not have dictated warmer effusions: they have more the appearance of being written with a view of wheedling her out of her large fortune, at her own disposal, than of being the expression of the real genuine feelings of a husband of sixty-four, to a second wife of fifty-one. This last letter is dated on the 12th of April, 1818, shortly after she had been making the will now propounded by Mr. Marsh. Her answers are not produced, and if they contained expressions of equal warmth they might have shewn something of this "growing affection:" they may have been rather cold replies; she may have seen through, or thought she saw through, these high-flown effusions, and suspected that they had her property rather than her person in view. None of her letters are exhibited till after her paralytic attack: the first is dated in May, 1835, when she was no longer able to write herself: they are in the handwriting of her servant, Mary Apostles: they are dry and formal, possibly on that account: but it is not wholly unworthy of remark that, though written after Marsh's bankruptcy, they contain no expression of dissatisfaction towards the Messrs. Marsh nor the least allusion to her accounts with them; still less a wish or suggestion of any new testamentary act.

That Harding advised her to take her concerns out of Marsh's hands is admitted: that [106] she refused to do so is demonstrated by the fact; but it is important to inquire whether he did not then resort to rough means. That he did so is proved by the servants, who, though releasing, are not discredited witnesses. It is not necessary to advert to the particulars of their depositions; they were fully pointed out in the argument: nor even if their evidence is biassed and high coloured would it be material, for it is not necessary to rely on them alone, nor on the exact details of their testimony: for sufficient is stated by Mr. Delmar in confirmation of them; and I see nothing to impeach his credit.

That Harding endeavoured to get at the original deeds and will is proved by Delmar. Delmar carried copies, but Harding then said, "he had copies, he did not want copies." But there is this strong mark of falsehood; he pretended that he had applied to Delmar by the deceased's desire, but when the three parties are together he does not venture to appeal to her in the presence of Delmar to confirm the truth of his mission; he does not venture to say—"Now, madam, here is Mr. Delmar, deliver your message to him yourself; I will leave the room; he is your confidential solicitor, he prepared your will in my absence, tell him what your real wishes are; he may suspect that I have some selfish object in view." It is quite incredible that she had any wish of the kind. The res gestæ and the evidence of the witnesses concur to prove that she was most anxious no paper of hers should be given up to Harding, and that no account of hers should be rendered to him.

What is the substance of Mr. Delmar's ac-[107]-count? "Mostly, when he called, Harding seemed to make a point of being present and was painfully intrusive; he constantly kept speaking of Mr. Marsh and his son, in a way tending to excite an unfavourable impression of them; the conversation always took that turn; he uniformly manifested a wish to pry into her pecuniary affairs, even at times when she was evidently very ill; his object seemed to be to ween the deceased's regard from Marsh and his family. The deceased for the most part sat silent, but at times, when he urged the subject more closely, she used to manifest impatience, saying 'No, no,' to avoid the subject: the very mention of such matters seemed to give the deceased pain, but Harding's conversation was nevertheless always about them. Deponent's visits were continued principally because they seemed to soothe her, and operated as a check on the irritation Harding's conduct excited. . . . Harding was constantly alluding to the subject, and there was an unhappy state of discord on that account. He used great harshness of expression towards the deceased on that subject, and at a time when from ill health she required every tenderness. On several of his visits deponent found her in tears; he sometimes observed to Harding that the deceased was in that delicate state it was very necessary to treat her with kindness. She appeared to grow gradually weaker."

This is the general substance of Delmar's evidence, and it is in perfect accordance with, though not quite so strong as, the evidence of some of the servants. It needs no comment.

[108] There is another fact not only inferring, but nearly conclusive upon, the absence of all previous intention of the deceased to make a new will. She had a duplicate of the will of 1818, as I have said, in her possession; but fearful of its falling into the hands of her husband, she delivered it to her confidential servant, Mary Apostles, in the presence of Rigden; and Apostles, when in a dangerous state, delivered it to her friend Easton; and in his hands it remained till some time after her death. Now Harding had been applying to Delmar, as from the deceased, for her will: supposing that to be true, and that Delmar had declined to deliver it, yet she had the duplicate within her power. If she had wished to revoke that will, would she not have communicated the fact of her possession of this duplicate to her husband, unless indeed her capacity was so gone that she had no recollection of its existence? But if she wished the will to be revoked, and recollected the existence of that duplicate, it is quite incredible that she would not have apprized her husband of it, and would not have required Rigden and Apostles to deliver it up; and yet it is Harding's own case that he did not know the contents of the will, nor the existence of this duplicate till after her death. How fully, then, do the facts and the conduct confirm the parol evidence that Harding was anxious to possess himself of the will, and the property of the deceased, and that she was no less anxious to keep both her property and her will out of his hands.

Such being the circumstances of the case, up to the very commencement of the transaction of [109] Harding's getting this will made, it becomes essential to inquire what was the state of the deceased's capacity at this period. This part of the case, again, lies within a narrow compass, and is established by the conduct of Harding and his own witnesses: it does not require to be closely examined upon the opinions of witnesses, which are generally conflicting upon the subject of capacity.

The deceased had a paralytic attack in 1823, which reduced her to great bodily infirmity; but whether she had another in 1825, or whether she was in a state of despondency and made an attempt upon her own life is not material; she certainly had a good deal to prey on her mind and spirits: the misfortunes of Mr. Marsh, the "worritting" of her husband, and subsequently the illness of her confidential old servant, Apostles, were not likely to be without their effect upon a nervous patient. It is admitted that Mr. Delmar had intimated an opinion that she was incapable of managing her own concerns: it is admitted that an operation on her maid, Apostles, was wished to be postponed lest it should agitate her too much and render her unfit for making this will: it is admitted that, before the drawer of this will would undertake to attend for the purpose of receiving her instructions, he wished her to be visited and examined by medical gentlemen to ascertain the state of her capacity; it is admitted that the opinion of a surgeon, the drawer's brother, was not alone deemed sufficient; was not alone deemed satisfactory: it is admitted that Dr. Burrows, a medical person, supposed to be particularly conversant with defects of the mind—at least in cases of derange-[110]-ment—after sitting with her for three quarters of an hour, would only give a limited opinion as to her capacity, and wished for a second interview before he gave a decided opinion. In such a case, to resort to the judgment of persons who occasionally, or of others who frequently, saw her, whether she was quite capable or quite imbecile, would be utterly useless: she was, at all events, in a state of very weakened and doubtful capacity.

If, then, in addition to these circumstances; first, that the disposition in the new will is highly improbable; next, that the husband had been endeavouring to get at her deeds and testamentary instruments; and, further, that she was in this state of doubtful capacity; if, in addition to all this, we yet find that the husband, as far as the evidence goes, originates and conducts the whole business, representing or rather misrepresenting the previous facts, and being present at all the material parts of the transaction, the case proceeds to the evidence of the factum under presumptions of fraud and imposition, which hardly any evidence would be sufficient to repel. It would at least be extremely difficult to shew that she was a free as well as a capable testatrix; to shew that she had a real disposing testamentary mind, and an intention to abandon all the dispositions of her former will made so carefully and adhered to so firmly. The strong presumption would be that, in whatever she said and did, however it might impose upon the witnesses, she was a mere instrument and puppet in the hands of her husband.

We come then now to the evidence on the condidit.

The witnesses to the factum are three. Mr. [111] Edward Tyrrell, a solicitor, and deputy-remembrancer of the city of London; Mr. Frederick Tyrrell, a surgeon, his brother; and Dr. Burrows, a physician. Certainly three persons, respectable in situation, of unimpeached general character, and competent to arrive at a fair opinion, as far as their opportunities and the means they used of judging enabled them to form an estimate of her mental capacity. There is no reason whatever to suppose that they would either enter into a fraudulent conspiracy with the husband to obtain this will, or that they would have come forward to support it by wilful perjury; nothing of the sort can possibly be imputed to them: but it is necessary to see under what prepossessions they engaged in the matter, in order to form a correct judgment of the inquiries which they made and of the conclusions at which they arrive. They may have been imposed upon and duped by the artful misrepresentations of Mr. Harding: they may have suffered their vigilance to be lulled and their penetration to have slept, and, after having embarked in the transaction and after their characters were in some measure implicated, they may be under a strong bias to support and give effect to the act. Under that bias very honest persons (such is the infirmity of our nature) often deceive themselves without being aware of it: they fancy impressions to have existed, nay, they sometimes even suppose facts to have taken place, because those impressions now exist, or because those facts might or ought to have passed in order to support their impressions. Hence this strong bias will often give a false colour to a transaction, without the witness intending to speak falsely [112] or to suppress the truth. Without, therefore, in the slightest degree suspecting any thing of conspiracy or wilful misrepresentation on the part of these gentlemen, it may be necessary to examine their evidence upon those other principles which have been just stated; for it was correctly said by the leading counsel for Mr. Tyrrell, and it cannot be expressed in better words (if I have taken them accurately), "Even persons of high character may fail to do their duty when nearly connected." This he applied to the evidence of Mr. Delmar.

The principal witness, and he who begins the history, is Mr. Edward Tyrrell, the solicitor who prepared the will: he states, "He and his family for two generations have been intimately acquainted with Mr. Harding; he had a slight knowledge of the deceased." He then was the intimate friend, but he was also the solicitor of Harding, but not the solicitor of the deceased. He goes on: "On or about the 19th or 20th of February, 1827, Mr. Harding called on deponent at his office, and informed him that Mrs. Harding wished to see him for the purpose of making her will, and for him to act as her solicitor. Mr. Harding said that his wife had since her marriage made a will without his knowledge, and that it was either in the hands of Mr. Delmar or Mr. Marsh, the navy agent; that his wife, and he at her request, had applied to them both for the will, and also to Mr. Marsh for her, the deceased's, account as her agent: he further stated that Mr. Delmar had called upon the deceased a few weeks back, and that on his, Delmar's, leaving the room, Mrs. Harding became agitated, and [113] burst into tears, upon which Mr. Delmar turned round and asked whether he thought the deceased in a fit state to manage her affairs, to which he, Harding, replied, 'that he certainly did think her quite capable.' After this statement Mr. Harding handed to deponent an attested copy of a deed of gift, dated antecedent to deceased's marriage, whereby she had assigned £10,000 to the elder Mr. Marsh: also a like copy of the deed of settlement which she made of the greater part of her property shortly before her marriage; which settlement reserved to the deceased the right of disposal by will of the property therein mentioned. Deponent, referring himself to what Mr. Harding had let drop as to Mr. Delmar's doubts about Mrs. Harding's capacity for the management of her affairs, told Mr. Harding 'that he, deponent, should not feel himself justified in taking instructions for a will from Mrs. Harding, until some medical person of respectability had seen her and given an opinion as to her state of mind.' Mr. Harding having concurred with deponent in respect of such a caution, deponent, with the like concurrence, applied to his brother, Mr. Frederick Tyrrell, requesting him to call upon the deceased for the purpose of ascertaining her state of mind, which he promised to do."

Upon this account of the commencement of the business, several observations occur. First, the matter, as far as here appears, originates entirely with Mr. Harding: there is no note from the deceased, no servant nor disinterested messenger sent by her: Harding goes himself [114] to his own friend and solicitor; and it is Harding's own story "that Mrs. Harding wished to see Tyrrell;" but of the reality of that wish there is not a tittle of evidence, and from the circumstances already adverted to, there is every reason to suspect that it was misrepresentation. "He told him the will was in the hands of Delmar or Marsh, that his wife, and he at her request, had applied to Delmar and to Marsh for the will." This, again, is false; the deceased never did apply to Marsh or to Delmar for her will; but Harding applied to Delmar as from the deceased, when Delmar told him "that the will was at Marsh's office:" and though Delmar afterwards attended the deceased in Harding's presence, yet the will was never mentioned by, nor even in the presence of, the deceased to Delmar. It is clear, also, that Harding was not aware the deceased either then had, or ever had, a duplicate in her own possession, of which she must have apprized him had she wished to revoke it. By this misrepresentation, then, "That the deceased wished to revoke her will, that it was in the hands of Delmar or Marsh, that the deceased herself, and he at her request, had applied to each of them for the will without success;" is Mr. Edward Tyrrell imposed upon, and induced to engage in making this new will? This is the very origin and foundation of the whole sequel. Upon this false basis, originating entirely with Harding, the subsequent transactions are all built. There is no reason to suppose that Tyrrell did not fairly embark in the business under the impression that he was going to carry into effect the real wishes of a free and capable testatrix. Upon the former point her free agency, [115] with a little more penetration, Mr. Tyrrell ought perhaps to have taken some alarm when he saw by this settlement that the wife had in her own power the disposal of a very large property, and that the channel of communication was her husband. Upon the latter point, the capacity, when told that Delmar had insinuated her incompetency, he did take the precaution of desiring that medical persons should first see the deceased; but all his precautions were directed to ascertain whether she was fit to make a will which she really desired and wished to make. Upon the other point, by far the most important, whether in this questionable state as to capacity she was or was not under the influence and dominion of her interested husband, no precautionary inquiry whatever took place; and this course was pursued throughout the whole business and by all the witnesses.

Edward Tyrrell applied to his brother Frederick, one of the surgeons of St. Thomas' Hospital, and (upon the authority of the husband) he conveyed to him the same impression, "that the deceased was desirous of making a will in favour of her husband, but that some doubts had been raised by Marsh, or by some one on his behalf, respecting the deceased's fitness for the performance of such an act." This is stated by Mr. Frederick Tyrrell in answer to the 6th interrogatory. So that Edward Tyrrell not only received himself, but conveyed the same false impression, from the misrepresentations of Harding, that the deceased really wished to make a will in favour of her husband, but that Marsh or some one was raising doubts in order to obstruct it. He also mentions "that he has [116] a notion that before his first visit to the deceased he saw Mr. Harding."

Frederick Tyrrell saw the deceased four times, but Harding was always present, except that on one occasion he went out of the room for a few minutes to call the maid servant, Apostles, and was also absent at a part of the execution; so that the examination of the deceased's capacity was always in the presence of the husband. He says, "that he was with her the first time about half an hour, and was satisfied of her capacity:" but the fact is that he and his brother did not act on that opinion. They, upon conference, thought it best also to call in Dr. Burrows. It is not necessary to examine minute discrepancies between the witnesses, nor to inquire whether a medical person, whose particular line of practice is attending lunatic persons, is more fit than other medical practitioners to form a judgment on the capacity of a mind weakened by paralysis, where there has been no delusion nor derangement. Be that as it may, Dr. Burrows' opinion is entitled to attention; but he again visited the deceased under the same prepossessions and prejudices. He states, "Two or three days previous to the 27th of February, 1827 (referring to a note witness made at the time), the deponent was called upon by Mr. F. Tyrrell who informed him, that he wished deponent to see a lady he, Tyrrell, was attending at Walworth, who was desirous of making her will; but that she was very much debilitated by paralysis, and that her husband wished to have her state of mind, relative to its fitness for a testamentary act, properly ascertained; that disease of the mind not be-[117]-ing within his particular practice, as it is that of the deponent, he, Tyrrell, had on that account applied to deponent, who on the 27th of February met Mr. F. Tyrrell at the deceased's house, being then introduced to her as having called to see one of the deceased's servants; on that occasion he sat and conversed with the deceased nearly three quarters of an hour, after which deponent informed Mr. F. Tyrrell that as far as he had seen of the deceased on that day she appeared capable of disposing of her property, but that he could not come to a decided opinion on the subject until he had seen her a second time. Deponent was desirous of seeing the deceased a second time, because, although she was perfectly rational while he so saw and conversed with her, yet she was under very considerable agitation in contemplation of an operation which her maid-servant, of whom she spoke with great kindness, was to undergo; and deponent, not willing to increase such agitation, did not touch upon the subject of her will." Thus, then, the impression travelled: Dr. Burrows received it from Frederick Tyrrell; Frederick Tyrrell from Edward Tyrrell; Edward Tyrrell from Harding, the most suspicious and interested source from which the impression could possibly originate; and the deceased's wishes in that respect are highly improbable; are unsupported by any proof; and are contradicted by all the facts and evidence in the cause.

Dr. Burrows never saw the deceased but twice; on the 27th of February, when he and Frederick Tyrrell were there together; and on the 9th of March, when the instrument was ex-[118]-ecuted. On the third interrogatory he says: "He never was alone with the deceased. Mr. Harding was in the room on both occasions for great part of the time." On the seventh interrogatory: "The deceased was alone when Mr. Harding introduced him and Mr. Frederick Tyrrell: he introduced respondent as a medical friend of Mr. Frederick Tyrrell, who had come to see the maid-servant. Mr. Harding went out of the room to call the maid-servant alluded to, but he returned saying she had gone out."

This is the sort of contrivance by which the medical gentlemen were brought into the society of the deceased in order to judge of her capacity. Contrivances are always suspicious. If the deceased really wished to make this entirely new disposition, had a capacity for the purpose, and was a free agent, why not frankly and fairly explain to her the object and reasons of the visit? Why did not Harding say to her, "Mr. Marsh and Mr. Delmar refuse to deliver up your will, and they suggest that you are not in a fit state to make a new one: under such base conduct and unfounded insinuations, it is prudent, in order to insure the execution of your wishes and kind intentions, that respectable persons—persons of medical experience, of skill and judgment—should visit you, and converse with you, and learn your real wishes from yourself: I will bring respectable medical men for the purpose; you can have no objection to see and converse with, and satisfy, them of your intentions, and that what I represent are your own real wishes." This would have been proper and natural conduct, and having thus intro-[119]-duced these gentlemen, and thus prepared the deceased, the husband should have withdrawn from the room, if not from the house. Far more was necessary than the ability to answer a few questions on common topics: here was not only capacity to be proved, but here were volition and free agency to be ascertained, and to that point he should have desired the two medical gentlemen to address their inquiries. But here are these two medical men introduced by this contrivance on the 27th of February; a few questions are asked on common topics in the presence of the husband, on whose sole authority it is assumed that the questions are answered correctly: but still the visit ends by Dr. Burrows deposing "that he could not come to a decided opinion on the subject until he had seen her a second time." After an interview of three quarters of an hour this is the result, even as to capacity. As to the power of making any will, he goes a little further on interrogatory than on his examination in chief in one respect. In his answer to the eighth he says, "at his first visit he had no doubt whatever of the deceased possessing her mental faculties and power of reflection sufficiently to enable her to make a general disposition of her property in one bequest, and to bequeath legacies to her servants; he cannot swear the deceased was able to recollect, know, and understand the purport of any former will which she had made. He has no doubt whatever that she was able, at such time, to comprehend the effect and purport of such a will as that she subsequently executed in his presence." This is the utmost length that Dr. [120] Burrows can go, prepared as he was by the partial view which Harding exhibited to him of the deceased and of her wishes. If this will were in conformity to her previous intentions, and declared or ascertained wishes, Dr. Burrows thinks she had sufficient capacity to give effect to the act: but if, when he gave his evidence, he had been in possession of the earlier history of this transaction, and of all the circumstances which preceded this will, then from his testimony it is clear he must have arrived at a different conclusion and have given a different opinion. His answers to other interrogatories infer as much; for instance, on the eleventh, he thus answers: "That when he visited the deceased on the 27th of February, he was informed by Mr. F. Tyrrell, as he best recollects and believes, that the deceased had, previous to her marriage, made a will in favour of some individual other than her husband, upon which respondent inquired, 'whether such individual was her next relation.' Tyrrell replied it was not, but that she now wished to revoke that will and to make a new one in favour of her husband, and that it was to satisfy all parties of the deceased's competency to make that new will that respondent was applied to." Now, though the person principally benefited under the will referred to was not a next of kin, yet it is to be remembered the deceased had no known relation. And how was this application to Dr. Burrows "to satisfy all parties?" What! the parties in whose favour the former will was made: they knew nothing of what was going on. "Respondent knew not, and did not hear, [121] that such former will had been made in favour of Mr. William Marsh or his family, or that such individual was one of the deceased's oldest friends, and a friend of her late brother, through whom he heard the deceased's property was derived; he never heard that the deceased, subsequent to her marriage, executed a will, by which she gave her house and furniture at Walworth to her husband absolutely, and 5000l. navy five per cents. to him for life, with reversion to his son by a former marriage, or that by such will she bequeathed the residue to Mr. William Marsh and his family." If then Dr. Burrows had known all the previous history, it is to be inferred that he would not have sanctioned this instrument without some better proof that she was acting of her own free, uninfluenced will and wishes.

To revoke this former will so made and so adhered to, it was necessary that the deceased should be proved to have recollected at least its general contents; to have recollected that she had distributed memorials among her friends; that she had provided for her servants; that she had given her husband a certain portion; that she had bequeathed the bulk of her fortune to those whom she had long adopted for that purpose, the children of Mrs. Amelia Marsh: it was necessary that she should be proved, upon some rational grounds negativing the importunity of her husband, to have become desirous of abandoning all her former intentions; but to no part of her former will is there the least reference. That this new will was without the importunate influence of the husband there is not the slightest appearance in any part of the evidence of Frederick [122] Tyrrell or Dr. Burrows. Harding is always present, he scarcely goes out of the room for an instant, and no question upon the point of free agency is put to the deceased.

Without then stating this preliminary evidence more minutely, there is nothing to convince me that the mind of the deceased was sufficiently probed to ascertain whether she was or was not either a free or, as applied to such a will, a capable testatrix; nothing satisfactorily to discover what her real wishes were, without the restraint and influence of her husband.

It is a great but not an uncommon error to suppose that because a person can understand a question put to him, and can give a rational answer to such question, he is of perfect sound mind, and is capable of making a will for any purpose whatever; whereas the rule of law, and it is the rule of common sense, is far otherwise: the competency of the mind must be judged of by the nature of the act to be done, and from a consideration of all the circumstances of the case. In Combe's case the rule is laid down in these words: (a) "It was agreed by the judges that sane memory for the making of a will is not at all times when the party can answer to any thing with sense, but he ought to have judgment to discern and to be of perfect memory, otherwise the will is void." It is not answering that "she had been round Clapham Common," or "that her house was leasehold," or the like, even if the questions were answered correctly and the husband had not been present, [123] that would be sufficient in the present case. So again, in the Marquess of Winchester's case (6 Rep. 23): "By the law it is not sufficient that the testator be of memory, when he makes his will, to answer familiar and usual questions, but he ought to have a disposing memory so as to be able to make a disposition of his estate with understanding and reason." To support then such a complete revolution in the testamentary dispositions of the deceased, it was necessary to shew that she had recollection of what the former disposition was, even supposing there were no grounds to suspect a mere tutored acquiescence under the influence of the husband. The influence of the husband, however, is much more readily inferred to have its effect than the importunity of the wife, and yet it is laid down, "If a man makes a will in his sickness by the over importuning of his wife, to the end he may be quiet, this shall be said to be a will made by restraint, and shall not be good" (8 Vin. Ab. 166, No. 3). And Swinburne says in respect to restraint, "whereof no certain rule can be delivered, but it is left to the discretion of the Judge, who is to consider all the circumstances" (part vii. s. 2). In my judgment in the present case the circumstances are quite sufficient, prior to the application of the husband to Mr. Edward Tyrrell, and quite sufficient, from his presence upon all subsequent occasions, to require that he should afford the most satisfactory proof that the deceased was not a mere unresisting instrument in his hands, [124] so taught, tutored, and impressed, as to say and do all that Mr. Edward Tyrrell states to have taken place.

With this view of the case it may hardly be necessary to go, with any minuteness, through the account given of the instructions and execution. Mr. Edward Tyrrell, having given entire credence to the representations of Harding, and to the report on the capacity made by the medical gentlemen, proceeded, on the fifth of March, to take the instructions; and his account of what then passed is stated at considerable length: and had it not been already so repeatedly cited in the argument, it might have been important here to have read it at length: but it will be sufficient to refer to parts of it.(a) His [125] narrative, supposing it to be quite correctly given, appears at first

(a) "Within a day or two after deponent (Edward Tyrrell) had learnt from his brother that Dr. Burrows and he were both of opinion that the deceased was in a fit state to manage her own affairs, he, deponent, informed Mr. Harding, who called on him, 'that he was now quite satisfied, and had no objection to attend to take Mrs. Harding's instructions whenever she should make an appointment.' An appointment was then made by Mr. Harding for deponent's attendance: in consequence whereof deponent, on the 5th of March, 1827 (having referred to his book), attended at the deceased's house in York Place, Walworth: on his arrival there about noon, Mr. Harding said, 'I am sorry our appointment was made for to-day, as Mrs. Harding has had a bad night, and is not very well to-day.' Deponent said, 'he was sorry to hear it, but he supposed she was well enough to see him:' Mr. Harding said, 'that she was;' and the deponent was shewn up stairs into a small sitting-room on the first floor in the front of the house; Mr. Harding accompanying him: they found Mrs. Harding alone, evidently expecting deponent, sitting by the fire, and writing materials were on a table at hand. On deponent entering the room the deceased with some difficulty rose to receive him; on which Mr. Harding said to her, 'Don't trouble yourself, Mr. Tyrrell will excuse your rising.' After deponent had taken a seat, as Mr. Harding did also, and after the deceased had made some inquiries after deponent's mother, and other branches of his family, who were known to her in consequence of her marriage with Mr. Harding, she proceeded to give deponent a statement of her affairs. The deceased of her own accord entered upon such statement saying, 'I suppose Mr. Harding has told you what it is I want you to do, and how ill the Marshes have behaved to me.' Deponent told her 'that Mr. Harding had so informed him;' and deponent then said 'that he was come according to her desire, as he had been informed, to take instructions for her will.' The deceased said, 'she was much obliged to him, but she wanted to know what she should do to get her former will and papers out of the hand of Mr. Marsh' (meaning Mr. Marsh the elder). Deponent asked the deceased 'in whose hands she considered her will to be, whether in the hands of Mr. Delmar, or of Mr. Marsh.' She replied, 'that she supposed in the hands of Mr. Delmar, as she had executed it at his office, and left it there:' she said 'that she had several times called on Mr. Delmar for the purpose of getting her said will out of his hands, but could not get it, and that she wished to have it that it might be destroyed.' The deceased gave deponent to understand that the will she so wished to destroy was made in favour of Mr. Marsh, but she did not otherwise specify its tenor: she, in continuation, said 'that she was very uneasy at not being able to get any account from Mr. Marsh, and that she should be very thankful if deponent would exert himself to get both the will and the account from Mr. Delmar as soon as possible.' Mr. Harding then left the room: he had not joined in the conversation before deposed of in any manner, except to correct a date, and to correct the deceased, when in the course of such conversation sight strong and favor-[126]-able ; but the Court must consider whether the bias and prepossession of the witness have not [127] led him to colour his deposition in chief rather too highly. It must be recollected that the [128] husband was present nearly the whole time. How far he may not have impressed, and by influence compelled, her to say all this (if she did say it exactly as it stands upon the deposition in chief) may be suspected. There is sufficient to raise a presumption against the husband that she was a mere instrument in his hands, and it was incumbent upon him to repel the presumption so raised. But it would be extraordinary if all did take place exactly in the manner the deposition is calculated to represent. Here is a long, smooth, fluent account of all the circumstances, which Harding had before represented to Mr. Edward Tyrrell; almost totidem verbis, all told without interruption: of her own accord; Harding not [129] interfering, not dictating, merely supplying a date and the name of his co-executor. If this were so, it is extraordinary that Frederick Tyrrell after his first interview should have required the attendance of Dr. Burrows: if there was all this ready and active capacity, this clear expression of her wishes, it is extraordinary that Dr. Burrows should have desired a second interview before he gave a decisive opinion of her being capable of making the sort of will he was induced to suppose she wished to make: particularly when, at this interview with Edward Tyrrell, she named Mr. Arthur Marsh instead of his father. What the deceased so addressed to deponent was spontaneous on her part, and was not, in deponent's presence, dictated to her, nor was she, save as aforesaid, prompted in what she said. When Mr. Harding had so left the room (deponent and deceased being then alone together) the deceased said, 'I wish to leave my property to Mr. Harding after my death, and to leave a legacy to each of my three servants, at the same time naming the three servants: to the man-servant, whose name he does not without reference recollect, and to Mary Apostles, £300 each ; and to her other maid servant, whose name he does not recollect, £150. Such instructions as the deceased dictated the same were by the deponent committed to writing, and he had written thus far when Mr. Harding returned into the room. Deponent then asked the deceased 'whom she appointed to be her executors?' She answered, 'Mr. Harding;' and turning to Mr. Harding and addressing him, she added, 'and the gentleman you mentioned to me.' Mr. Harding replied, 'You mean Mr. Tyrrell of Lincoln's Inn.' The deceased answered, 'Yes.' Deponent then wrote down the names of Mr. Harding and of Mr. John Tyrrell as of the deceased's executors. This done, the deponent, in the presence of Mr. Harding, read over to the deceased, in an audible and distinct manner, the instructions which he had, in manner aforesaid, committed to writing; and having done so the deceased signified her approbation by saying, 'Very well,' or something to that effect. The deponent then made an appointment with the deceased for the execution of a will to be drawn pursuant to the said instructions; the 9th of March was named, after which he took his leave. Between the 5th and 9th of March deponent suggested to his brother Frederick that, to remove all doubts as to the capacity of the deceased, and all responsibility from him, the deponent, as a professional man, it would be proper for Dr. Burrows and himself to attend with the deponent to be present at the execution of the will then in preparation, which was agreed to; and accordingly, the will having been engrossed from a draft will, which in the interim deponent had prepared from the aforesaid instructions, deponent attended at the deceased's residence at about 2 o'clock on the 9th of March, meeting his brother and Dr. Burrows there, so nearly at the same time that they were all shewn into the deceased's sitting room at once; finding there the deceased and her husband. A few complimentary words had passed chiefly between Dr. Burrows and the deceased, when deponent produced the will he had prepared for execution, telling the deceased 'that it was the will which he had drawn according to her instructions,' or to that effect; and 'that he would read it to her.' The deponent then audibly and distinctly, and in a deliberate manner, read over the will. When he had read the legacy to the deceased's second maid servant, namely, as a legacy of £150, the deceased stopped him, saying, 'I wish so and so (naming the servant) to have the same legacy as the other two servants.' Upon which deponent made an alteration in the said will, by striking the sum of £150 through with a pen, and by inserting in lieu thereof, and over the same, the words 'three hundred' or 'three' instead of the words 'one' and 'fifty.' Dr. Burrows then in an under tone to respondent observed 'that Mr. Harding had better leave the room while his wife

Harding represented that "the deceased had had a bad night and was not so well that morning."

But it is extremely difficult to reconcile this deposition in chief, so far as respects the spontaneity of the deceased, and the active part she takes in the communication to Mr. Edward Tyrrell, with what he himself states when pressed upon interrogatory. The Court cannot suppose that he has intended to give an unfair representation; but his bias may have caused him unawares, in his deposition, to convey a very incorrect impression of the real character of what took place. For example, he states this: "After deponent had taken a seat, as Mr. Harding did also, and after the deceased had made some inquiries after deponent's mother and other branches of his family, who were known to her, she proceeded to give a statement of her affairs." Now, on reading this account I was led to suppose that the deceased, recognizing Edward Tyrrell, began the conversation of her own accord, and therefore that her behaviour shewed memory, intelligence, and alertness of mind, and all that might lead [130] to the inference of spontaneity and capacity; and that this evidence was on that account important. Yet, on the eighteenth interrogatory, he says, "On entering the room, and being introduced by name, the deceased said to respondent, 'I hope you are very executed the will,' and deponent suggesting it to Mr. Harding, he did so. When Mr. Harding had left the room the deponent read over a second time that part of the will which he had so altered, and the remainder thereof, and having finished, the deceased signified her approval of it by bowing her head: deponent then handed her a pen, requesting her to sign her name opposite the seal (already affixed); the deceased made an attempt to sign her name, first, with her right hand, and then with her left; but she was unable to do it; her fingers appeared to be contracted and her hand unsteady, which previous thereto was unknown to the deponent. Deponent perceiving the deceased's inability to sign her name, took the pen out of her hand, saying, 'We must get you to sign with your mark, Mrs. Harding;' to which she replied, 'Yes,' and the deponent, preparatory to such mode of execution, and to make the latter clause of her will and clause of attestation conformable, altered the same severally, and, having done so, handed her the pen a second time, pointing with his finger to the seal, or place whereon her mark was to be made. The deceased accordingly made a cross: deponent then placed his seal on the wax impression, desiring her to lift it off, which she did: she next, at his desire, laid her hand on the will, and after his dictation, being so directed to do by him, she repeated the words, 'I declare and publish this to be my last will and testament, and request you, gentlemen, present, to affix your name as witnesses thereto.' Dr. Burrows, Mr. Frederick Tyrrell, and deponent then subscribed their names at the foot of the clause of attestation. While the witnesses still remained, deponent asked the deceased 'what he should do with the will?' to which she answered, 'I think you had better keep it for me:' upon which deponent folded up the said will and put it in his pocket. After the usual parting compliments deponent withdrew in company with his brother and Dr. Burrows, leaving the deceased and her husband together. Sophia Harding was, as well on the day she gave instructions for her said will as on the day and time of the execution thereof, as deponent verily believes, of perfect sound mind, memory, and understanding, and well knew and understood what she at such times said and did, and what was said and done in her presence, and was fully capable, as the deponent verily believes, of giving instructions for and of executing her last will, or of doing any other serious or rational act requiring thought, judgment, and reflection. Deponent has no doubt whatever of her capacity, having in the first instance his attention drawn in a particular manner to the enquiry of that fact, as aforesaid: she, at the times deposed, was evidently very debilitated in bodily strength, and had almost lost the use of her limbs; her speech also was affected; and at times, particularly on the day of his taking the instructions, she was for a moment flurried and shed tears; but the impression was very transitory; she soon recovered herself; on the day of the execution of the will she was only once excited to tears or apparently flurried; that happened when deponent dictated to her the words of publication: she, for an instant, was then excited, but readily recovered herself, and repeated the words in a very firm and deliberate manner, shewing that she knew and fully understood the import thereof."

well,' and shortly after, 'I hope your mother is well;' she made the latter inquiry on respondent saying 'that he had that morning seen his mother, who desired her compliments.'" This gives quite a different character to the inquiry: the one account inducing a belief that the inquiry originated with the deceased; the other shewing that it grew out of a previous observation, and was such a remark as a person in a state of great imbecility might well make.

In respect to this "statement of her affairs," it is difficult to reconcile it with his own answer on the third interrogatory: "At the interviews which the respondent had with the deceased, and at which he was present with others, she did not speak until she was spoken to; when so addressed she confined her answers, as much as she could, to monosyllables, but not always so; it appeared she did so on account of the difficulty of utterance under which she laboured; she never, in his presence, attempted spontaneously to join in general conversation; she only in general gave answers to the questions put to her, but she did, of her own accord, and not in answer to any question, make a statement to respondent on the day of his taking instructions for her will, viz. 'that she had been ill-used by the Marshes (her own words) and that she could not get an account from them, nor her will out of their hands.'" Here, again, is difficulty [131] of speech; she seldom spoke but in answer to questions, generally only in monosyllables, yet she entered on a "statement of her affairs:" but what does the witness specify?—that she had been ill-used by the Marshes, and could not "get her will." These are the very circumstances about which Harding had been "worritting her," and might now either have impressed on her weakened mind or compelled her to hold out; or they are the mere repetition of what Harding had previously told Edward Tyrrell. It was the tale that was to be told and that might easily be learnt. As to "not getting the will," either she was capable or incapable; if capable, she must, I repeat, have been aware of the duplicate delivered to Apostles, and have purposely concealed it: if incapable, then she might have forgotten the existence of that duplicate, but then she would not have had mind and memory sufficient to remember the contents, nor consequently to revoke her will. But what is the ostensible reason? "The Marshes had used her ill." Is that true? or, if true, does it account for cutting off all Mrs. Amelia Marsh's children, and passing over all her other friends, and abandoning all the other peculiarities of the wills of 1816 and 1818.

Again, how does Mr. Tyrrell state in chief the actual instructions? "After Mr. Harding had so left the room, deponent and the deceased being left together, the deceased said, 'I wish to leave my property to Mr. Harding after my death, and a legacy to each of my old servants.'" Now, on reading this, it would be supposed the deceased, the moment she was left alone with Mr. Tyrrell, began the conversation, [132] and of her own accord commenced giving the instructions, perfectly understanding, and spontaneously proceeding with, the transaction intended to take place; and in that view, as far as capacity was concerned, it would be a favourable fact: it would not indeed go far as to the control, marital authority, and undue influence of the husband (the more important branch of the case); for it was a short lesson easily imprinted and remembered, which was to be submitted to and repeated. But when the witness is pressed upon interrogatories, it has not even this circumstance (favourable at least to the capacity) of the deceased proceeding of her own accord to give the instructions; for, on the twentieth interrogatory, Mr. Tyrrell answers, "The instructions given by the deceased for her will were given freely by her, but not until respondent put questions to her on the subject; no third person was present. After two preliminary questions (viz. whether she wished the will made by Delmar to be revoked, and to make a new will; to both of which the deceased answered 'Yes'). Respondent asked her, 'To whom she wished to leave her property?' she answered, 'To Mr. Harding after my death.' 'What! the whole of your property?' 'Yes, the whole, except legacies to my servants.' Respondent then requested her to give him the names of the servants, and amount of their legacies, which she did with some difficulty, that is, she was not able to articulate their names readily; and she did not appear to have made up her mind till then as to the amount of such legacies. Mr. Harding at this period returned [133] into the room; respondent inquired who she would have as executors? she said, 'Mr. Harding,' and, turning to him, added, 'and the gentleman you named.' Mr. Harding said, 'You mean Mr. Tyrrell of Lincoln's Inn,' she answered, 'Yes.'" This gives a very different colour to the business: even these short instructions, instead of originating with the deceased or being delivered of her own accord, are extracted from her by interrogatories.

The Court has no reason to impute to the witness any intention to misrepresent; but he was duped, he was prepossessed, he had had repeated conversations with Harding: he had got thoroughly impressed that the deceased thought herself ill-used by Marsh; that she could not get her will; that she wished to make a new will and to give her property to Harding: he was not aware of the disposition in the former wills—the considerations on which they had been made—the manner in which they had been adhered to—the fruitless attempts Harding had made to get the deceased to take her concerns out of Marsh's hands and to transfer them to himself; not knowing these circumstances, perhaps it may be too much to impute to Mr. Edward Tyrrell even a want of vigilance in allowing himself to be so imposed upon by Mr. Harding, or a want of penetration and sagacity in not suspecting his objects. But, hearing that there had been a former will and that the state of her mind was doubted it is to be regretted that he did not inquire a little more into the contents of that former will, and probe the mind and memory of the deceased as to the disposition she had before made and was now about [134] to revoke. Seeing also the large property she had at her disposal under these deeds of settlement made in the year 1816, how weakened she was in capacity, and how entirely the origin and conduct of this new will was managed by the husband himself—everything passing in his presence except mere formalities—it is to be regretted that Mr. Edward Tyrrell's penetration did not point out to him the propriety and importance of satisfying himself that there were no marital authority and undue influence interposed; and yet all he hunts after is a little testable capacity to give effect to a testamentary disposition which, upon the previous representations of Harding, he allowed himself to believe she really wished to make.

If the instructions, with the previous visits of the two medical men, do not satisfy the mind of the Court as to the testamentary intentions of the deceased, the execution, on the ninth of March, carries the case no further. Here are the same sort of inquiries made: the husband is present, except being sent out of the room for a minute, just while the formality of the execution by the attempt to sign takes place. There is, however, the single circumstance of her desiring George's legacy to be increased and made the same as the other two servants. Whether even that circumstance is not more like a cunning artifice, devised by Harding, in order to give the deceased the appearance of capacity, than the spontaneous desire of her own mind, may admit of some doubt; for neither George's station, nor the length of her service, nor the deceased's former estimate of it, lead to her being placed on the same level with Rigden [135] and Apostles.(a) It may have been, and it looks, like a contrived suggestion of Harding; for his conduct has exposed him to every suspicion.

On the 11th of April the deceased has a fresh paralytic attack, and yet on the 21st here is a codicil obtained from her, which, Mr. Edward Tyrrell being out of town, Mr. Timothy Tyrrell is employed to prepare. He comes with the same prepossessions and impressions derived from Mr. Harding, and he ventures upon no better ground to communicate the same prepossessions and aspersions to Dixon, the medical attendant; for on the fourth article he says, "Deponent briefly stated to Mr. Dixon that Mr. Marsh had prevailed on the deceased to make a gift to him of 10,000l. and had procured from her a will in his favour, and also, unknown to Mr. Harding, a settlement of her property." There is no proof of one nor of the other; the will is not in his favour, though it is in favour of part of his family. "That she had since made a will revoking that in favour of Mr. Marsh, and that the last will was in favour of Mr. Harding." All this he states as fact upon mere hearsay, proceeding from no better source than the imputations of a most interested party—the husband—who was getting a new will, almost exclusively in his own favour. Here the husband is still more directly an agent; he is the medium of communication between the deceased and the witnesses, the deceased being by the last paralytic attack rendered so weak as [136] to be unable to express herself intelligibly to Mr. Tyrrell.

What, then, is the Court to consider this codicil? the wish of a capable testatrix,

(a) It appeared from Rigden's evidence on the eleventh article and thirteenth interrogatory "that he went into the deceased's service, as footman, in 1795; Mary Apostles, as housemaid and lady's maid, in 1799; and Mary George, as cook, in 1804."

or the fraudulent contrivance of the husband to give a semblance of confirmation to the will? The witnesses were off their guard, for since it was to the prejudice of the husband, they might easily have pinned their faith upon him as to the volition of the deceased, not discovering that he might have quite a different object in view. The codicil confirms the will, but what is its disposing object? to give rings to three near and dear friends of the deceased—the three Misses Binstead. The deceased by her will had given them an annuity of 100l. with benefit of survivorship: a ring is now substituted! that change is not very probable: but the fatal fact is, that two of the Misses Binstead were dead! the death of one, if not of both of them, must have been known to the deceased. Harding might not have known either event, for the deceased does not seem to have been in much confidential communication with him: but what must have been the state of her capacity when this codicil was obtained? The transaction lies under a strong suspicion of being a contrivance to give the appearance of confirmation to the will: and it is the only confirmation; for as to any recognition of the act, through any disinterested parties, there is none.

The case in my judgment might rest here: but there are detached circumstances which throw some light upon the character and conduct of the transaction.

Repeated applications were made to Marsh [137] for money, but all access to the deceased was prohibited him: drafts were drawn and presented, one for 400l., a second for 100l., and a third for 100l. When the drafts were presented the signatures were suggested not to be the hand-writing of the deceased; Mr. Edward Tyrrell presented the last himself and said he saw it signed. An offer was made to carry the money to the deceased, but access was refused. This seems extraordinary. What reasonable grounds could there be for refusal, if the deceased were a free and capable agent, dissatisfied with the Messrs. Marsh, and having with sufficient capacity transferred her entire confidence to her husband and freely made a will in his favour? She was under the protection of her husband, assisted by his attornies, and residing in her own house: where could be the fear or the objection to the money being carried and delivered to her? She would merely have had to recognize the draft, and declare her wishes to have the money. When the signatures had been doubted, it is extraordinary that the parties, for their own credit, did not insist that some person—if not one of the Messrs. Marsh, that some clerk belonging to their house—should accompany them to the deceased to verify the signature: but, even now, the drafts themselves are not forthcoming.

Here is, however, a letter produced on the other side, dated the 31st of March, addressed to "Messrs. Marsh," demanding the delivery of the deeds, wills, and papers; and signed "Sophia Harding." Here are also a great number of drafts signed by the deceased from 1817 to 1820. The signatures to the earlier drafts are a neat formal hand; to the latter [138] drafts, from the autumn of 1824, the signature becomes very slovenly, bearing very little similitude to the earlier ones; and the suggestion is, that the signature to the latter is a forged imitation of the early signature of the deceased. The explanation offered is, not that the deceased really signed the letter of herself, but that her hand was guided by Harding. When she executed the will on the 9th of March she could not make any signature; she attempted but failed, and was obliged to make her mark—a mere cross. Whether a person with her hand in this paralysed condition could so far assist in the signature, or her hand could be so used as to make a signature nearly approaching the original character of her hand-writing, is more than the Court will venture to give an opinion upon: but here is her hand entirely in the control and use of her husband, and there is no proof that her mind was not equally under his influence and authority; he uses both to endeavour to get at her property and her papers, excluding from all access to her those persons to whom her property, and her papers had been intrusted by herself. The inferences against the husband are obvious.

It should have been noticed that earlier in March, about a week after the execution of the will, Mr. Edward Tyrrell, in the character of the deceased's solicitor, wrote to Mr. Marsh requiring her account. Mr. Marsh, in his answer, says "that he has directed his son to make out Mrs. Harding's account immediately, but before he puts it into other hands than her own he deems it necessary to see the deceased in person; and he proposes, accompanied by [139] Mr. Delmar, to meet Mr. Tyrrell at the deceased's house:" to this Mr. Tyrrell answers "that the deceased refuses to see him, and has given orders that he shall not be admitted." Mr. Marsh replies, "He cannot consider such a message as emanating from her own free will, and must persevere in his determination, more especially as it is in compliance with her repeated injunctions, both to him and to his son, not to give any papers or information respecting her concerns but to herself personally." The truth of this is confirmed by the history and by the res gestæ. Here then is a careful exclusion of Marsh, of his son, and of Delmar; here is an attempt to get the original papers and to get money; first by the solicitor, Tyrrell, then by drafts with the deceased's asserted signature, then by this letter, with a signature at best made by Harding guiding and using the deceased's hand: but though Marsh offers to attend with papers and to meet Mr. Tyrrell; though Arthur Cuthbert Marsh offers to carry the money and to deliver it into the deceased's own hand; though she is living in her own house with her husband, and Marsh only proposes to see her at a time to be fixed by Tyrrell, yet non-access is enforced under a pretended order from the deceased herself to exclude these, her longest and dearest friends. Certainly these circumstances do pretty strongly increase the suspicion that Harding was at this time making use of the deceased as a mere instrument in his own hands, and for his own purposes.

There is one further circumstance to be noticed. The deceased died in the middle of [140] the night, between the 7th and 8th of March. Harding alone was with her; no other person was present; no other person was sitting up; so that she must have died rather unexpectedly, though he admits her incapacity for a few days before her death. He states "that she died about four o'clock in the morning; that he went out about six, leaving the bedroom locked up and no key in the door, and without apprizing the servants of her death; that he returned about half-past eleven, unlocked the door, and then told the servants of the deceased's death;" but he even then desired them not to communicate it to any one, particularly not to the Messrs. Marsh or Mr. Delmar. The next morning being the 9th, he and Mr. John Tyrrell are sworn executors, as appears by the jurat on the will. I cannot understand, if the making of this will was a fair and honest transaction, why, this poor woman dying in the night, her body was to be locked up and the matter kept secret from the servants for seven or eight hours, or why the death was afterwards to be kept secret, especially from the Messrs. Marsh and Delmar, or why there was this great haste in getting sworn to the will. Where was the necessity for this clandestinity and contrivance? Here was non-access to the deceased, and exclusion of the Messrs. Marsh, not only when the deceased was alive, but even after her death. What could induce an honest man, having acted honestly and fairly, to have pursued this conduct? It serves to confirm the suspicion that Mr. Harding has throughout been a man of contrivance; that he has by misrepresentation induced the witnesses to embark in his object, and that these [141] persons have in a great degree been the dupes of his imposition.

Upon the whole, having in various parts of the case explained the feeling that has been impressed on my mind in respect to the transaction, and the grounds and principles upon which that impression has been formed, it is superfluous to recapitulate the several points. Considering the extreme improbability of this entire change of disposition—the means used by the husband to urge her to place her concerns in his hands—her long resistance till reduced to a weakened state of capacity—the presence of the husband conducting all these transactions, it is not proved to my conviction that this latter will was the real mind and wish of a capable and free testatrix.

On the contrary, I am of opinion that it was the will of Mr. Harding—obtained by him by undue influence and marital authority—contrary to the real wishes and intentions of the deceased, as far as she was capable at that time of forming any testamentary intention.

In my judgment she never did depart with a willing and disposing mind from that disposition of her fortune which she made in 1818. That will therefore remains her true will: and as the whole transaction of this latter will originated with Mr. Harding, and the whole expense of this suit was occasioned by him (for Mr. John Tyrrell is merely the nominal party), I feel bound in justice to condemn Mr. Harding in the costs of Mr. Marsh.

[142] BIRD v. BIRD. Prerogative Court, 17th Dec., 1828.—Where the drawer and attesting witnesses of a will (executed ten days before death by a person of eighty-five, in weak bodily health) are confirmed as to capacity, volition, and free agency by adverse witnesses, and by the deceased's affections, declarations, and recognitions; the general character of the drawer (an attorney employed by the deceased for many years), and slight discrepancies in the evidence of the factum are not material. A will, in such a case, pronounced for, and the opposer, who had pleaded incapacity, conspiracy, fraud and circumvention, condemned in the costs incurred since the giving in of his allegation.

[See as to costs, p. 553, post.]

The King's advocate and Lushington in support of the will.

Burnaby and Addams contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The parties in this cause are the following:—The deceased is John Bicknell: the person propounding the will is William Bird, a nephew and the sole executor: and the person opposing it is John Bird, another nephew and one of those entitled in distribution. The personal property is of the value of 10,000l. or 12,000l., and the realty is about 200l. a year, in addition to an estate of about 300l. a year, entailed upon the heir at law. The deceased at the time of his death was a bachelor, and his family consisted of one sister, Sarah Bicknell; one niece, the daughter of a brother, Mary Waldron; and four children of a deceased sister, named Bird, William Bird and John Bird the parties, Mary Webber and Joan Bond respectively married. The personalty therefore was distributable—one-third to the sister, one-third to the niece, Mary Waldron, and the remaining third among the four Birds, that is one-twelfth to each: so that supposing 12,000l. was to be distributed, the sister would take 4000l., Mrs. Waldron 4000l., and William Bird, John Bird, Mary Webber and Joan Bond each 1000l.

[143] The deceased's heir at law was a great nephew, John Bicknell, descended from an elder brother, Peter: to him the real estate would descend, but he is not entitled in distribution; a real estate, however, as I have already said, of 300l. a year, which was entailed, devolved to him on the deceased's death.

Two wills are produced: one dated on the 21st of September, 1787, forty years before the testator's death: but all the parties benefited under it are dead, except his sister Sarah, who was a legatee under it for 300l.; so that that will would leave the deceased nearly in a state of intestacy.

The other will, the one propounded, is dated on the 13th of September, 1827, ten days before the death; and it gives his estate at Stapley to his niece, Mary Waldron, for life, then to her son and his heirs: his estate, called Lippencotts, to his great nephew John Bird, son of William: an annuity of 100l. to his sister Sarah Bicknell; 200l. to his niece Mary Webber, and 200l. to each of her daughters; 200l. to his niece Joan Bond; 50l. to his nephew John Bird, and 50l. to each of his children; 50l. to John Sharland, a great nephew; and 50l. to Lucy Hardwidge, a great niece, neither of whom is entitled in distribution. The house, garden, and orchard at Bradford, where he resided, to his sister for life, and then to Mrs. Webber. The residue of his real and personal estate to William Bird, who is appointed the sole executor. Here then all parts of his family who are, and some who are not, in distribution, are noticed: but the bulk is given to William Bird; and he is placed in the confidential situation of executor.

[144] Who then is the party opposing the will? Not the sister, who in case of an intestacy would be entitled to one-third; on the contrary she is a witness against her own interest, in support of the will; not Mrs. Waldron, the niece, who also would be entitled to one-third; not Mrs. Bond, nor Mrs. Webber, conjointly with John Bird; but John Bird alone, who would only be entitled to one-twelfth under an intestacy: yet it is not even John Bird, for his son, an attorney, who has been examined, proves on interrogatory that the real opponent is John Bicknell, the great nephew, who is the heir at law and not entitled in distribution. Instead of trying the validity of the paper at common law, where his real interest could alone be ascertained, where there would be a vivâ voce examination before a jury, supposed to be the best mode of detecting fraud and perjury, John Bicknell has set up John Bird as the opponent here, and has agitated the question in a jurisdiction which extends only over personalty in which he has no interest. Certainly, this is an extraordinary mode of proceeding, not calculated at the outset to create favourable inferences respecting the opposition; for contrivances always suggest a suspicion that there is something wrong and rotten at the bottom.

The will upon the face of it is regularly executed, and is attested by three witnesses —the attorney who received the instructions and drew the will, and two respectable neighbours who were called in to see the fact of execution. They have been examined in support of the factum: and if they are credited, if the circumstances they state are believed, the case is [145] proved. The drawer of the will details what passed at the instructions and preparation; which, if true, sufficiently shews the mind and intention of the deceased: that account is confirmed by the act of execution and by all the witnesses speaking to their belief, supported by the facts which then occurred, of the deceased's being of sound mind and capable of giving effect to the will.

Before examining the evidence of the factum more closely, it may be proper to refer to the grounds of opposition. These are—

1st. The state of the deceased's affections towards the different branches of his family, rendering this disposition improbable.

2d. The state of his capacity; which, if not amounting to absolute and total incapacity, yet rendered him liable to fraud and imposition.

3d. A conspiracy between Mrs. Webber and William Bird to assume the custody of the deceased, and to exclude other parts of the family; and the consequent obtaining of this will by fraud and circumvention.

4. The association in this conspiracy of Symes, the drawer, a person of bad character, of low practice, and the particular friend of William Bird.

In support of these grounds of opposition a great mass of evidence has been gone into, and great expence has been incurred. Each party contends for costs, and I concur in thinking it must be a case for costs: for if this fraudulent conspiracy is established, the party who has framed and engaged in it must pay all the costs incurred in detecting it: while, on the other hand, if the grounds of opposition fail; if the imputation [146] of fraud is not sustained, the party who has been setting up an unfounded charge, a charge which he is unable to prove, must pay the costs which he has occasioned.

The mass of evidence, though great, does not require to be minutely detailed: but it will be sufficient to state the result of it upon the different points; and for that purpose the case (in comparison with the length of the depositions) lies within a very narrow compass.

The deceased was of a very advanced age, from 84 to 86, living at Bradford in Somersetshire, and his sister, Sarah Bicknell, who was four years older, resided with him. He had been engaged all his life in farming; part of the land which he occupied was his own property; and he being, as described, a penurious, reserved man, his property seems to have increased; for looking to the will of 1787, it is not probable that the property was nearly so considerable at that time. I have already stated what it was at the time of his death.

Upon the first head of opposition—the state of his affections—it is pleaded that "he had a great affection for his sister;" but this will is not inconsistent with that affection: for she was very old, she had a property of her own; he leaves her in addition to that property an annuity of 100l. and the house, garden, and orchard for life. This, under the circumstances, is more probable than by an intestacy to leave 4000l. at her own absolute disposal; but the more important part of the plea is the particular regard for John Bird, and the disaffection for William Bird. If that were proved, the principles laid down in the case referred to in the [147] argument, and decided last term, would apply.(a) The disposition would be against probability, and the case would set out with strong presumptions against the evidence of the factum: but if the fact be the very reverse; if William Bird was the favoured relation, then a strong foundation is laid, by the probability of the disposition, in order to support and corroborate the account of the instructions and execution.

To resort to particular circumstances in the depositions upon this head is quite unnecessary: whether the deceased was angry with William upon one subject, or with John upon another, need not be sifted; for the conduct of the deceased, in the different degree of intercourse he kept up with the two brothers, quite satisfies me. John Bird never came to the family parties at the Bradford revels, did not attend the funerals of the family, had very little communication with the deceased: it matters not in what this originated, whether in dissatisfaction at the conduct of John Bird respecting his father's will or his behaviour to his sisters; or whether it was of long date: the non-intercourse continued to the testator's death. John Bird had a large share of his father's property: on the other hand, William Bird, whether right or wrong in his differences with his wife, is constantly in the most friendly intercourse with the deceased, is consulted by him, assists in the management of his farm, and in buying and selling his stock and crops. There are various circumstances shewing that he was the favourite nephew; most of John Bird's witnesses admit those [148] circumstances; and the deceased's partiality continued and was shewn during his last illness and down to his death.

The effect produced was not extraordinary, viz. that several persons were impressed with the expectation that William Bird would have the bulk of the deceased's property. With respect to the affection pleaded for the heir at law, the evidence by no means establishes that the deceased had any intention that more of the landed property should go to him than the entailed estates, of which the deceased could not deprive him.

Here, then, the main ground of opposition, the point of affection, wholly fails: there is no improbability in the disposition; none in selecting William Bird to be his principal heir and executor, and in giving small legacies only to John Bird and his children, in order to shew no resentment in this last act.

The next ground is the state of capacity. The attempt to set up a case of total absence of testamentary capacity has been disavowed: but it is asserted that the deceased's mind was so weakened as to be incapable of protecting him against fraud, undue influence, or importunity. If so, if testamentary capacity existed, it is at least necessary that the practice of fraud and circumvention should be clearly proved. The fourth article takes a wide scope: prior to entering upon the account of the last three weeks of his life, it goes into the history of his former illnesses, one five years before; another six months before. Where parties resort to such long ranges, bearing so remotely and slightly on the real point in issue, so far from serving their own cause, they [149] only afford marks of its weakness. The substance of this long article, which occupies three pages, is as above stated. It thus concludes: "That from the commencement of his last illness, but more especially during the last three weeks of his life, the deceased was of unsound or greatly weakened and impaired mind and memory, and was in a state and condition both mental and bodily which peculiarly exposed him to, and rendered him absolutely incapable of protecting himself from, either actual fraud practised upon him, or undue influence and importunity; and that at no time within that period was the deceased competent to the making and executing of the pretended will propounded in the cause, or to the disposition of his real and personal estate therein contained, or to the doing of any other complicated act of that or the like nature requiring thought, judgment and reflection." This is a little deviating from the usual form in pleading capacity, but the Court will take the article, as it presumes it was intended.

Now it is unnecessary to go further back than the deceased's last illness. Up to that time he was quite an extraordinary old man of his age, in full possession of his faculties, mental and bodily. John Bird's own witness, Bridge, a medical man, who, however, never attended the deceased, who was but slightly acquainted with him, who never saw him during his illness, who is brought to give a speculative opinion upon a supposed case, says on the ninth interrogatory: "He last saw the deceased about six weeks before his death, he was riding on horseback alone about a mile from his own house. His conver-[150]-sation was upon common topics, and lasted a minute or two." This was the state of the deceased up to his last illness.

The principal witnesses to support the description given in the fourth article wholly disprove it; Bennett, a labourer, who sat up with him at nights; and the medical attendant, Mr. Liddon. The deceased's illness was a violent inflammation of the lungs, which affected his breathing, and required the application of a blister on his chest: after a time he had the thrush, which affected his speech till his mouth was cleansed. Bennett did not attend in the day time, only by night, till the last week or ten days, and even then in the day time only occasionally. It is true that this witness states "the deceased used sometimes to say things deponent could not make out: this was not constantly, only now and then: at times he was quite sensible." But what might be the wanderings in the night, "now and then," of a person labouring under an acute inflammatory disorder, or during the last few days of his life, is not very material. This account goes but a little way to prove general incapacity, or even what is called "fluctuating capacity." It is not necessary further to consider his evidence, as the Court has before it the much more satisfactory testimony of the medical attendant, produced by John Bird in support of his plea, Mr. John Liddon, who deposes "he knew Mr. Bicknell for a period of twenty-seven years; and from 1816 to the deceased's death was his constant medical man: the last illness which the said deceased had was about a month previous to his death; by reference to his book he is [151] able to depose that he first went to attend the deceased, in consequence of it, on the 29th of August, 1827, and he died on the 23d of September following; deponent was sent for to attend him as he had been taken ill; the message, which was brought by the boy Burford, did not describe it as urgent; and on going to Bradford he found the deceased had been ill some few days; he was in bed breathing with great difficulty, and, with what deponent never observed in him before, an intermitting pulse: the inflammation on the lungs had come on as usual, and from the first moment he saw him deponent considered the case to be a lost one; the deceased was worse than he ever had seen him: he had not at this time a complaint which came on in an after state of his illness, viz. the thrush, or, as it is called by the common people, the white mouth; it always indicates a breaking up; it is an alarming symptom, but this did not appear for a fortnight after. Deponent, from the time of his so going to see the deceased, attended him regularly twice a day till his death; he never missed a day without seeing him once, but on two days the first or second visit was paid by his brother and present partner Henry Liddon; one of these was the day before his death, the other was about a week after deponent's first visit as near as he can recollect. Deponent's times of attendance were eight in the morning and six in the evening: he believes the deceased wished him to come oftener, for he understood from Mrs. Webber that he complained of his neglecting him; but deponent could not go oftener, [152] as Taunton is five miles from Bradford." He then describes the remedies he applied, which "for a few days occasioned a slight improvement, and deponent began to think the deceased might again rally, but he soon relapsed, and after a fortnight the white mouth came on; deponent checked it for at least two days, but it again got a head, because the deceased refused to take the medicines ordered; he would not take any medicines for the last fortnight." Then, after detailing the means used for clearing the phlegm from the deceased's throat, Mr. Liddon continues; "The deceased, from the first of his attending him, was confined to his bed; he never saw him attempt to get out of bed or to return into it, and from the decay of his bodily powers, which was extremely rapid, and such as to force itself on the deceased's attention, and produce depression of spirits, he thinks he could not do this without assistance; for in raising the deceased for the purpose of gargling his throat they were obliged to prop him up; nor could he feed himself, except occasionally he would put a cup to his mouth;" deponent further saith "that the visits he paid the deceased were generally of a quarter of an hour's length, sometimes longer, or just as he was able to extricate the phlegm, but never shorter; he cannot depose to having on any occasion heard the deceased utter an irrational or incoherent expression." From what I have already quoted it is manifest that this witness had the best opportunity of judging of the condition and capacity of the deceased: and he does not remember an "incoherent expression." He cannot [153] say that on any occasion, when he saw the deceased in his last illness, he considered him to be in an unsound state of mind, or in a state unfit to make his will, or do any serious or rational act, or even an act that might require some little exercise of thought; he never saw him but he appeared quite capable to dispose of his property, or to make any testamentary arrangements to which he might feel inclined: their interviews were pretty much alike, and their conversation respected chiefly, almost exclusively, his state of health; deponent on entering the room generally said, 'Well, sir, what is the report of the day?' and he recollects his invariable answer was, 'I do not feel very well, sir;' it was always that, for deponent recollects his rejoinder was 'Very well, sir, why no, sir, I suppose not, or there would be no need to see me:' and the deceased, in reply to deponent's hoping he was better, would often say, 'I don't think I shall ever be better in this world,' or to that effect: deponent recollects being struck with this as shewing the belief he had that he was sinking, which he had never done in any former illness." Therefore, prior to this, the deceased might not be impressed with a sense of his dangerous state. "Deponent never recollects to have seen him in any particular state of exhaustion, or weakness, more at one time than another, but every day he was getting weaker; he was never in deponent's presence in such a state as not to be excited to attend to what was passing around him; he always attended to deponent, except the last day or two, when a degree of stupor came on." [154] This, it is to be recollected, was several days after the will had been executed. "Deponent has no idea that the deceased was unable to protect himself from fraud, undue influence, or control: to deponent he always appeared quite his own master, and was able to resist any improper interference with his concerns."

Here, then, is a complete disprover of the case set up by the opposer's own witness, a medical person, attending twice a day, at eight in the morning and six in the evening, competent, and having full opportunity of forming a judgment, and shewing that the deceased was fully capable of making a disposition of his fortune; negativing that he was peculiarly liable to be circumvented, or imposed upon, as alleged in the plea: at all events rendering it necessary to shew by decisive evidence that fraud and circumvention were practised upon him.

The next ground is a conspiracy formed by Mrs. Webber and William Bird, they obtaining the custody of the deceased, and excluding the relatives, and taking Symes for their associate. Of any custody, of any exclusion of his relations, there is no proof; but the reverse is proved: for John Bird, the son of the nephew, not a youth, but a young man of the age of thirty-one, an attorney at Taunton, was admitted, and was alone with the deceased after he knew that the will was made. He states, "That on the average during the last eight years he may have visited his uncle about once in two or three months, and on such occasions has dined with him." "About a week or ten days before his death (on the Monday or [155] Tuesday after the making of the will), having heard of the deceased's illness, he went to his house, and saw him in bed, for about fifteen minutes: the deceased knew him, shook hands with him, said, 'How is your health now?'" This person had been in ill health, a circumstance with which the deceased was acquainted. On the Monday or Tuesday then, after the witness understood the will was made, there was no custody—no difficulty of access—no incapacity. This charge, therefore, is quite unfounded and disproved. Next, where is the proof of fraudulent conspiracy? Mrs. Webber was the person who sent for Mr. Symes, but the will is against her interest; and proof of preconcert, between her and William Bird, there is none.

The case now arrives at the factum, not with any ground of improbability against the disposition, nor semblance of adherence to the old will (though no disaffection existed towards the party principally benefited thereby)—not with a testator deprived of testamentary capacity, but proved, by his own medical attendant, to possess faculties equal to the act, and to be not liable to imposition: the case itself too stripped of any evidence of fraud and contrivance; nor was there any concealment; for Mrs. Webber had previously mentioned the subject to Mr. Liddon, who was of opinion that the deceased was not incapable.

On the afternoon of the 12th of September Mrs. Webber sent a note by the boy Burford, desiring the attendance of Mr. Symes; but here again was no concealment, for Burford told Bennett where he was going. Bennett said, "He dare say it was to make master's will." Bur-[156]-ford went to Symes' house; he was not at home, but Burford found him at Mr. Were's, and delivered the note. William Bird happened to be there at the time, and was not at Bradford concerting the plan with Mrs. Webber, nor was he expecting that Symes would be sent for, otherwise he would have kept him at home or had him near Bradford. Symes had been employed by the deceased for several years; he had seen the deceased before during this very illness, but was not so forward as to hint, or suggest, a will to him. The deceased, as I have observed under this old will made forty years before, was in effect in a state of intestacy. Persons, however, who are saving money, and altering and adding to their property almost continually, are very apt to postpone making a disposition of it by will: if penurious, they do not like the expense—they fear they may have to do it twice over; and even the extreme of old age does not extinguish this spirit of postponement and procrastination.

Symes arrived, and had an interview with the deceased on the evening of the 12th. I see no improbability in his relation of what passed, as applying to the deceased, still less any improper conduct in Symes; on the contrary, with propriety and forbearance, he waited till the deceased should commence the business. He says, "He found the deceased alone, and very ill in bed: deponent was very much struck by the great alteration in his appearance, and from his look deponent believed he would not recover. The deceased said 'he had got a blister on his stomach:' he shook hands with deponent, and requested him to sit down by the bed-[157]-side, which he did; the deceased then said 'he had sent for and wished to speak to deponent about some property of his (which deponent knew well) at Wellington, that he wished to sell it; and thought he could obtain a good price for it:' he went on talking about his houses and estate there, but deponent thought it was no time for the deceased then to be thinking of selling his estates." They conversed upon this and other business for about half an hour, when the witness, "finding it late, rose to go: the deceased seemed as if he had not done what he wished, and said with an anxious manner, 'When will you come again, Mr. Symes?' Deponent replied, 'Whenever you please, sir;' he answered, 'Can you come to-morrow?' deponent said, 'Certainly, if he wished it;' the deceased added, 'At what hour?'—'at any hour it might suit him.' 'Would ten o'clock suit deponent?' 'It would;' and deceased then requested him to be there at that hour, which deponent promised. He then went away; the deceased shook hands at parting, and said 'he should expect deponent at ten o'clock.'" It appears, however, that Symes afterwards resolved to be at the house earlier, in order to meet the medical man. There was nothing unnatural in this conduct in the deceased: he could not prevail upon himself to begin the subject, and Symes very properly forbore to introduce it, but the deceased himself appointed him to come the next morning. This, as really passing, is not improbable, but as a fabrication is highly so. The deceased had a very bad night. Bennett states, "he thought [158] the deceased could not have got over it, but he certainly did revive wonderfully, and he believes the deceased was as sound in mind during that morning after, as during all his illness; may be more so." This again is not adverse to the transaction: if he were thinking about the will he was going to make it might render him more than usually restless; if his disorder was really more violent that night—if he had spasms and paroxysms of pain, as Bennett describes him to have had—it would be the more likely to decide him to proceed with the making of his will the next morning. There is, therefore, no improbability in the course of the transaction. Liddon saw him in the morning, conversed with him, was of opinion he was capable, and mentioned to the deceased that Symes was below stairs.

There is some confusion in Symes' account, as given upon his first and second examination, as to the time when he was at the deceased's house on the morning of the 13th; but it does not appear to be any thing more than lapse of memory; not wilful misrepresentation. Symes proceeds to give an account of the preparation of the will, and of receiving the instructions from the deceased, which he immediately committed to writing. It is said that it was "a will by interrogation:" but it was not what is generally understood by the expression; it was not, will you give such a person such a sum? and then a mere affirmative acquiescence; but in this case some of the persons were named, and the deceased freely and voluntarily declared what he would give. He himself began the instructions: Symes thus deposes: "He found [159] the deceased in bed, but evidently much better:" agreeing with Bennett in that respect. "Deceased bid him sit down, and at once entered on the subject of this will: 'Mr. Symes, I wish to speak with you about making an alteration in my will.'" Great stress has been laid on the term "alteration in my will:" but I do not see the force of the observations, nor that any advantage can be derived from them; for if the deceased were capable of making an alteration in his will, he was equally capable of making a new will. Symes proceeds: "That never having made a will for the deceased, although he had been his solicitor for many years, he asked him 'if he had a will:' deceased replied, 'he had; but wished it to be altered, or an addition made to it.' Deponent wished to see the will: to this deceased objected, and said 'he could not.'" Much discussion ensued about the production of this old will: the deceased persisted in saying "it could not be seen," and Symes, after repeating in reply, "Then really, sir, I cannot make the codicil," quitted the room, informed William Bird (whom he met in the passage or on the stairs) of what had passed, and the witness was, in a few minutes, called up again into the bed-room: "He found the deceased sitting up in bed, apparently he had been out of bed, and W. Bird said he had helped his uncle out, to get the will himself from the bottom of an old coffer at the foot of the bed: . . . the deceased had evidently read the will, or Bird had read it to him, for he said to deponent, 'I must make a new will altogether.' . . . Pen and ink being brought, deponent took the de-[160]-ceased's instructions from his own mouth to prepare the new will; he made no draft of it, he wrote it off fair at once, in the deceased's presence: he commenced writing the deceased's name, residence, and date, and then looked for directions to the deceased, who said, 'I shall give Molly Waldron, my niece, my estate at Stapley for her life, and after her death to her son, Peter.'" So it was the deceased who commenced the instructions: "Deponent did not know the estate, but he considered it freehold, and wrote down a devise thereof accordingly: he then looked to the deceased for further directions: the deceased was silent, as if considering what should come next, when Mr. Bird said (they three being alone in the room), 'Do you mean, Uncle, to give my son, John, any thing?' to which deceased replied, 'I'll give him my place at West Buckland.' Deponent inquired the name of it: deceased said 'it was called Lippencotts;' that name deponent wrote down, and asked, 'In whose occupation?' the deceased replied, 'My own:' deponent concluded it was a freehold, and, as deceased did not say it was for life only (as with the devise to Mrs. Waldron) he gave it in fee." This clause did spring from a question put by William Bird; but it was the deceased who settled what the devise should be. Symes proceeds with a circumstantial detail of the instructions; (a) [161] and if all his statement be true, there is no doubt of the deceased's volition, nor was there [162] any thing of dictation: the deceased decided for himself, and his family were all brought fairly to his recollection. But the main point for my consideration is the disposition of the residue; and, in respect to that, William Bird had actually quitted

(a) "As deponent was looking to the deceased for something more, Mrs. Bicknell, deceased's sister, who deponent knew well, came into the room and exclaimed, 'Brother, what will you leave me?' he answered, '£100 a year:' deponent enquired 'if he should charge his remaining real estate with this annuity,' and deceased replied, 'Yes,' and deponent made it so. Mrs. Bicknell then left the room, but afterwards came in again: Bird then said, 'What do you mean to give Mrs. Webber' (the deceased's niece, then in the house, who came into the room for a short time, but not, as he thinks, till after this part of the will was settled); the deceased said, '£200.' The deceased was still sitting up in bed; he addressed his answers to deponent, who wrote that legacy down; Bird then added, 'What do you mean to give her children?' the deceased said, 'The same to each.' Deponent knew Mrs. Webber had four daughters and no sons, and he wrote that legacy also. Bird, as before, then asked, 'What do you mean to give Joan Bond?' (William Bird's sister, whom deponent knew well, as indeed almost all the deceased's relations); the deceased, in reply, said, '£200;' he wrote that also: Bird then said, 'What will you give brother John?' he replied, '£50:' he did not assign any reason for giving John Bird less than the rest: but William Bird asked, 'And what will you give his children?' he replied, 'The same:' deponent asked 'if he knew their names?' he said, 'No;' deponent understood there were eight, and said, 'Shall I write, to all the children that shall be living at your death?' and the deceased replied, 'Yes.' William Bird then enquired 'what the deceased would give John Sharland?' married to a great niece of the deceased, and he said, '£50.' Before, however, deponent could write this legacy, Bird left the room: and deponent then asked the deceased himself about Sharland's legacy: the deceased gave him the same answer, and he wrote it down. 'I mean,' the deceased added, 'to give the Bicknells £50 a-piece.' (John Sharland's wife was a Miss Bicknell.) There was another daughter, Mrs. Hardwidge, and deponent asked 'if he was to put her name down for £50,' and the deceased said, 'Yes.' At this time Mrs. Bicknell had come into the room again, and said, 'Brother, do you mean to give me any thing more? where am I to live—am I to be turned out of this house' (or to that effect)? to which the deceased replied, 'No, you shall have the house as long as you live.' Deponent then enquired of the deceased what it consisted of, and he replied, 'There was a house, orchard, and garden; I shall give them to her for life, and, after her death, to Mrs. Webber.' Deponent wrote all this down, and the deceased then asked him (they were now alone, for Mrs. Bicknell had left the room) 'to add up the legacies, and tell him their amount.' Upon deponent informing deceased they came to £1750 (so he thinks), the deceased, who said, 'I did not think it was so much,' or to that effect, seemed a little hurt at not having left more for the residue: deponent then said, 'Who is to have the rest?' the deceased replied, 'I shall give the rest to William (meaning William Bird), and make him my executor,' or to that effect. Deponent accordingly wrote this also, and having read it over several times to himself to see that there was no mistake in it which required correction, he added the concluding period, 'In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal the day and year first above written.'" the room before it was bequeathed. He was not named to the deceased: so this part of the transaction proceeded from the testator himself. If, then, this evidence can be believed, and if the witness be not wholly discredited, can I possibly doubt of capacity, intention, and volition? Here were free agency and the absence of fraud and circumvention.

It is unnecessary to proceed with this account of the preparation of the instrument. Two respectable neighbours, apparently quite disinterested, were called in to see and attest the execution. It is true much did not pass in their presence: but it was not natural that the deceased—with an inflamed chest, with a blister on, with a white mouth beginning, and being in some degree exhausted by the preparation of the will—would be disposed to say much: but he recognized them, he asked for his spectacles, [163] he signed, he published the instrument, he shook hands with one or both of them; and he thanked them. The witnesses at the time were satisfied of, and they now believe in, his testamentary capacity. There is some little variation between these witnesses and Symes as to the publication: but little variations will not affect the truth of the transaction. Symes says the deceased himself, of his own accord, used the words of publication. Rendell, the second witness, that the deceased was beginning to publish, but that Symes took this part of the matter up, and then the deceased repeated the words after him; and Carpenter, among other grounds, judges that the deceased was, on this occasion, capable, from the way in which he repeated the words of publication after Symes. There is nothing of material contradiction in these accounts: the proof then of instructions, execution, and capacity is sufficient on the condidit, unless there be some other circumstance to overturn it.

The remaining ground of impeaching the factum is the character of Symes: it is alleged that he is "a person of bad character, of low practice, a friend of William Bird, and that he made certain drunken declarations subsequently." Supposing all this to be true and proved, though it must shake his credit, so that the Court cannot give full faith to his single testimony, yet if he is supported by probability, and corroborated by other circumstances, the act itself and the instructions of the testator would not be defeated. If this were a will against all probability—the deceased nearly in a state of fatuity, or in the custody and under [164] the control of the person benefited—the general character of the attorney might indeed be important: but the disposition and the whole course of the transaction are probable, and the evidence of the witness is confirmed.

To go then into the general character and line of practice of Symes—to hunt up witnesses to prove that, thirty years ago, he was extremely ill-used under the popular outcry set up of his being a common informer, or the clerk of a common informer; to produce witnesses in order to attempt the introduction of a great deal of extraneous and irrelevant matter into the suit, such proceedings only shew the sort of spirit in which the cause has been conducted; and the same observation applies to the evidence respecting the disputes between William Bird and his wife. Symes may be more concerned in recovering debts than in drawing conveyances, but he does both; and, what is to his credit, he pays over the money when he has received it: he has long resided and practised at Wellington—from twenty to thirty years—his character must be well known—yet several of John Bird's own witnesses have employed him. The very professional duties of a country attorney, however respectable he may be, necessarily produce some enemies; and the unsuccessful suitor, whether client or adversary, is, not unfrequently, ready to censure, and be angry with, the attorney.

There is one other circumstance to which I think it is necessary to advert. Symes was the friend of William Bird, and both seem much too fond of drinking—a vice which, according to the evidence, is rather prevalent in that part [165] of the country; and on the day and after the execution of the will, elated for the sake of his friend and excited by liquor, Symes did, very imprudently and very improperly, go into a large company and express himself about this business in a very unbecoming manner. Such a communication was a great breach of his professional duty; but in these declarations, loosely made and loosely recollected, there is nothing satisfactorily proved to have been said that imports fraud or conspiracy in the making of the will. It was elated joy at a valid instrument having been executed, it was vain boasting and disclosure.

If, however, the witness be in some degree shaken in credit, or confused in his recollection, still, if the general substance of his evidence be corroborated by circumstances, the case is proved. There are circumstances of that description—testamentary declarations previously made by the deceased, and subsequent recognitions that the act had taken place.

The declarations, detailed by Shattock, appear quite natural and probable, and I see nothing to affect the credit of that witness in the particulars which he relates.(a) Though [166] the deceased generally was a reserved man, not addicted to speak of his concerns, yet the circumstances deposed to were such as to call forth the declarations, and they nearly concerned the witness; so that he is not likely to have misapprehended them: and the sincerity of the deceased is confirmed by his general conduct and confidence towards William Bird. So long ago, then, as 1817, he intended to appoint William Bird his executor, and to make a will in his favour; it was therefore no transient intention—it was long decided, and is consistent with his conduct and intercourse, though he procrastinated, and postponed the execution of his purpose.

The other declaration came from the deceased the last time he was at Buckland, shortly before his death, just when his illness was commencing, and tends more directly to shew that the instructions for this will originated with himself. Shattock says, "In the wheat harvest preceding the deceased's death the deceased rode up to him and began a conversation, by [167] asking deponent 'whether he had made up his mind about the fields?' deponent said 'he had not exactly done so;' upon which the deceased observed 'that he should very much wish to know,' and added, 'I'll tell you my reason, for I feel this illness and pain in my stomach, and I don't think I shall be here many years: I have made my will, but it is many years ago; it is an old will of a great many years' standing, and I mean to make another, and William Bird will have the management of it:' these were his exact words as near as deponent can recollect them, but deponent is quite sure they were to that precise effect: he says the last observation about William Bird was made in answer to the deponent, who, inquiring as to the rent, said, 'I can't tell, sir, into whose hands it will fall after your death:' to which he said, 'As to that, I can make your mind easy, for William Bird will have it all, and I mean to give him the greatest part of my property.' Before parting, the deceased said, 'Now do let me know in a day or two, because I want to make my new will.' After this the deponent did not see the deceased." This latter part of the conversation connects itself with, and in some degree accounts for, his conversation with Symes on the evening of the 12th: but finding himself worse on the night of the 12th, he, on the morning of the 13th, went at once to the making of the will. On that morning, immediately before the testamentary business, was his conversation with Liddon, his medical attendant. The evidence is by no means immaterial, and is to the following effect:—"On the morning of the [168] day on which the will in question was made he was at the deceased's, and was then introduced to Mr. Symes: Mrs. Webber asked deponent 'whether he still thought her uncle in a fit state to alter his will?' deponent replied 'he would go up and see:' he accordingly went up; asked the deceased the necessary questions connected with his disease; found him pretty much the same as usual; believes the thrush had not come on: in the course of conversation he said to the deceased, 'I understand you are about to alter your will; Mr. Symes is below—do you feel equal to it?' And the deceased replied, 'I think I do.' Deponent added, 'I hope you will go through it well.' Upon returning to the room where William Bird and Symes were, deponent said, 'Mr. Bicknell is in a state to attend to you, Mr. Symes.'" And, on the 26th interrogatory, the same witness—after he has stated what he communicated to Mrs. Webber about the deceased's blister; and that he had perused the will of the 13th of September—answers, "He verily believes the deceased was of sufficiently sound mind, memory, and understanding on that day to have given directions for it, and to have comprehended every clause therein, and to have executed the said will, more especially because, in the evening of the same day, on his second visit, respondent inquired of him, 'If he had gone through what he wished, and how he bore it?' and the deceased said, 'He had done it, and bore it very well.'" This evidence—coming from such a witness—to capacity, to testamentary intentions immediately before the act, and to a recognition [169] of the act so soon after it had taken place, coupled with other circumstances, is so confirmatory of Symes as to leave no doubt, in my mind, in respect to the proof of the factum of this will; and I therefore pronounce for it.

(a) John Shattock, a yeoman, after stating that he was intimate with the deceased; that they conversed together about their families and property; and that he had borrowed money of the deceased, went on: "In 1817, deponent called upon the deceased to repay him: William Bird happened to be at the house that day, but deponent and deceased went into a private parlour together, and deponent told the deceased what he had come for: the deceased did not like to have the loan back because he could not get so good interest for it elsewhere, and he tried to make deponent keep it, and said 'he should have it at four and half per cent. interest:' deponent well recollects, on that occasion, the deceased remarking, in order to induce him to keep it, 'Why, Mr. Shattock, you know the money you have of me is not like what you might have of any body else, for you know I shall never trouble you for it; and even when I do miss (meaning when he died) I can tell you whose it will be; it will be William Bird's:' he at first said 'a person in the next room,' and afterwards Mr. Bird; 'and I will, if you like, go in and speak to him, and I am sure he will always let it be in your hands in the same manner, and you shall not be troubled about it:' he also said, 'You know there will be no expence to you of bond or mortgage, or any thing of that sort:' he very much wanted deponent to keep the money and to go and speak to William Bird, but deponent was determined that the deceased should take it back."

And as the charges of fraudulent conspiracy, set up and founded on misrepresentation of the state of the deceased's affections and of his incapacity, and those of control and custody, have each of them so failed in proof, and as the whole cause has been conducted with so much litigious acrimony, and with attempts to introduce much irrelevant matter, justice requires the sentence, pronouncing for the will, should be accompanied by a condemnation of the opposer, John Bird, in all the costs occasioned by his giving in his allegation.

MYNN v. ROBINSON AND OTHERS, BY THEIR GUARDIAN. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, By-Day, 1828.—After publication, the evidence of an attesting witness may be excepted to by the party who produces him.—The admission of an allegation responsive to an exceptive allegation reserved to the final hearing, the Court being of opinion that part, if otherwise admissible, was not material, and that the remainder probably would not in the event be of sufficient importance to delay the cause.—When the will of a married woman—obtained, while she was in an extremely weak state nine days before death, by the active agency of the husband, the sole executor and universal legatee—wholly departed from a former will deliberately made a few months before, the presumption is strong against the act; and the evidence not being satisfactory, the will pronounced against, and the husband condemned in the costs.—Declarations of testamentary intentions, if unaccompanied by any immediate acts, are always looked upon with great caution, and their weight depends upon all circumstances accompanying and connected with them.—The proctor being the "dominus litis" is responsible to the Court for the purity of the proceedings.

This was a cause arising upon the will of a married woman, made under a power, shortly before her death, and exclusively in favour of her husband: some circumstances respecting the non-production of Robert Hone, an attesting witness to such will, are noticed in vol. i. p. 68. Since those proceedings, allegations had been given in on both sides; publication of the evidence had passed; and on the by-day after Trinity Term, 1828, an allegation, exceptive to the testimony of Robert Hone (examined upon [170] the condidit), and given in on behalf of the husband, whose witness he was, was debated. The allegation set forth that Robert Hone had sworn "that he verily and in his conscience believes the attestation clause, now appearing at the foot of the paper (bearing date the 2d of June, 1827), was not written when he signed the same: he has no recollection whatever thereof, and that he never could have signed it had the clause been written; that it contains a direct and palpable falsehood, and has been interpolated and introduced subsequent to his signature." And on the 31st interrogatory—"To the best of respondent's recollection, there was a blank in the place where the attestation clause is now written in the said will, when he first saw and signed the same." The allegation then pleaded that Hone had therein knowingly and wilfully deposed falsely; that the attestation clause was not introduced since his subscription: "For that the will was written by William Whitehead from the dictation of his brother George, a witness in the cause, to whom instructions for the same had been conveyed through the party proponent (viz. John Mynn, the deceased's husband) about a week before the execution; that W. Whitehead also at such time, from the dictation or by the direction of his said brother, wrote at the foot of the will the attestation clause preparatory to the execution of the will; that such clause is of the handwriting of W. Whitehead, who never had possession of or saw the will from the time when he wrote the same and the attestation clause thereof, until the 2d of July, 1828." The third article—after reciting Hone's answer on interrogatory, viz. [171] "That the will was attested in a room on the ground-floor of the deceased's house, but not in the presence of the deceased; that after such attestation was concluded they, the witnesses, had some refreshment, when the producent took them all up stairs, to the leads or roof of the house, for the purpose of seeing the prospect; and they remained there about ten minutes"—pleaded, "That Hone neither did nor could, on that or any other occasion, go up to the leads or roof of the said house, either alone or accompanied by any person, for the purpose of viewing the prospect or for any other purpose; for that there were no leads, nor was there any flat surface whatever (save as hereinafter excepted) on the roof of the house." (a)[1]

The King's advocate and Lushington in objection. This is quite a novel experiment to except to an attesting witness, produced by the party who now attempts to discredit him.

Burnaby, Dodson, and Addams contrà. An attesting witness is rather the witness of the Court than of the party, and the circumstances under which this person was produced [172] are peculiar, and render his evidence suspicious: though our witness nominally, he comes forward to depose against us, and against his own act. The true rule at common law is, that where a person produces a witness, he cannot except to his general character, but may produce other witnesses to contradict his testimony, if he deposes unexpectedly contrary to the case of the party on whose behalf he is examined. Alexander v. Gibson, 2 Campbell, 555. This allegation is not to attack his general character but rebut his evidence, and is therefore within the common law principle. The matter is stringent; if Hone's evidence be true, our case is utterly false. In order to uphold his own credit it was necessary for him to get rid of the attestation clause; and the second contradiction is hardly less material: the assertion was clearly introduced in order to account for his being up stairs, if any of the witnesses should depose to that fact.

Per Curiam. I think this allegation is admissible. In the case of Goodridge and Hunter v. Slack the party was allowed to except to a witness originally produced by himself, but who had afterwards been produced on the other side, and deposed, on the second examination, in direct contradiction to his own act and to his former deposition.(a)[2] But it is for the party, under [173] the advice of his counsel, to consider

(a)[1] The article went on to describe the only access to the roof; and set forth very minutely the dimensions of the door in order to shew that a person of Hone's stature could with difficulty, if at all, have got through it; and that it opened into a gutter so narrow as only to admit of a person standing on the roof by placing one foot therein and the other on the sloping tiled roof; and that no prospect whatever was visible from the gutter on the roof beyond the tiles and bricks with which they were surrounded. A plan and measurement were annexed.

(a)[2] Goodridge and Hunter v. Slack. Prerogative, Trinity Term, 1786.

John Underwood, an attorney, was originally produced on the part of Goodridge and Hunter in support of a will, alleged to be dated on the 14th of December, 1782, of which Goodridge was an executor and residuary legatee. Of this will Underwood was asserted to be the drawer, and in his examination on the condidit had deposed, positively and minutely, to instructions on the 6th of November, 1782, to approbation, capacity, and execution on the day of the date. It was suggested that this will was an absolute forgery; that the deceased never gave any instructions, and had executed a will on the 4th of November, 1782, of which Slack was executor; that the last-mentioned will was deposited in an iron chest, and was taken out by means of a false key; that Underwood took a copy and made a will in Goodridge's shop; that the witnesses were let into the deceased's house on the 29th of January, 1783; that the deceased was then in a state of insensibility; that the pen was put into his hand, and guided by Goodridge; that the witnesses then went down stairs and signed; that afterwards, the date being thought to be too late on account of the deceased's whether it is worth while to attack the credit of Hone, his own witness; it is hardly probable that, in such a mass of depositions, the sufficiency of the evidence on the condidit and to the factum would [174] depend on the degree of credit to which this man is entitled.

Allegation admitted.

[175] On the second session of Michaelmas Term an allegation responsive to the above exceptive allegation was debated, and was, in substance, as follows:—

The first article pleaded generally "that full credit was due to Hone; that he had not deposed falsely, as set forth in the exceptive allegation."

The second, after reciting the third article of the exceptive allegation, pleaded "that Hone did [176] not answer untruly, for that the will was attested below stairs and that he did go up stairs to the roof: and that he on the same day mentioned the mode in which the will was attested to Mr. Laurence; and shortly afterwards to Eaton, Norcutt, and Thorpe, witnesses examined in this cause; that he also had mentioned to them that he had been carried up to the roof of the house for the purpose of seeing the prospect."

The third pleaded "the arrangement of the rooms in the attic of the deceased's house; and that in the gable end of one there was a window, from which was a prospect."

incapacity, another will was made dated on the 14th of December, 1782, subscribed by the witnesses before execution, and that Goodridge undertook to procure the execution of it.

To establish this fraudulent transaction Underwood was examined on the part of Slack, and deposed to the above effect in direct contradiction to his own act and to his former deposition. After publication, an allegation, exceptive to several witnesses, and consisting of twenty-two articles, was offered on behalf of Goodridge and Hunter.

The opposition was confined to the eleventh and thirteenth articles in contradiction to the depositions of Underwood and his wife: but no difficulty seems to have been raised on the ground that the witness had been before produced by the party now excepting to him. The following is a note of what passed:—

Dr. Harris and Dr. Scott. A party is not at liberty to plead to a witness what he had the opportunity to plead against an allegation.

Dr. Wynne and Dr. Bever contrà. The general rule is liable to exception. Our parties, when the allegation was given, were in custody, charged with having forged the will; they have been acquitted since publication in this cause. The matter now offered formed a part of their defence; and it would have been injudicious to have revealed it antecedently.

Per Curiam (Dr. Calvert). The objections to the two articles are of the same kind, namely, that you are now contradicting to a deposition what you might have done before to an allegation. It is a rule that after publication you cannot plead as to facts; so far the cause is considered as shut: but it is also a rule that you may to witnesses, provided any thing shall have arisen from their depositions which you could not have contradicted from the plea. I think the circumstances of this case are particular: the danger of a trial for life, the caution necessary for the exposition of the defence. When the proofs on this allegation shall come before the Court, the time of contradiction will be considered. No evidence on this exceptive allegation will be received as to facts in the cause: what may be said can only go to the credit of the witnesses; for the cause is closed as to the facts.

Allegation admitted.

 The Court finally pronounced against Goodridge's will, and in favour of the draft of the will propounded by Slack.

Peculiars, Hilary Term, 2nd Session, 1786.—In Inglefield v. Inglefield, originally a suit brought by the wife for restitution of conjugal rights, and in which the husband had, in a cross suit, pleaded and examined witnesses to his wife's adultery, a further allegation was offered on the part of the husband, and the Court (Dr. Calvert), in remarking upon it, said: "It is strange that the husband, in the eighth article, should charge Webb, his principal witness, with perjury;* but as this allegation is given in

---

* It appeared that Webb, the alleged particeps criminis, had been examined on both sides.

[177] Against this allegation it was argued that the declarations of Hone could not be received in corroboration of his own evidence; and that the rule was so laid down by Lord Redesdale in the case of The Berkeley Peerage.(a)

On the other side—that Chief Baron Gilbert considered such declarations as admissible; that Mr. Justice Buller originally was of the same opinion, though in the later editions of his work he seemed in some degree to have departed from his former doctrine: (b) and that in The Berkeley Peerage case the declarations of Lady Berkeley, recenti facto, were received in corroboration of her evidence at the bar of the House of Lords, though subject to future revision.

Per Curiam. Looking to the former proceedings in this cause, it is full time that the evidence and pleas should be closed, unless this allegation contains something very material. It is stated to be responsive to the exceptive allegation. The first article is to be considered as merely introductory: the second pleads facts which have already been deposed to, and which can only be repeated by Hone; and it also pleads certain declarations made by him recenti facto. The present shape of this cause is extraordinary: the persons who support the will have attacked the credit of the subscribed on the part of the husband, upon whom the expenses will fall, I shall admit this article."

Note.—In the two preceding cases the witnesses objected to were examined on both sides, and the exceptions were taken to that part of their evidence which was given by them when produced on behalf of the adverse party. So, in Mackenzie v. Handasyde (Prerogative, 1828, June 30; and S. C. infra, p. 209), an exceptive allegation was admitted to John Williams, who attested both the will and the codicil, and who was produced by one party in support of the will, and by the other party in support of the codicil; and the exception was to that part of his evidence which was given upon his production by the adverse party. But in the case in the text, Mynn v. Robinson, the exceptive allegation was given to a witness produced and examined only by the party excepting to him.

Now it is a well known rule at common law that "a party cannot be permitted to produce general evidence to discredit his own witness; that is, a party cannot prove his own witness to be of such a general bad character as would render him unworthy of credit; but if a witness unexpectedly state facts against the interest of the party that called him, another witness may be called by the same party to disprove those facts." 1 Phillipps on Evidence, 294; and the authorities there cited.

But in the Ecclesiastical Courts, where the depositions are never seen till all the witnesses have been examined, it is necessary that parties, though they may not before publication attack the general character of their own witness, should be permitted, after publication, directly to except to his credit; because as no plea unless exceptive, and no evidence unless on such a plea, can be given at this stage of the cause, parties would otherwise be precluded from contradicting their own witness falsely deposing to the occurrence of matters which might go to the foundation of the whole case, and yet to which it could not have been foreseen that he would speak. The variation, however, between the practice of the Common Law Courts and of the Ecclesiastical Courts arises only from the different manner in which the evidence is taken, and the different opportunities thereby afforded to a party of obviating the effect of his own witness unexpectedly deposing against him; and is a variation in form rather than in substance. At common law the primary purpose of the examination of other witnesses is to support the party's original case; the accidental consequence, to discredit the first witness; or, as Mr. Justice Buller expresses it, "The other witnesses are not called directly to discredit the first witness, but the impeachment of his credit is incidental and consequential only." (Buller's N. P. p. 297, 5th edit.) On the other hand, in the Spiritual Courts, the primary purpose of an exceptive allegation is to destroy the credit of the witness; the accidental consequence to support the original case. The practice in both Courts, however different at first sight, produces the same result, and originates in the same good reason and sound principle; viz. "That there is no rule of law by which the truth is on such an occasion to be shut out and justice perverted." Per Lord Ellenborough, C. J., in Alexander v. Gibson, 2 Campb. 556.

(a) See Phillipps on Evidence, vol. i. 307, 5th edit.

(b) Buller's N. P. 294, and note the difference between the early and 5th, 6th, and 7th editions.

witness; those who oppose the will are now sustaining his credit. [178] As I suppose it is not intended to re-examine Hone in respect to the attestation taking place down stairs, the principal part of the article must relate to the declarations. Now, if this case had assumed a different shape; if the opposers of the will had pleaded in exception to the credit of the subscribed witness, these declarations might have been material and admissible, but they are now brought forward for the purpose of supporting his credit. Without entering into the law whether such evidence can be received, I am satisfied that this part of the plea is not material, even if otherwise admissible; because Hone has already deposed to it. At the end of his deposition he says, "That on the very same day the attestation of the will took place he mentioned all the circumstances to Mr. Laurence, a student of Lincoln's Inn, also to Mr. Norcutt, a solicitor, and to others of his friends, from doubts that he had." Now, in the exceptive allegation, it is not attempted to deny that he ever made such a declaration: Laurence and Norcutt might have been produced to disprove that circumstance; such a contradiction would have been much more important than the contradictions as to the leads of the house, and the prospect therefrom. The fact, then, that he did make these declarations, having been sworn to by Hone, and being uncontradicted, it is very immaterial to produce witnesses in support of it: the Court will assume that the declarations were made, as no attempt has been made to disprove them.

As to the third article, the only fact capable of further proof is, that the prospect may be seen; for Hone alone can swear to the fact that [179] he was taken up stairs for the purpose of seeing the prospect, and that he has already done. It cannot surely be of sufficient importance, at this stage of the cause, again to open these proceedings in order to receive such evidence as could be given on this article. If, at the hearing, the question whether it was possible Hone could be taken up stairs under the pretence of seeing the prospect should appear of sufficient weight as touching the credit of the witness, the Court may either direct some of its own officers to inspect the house, or may even allow witnesses to be examined on this article; but considering all the circumstances of this case, I cannot think it necessary for the opposers of this will, in order to sustain the credit of Hone, to press that this article should be admitted to proof at present: and I therefore suspend the admission of this allegation till the hearing of the cause.

This cause came on for informations and sentence on an extra day after Michaelmas Term, when the Court, having only heard the counsel on behalf of the husband, proceeded to give judgment.

18th Dec.—Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. Although the present question arises on the will of a married woman, yet, since there is no doubt of her power to make a will, as if sole, the [180] case is to be decided upon the ordinary principles of testamentary law.

There are two wills before the Court; the factum of the earlier will is not controverted: the case principally depends upon the proof of the factum of the latter will—mainly, indeed, upon the evidence taken on the first plea, or condidit; yet there are some other collateral circumstances to which it is important to advert.

The first will was executed on the 23d of November, 1826.(a) The latter will is dated on the 2d of June, 1827; and its tenor is altogether to sweep away the first

(a) Its general substance was as follows:—After some directions for her funeral, a bequest of the furniture, plate (except a tea-chest with silver canisters to her nephew, William R. Robinson), linen, &c. in and about her house at Westbourn Green, to her husband, absolutely; and also of the use and occupation of such house and premises, free from rent and taxes, for six months next after her death; it directed that her brothers, Charles and John Peter Robinson, and her said nephew, their executors and administrators, should stand possessed of all her real and personal estate, upon trust to pay an annuity of £700 to her husband; and upon his death, to assign over her freeholds in Bishopsgate Street to her nephew, John Travers Robinson, and the sum of £12,000 three per cents., with the unapplied interest thereof, unto and among the children of her nephew, William R. Robinson, who should be living at the death of her husband. The will then gave various legacies—some of £300—to her relations: it named her trustees to be executors, with £100 each for their trouble over and above the several legacies before bequeathed to them, and appointed her brother, John Peter Robinson, residuary legatee.

will, and to give exclusively to the husband—who is named sole executor—the whole benefit in the deceased's real and personal estate. The deceased died on the 11th of June, nine days after the date of this paper. Looking then [181] no further than to the dates and contents of the two documents, and to the death, there is a demand for clear and full proof. Here is a full and formal will made only eight months before, disposing of her property among various objects, and here is another will, dated only nine days before her death, wholly departing from that disposition, and giving every thing to the husband. On the very surface there is a strong suspicion of the exercise of undue influence and of marital authority: the evidence, it is true, may clear away that suspicion, and it therefore becomes proper to examine the history of the parties.

The deceased, Mrs. Catherine Mynn, was a lady of considerable fortune and of a very respectable family. Soon after the death of her mother she took a house at Westbourn Green, where she had an establishment suited to her station in society—she kept her carriage and had servants in proportion: she was at this time above forty. The deceased had several brothers—they resided at some distance—had their different avocations; and though, certainly, there does not appear to have been any quarrel, yet there was no very great frequency of intercourse, nor particular warmth of affection subsisting; she had even complained, in some measure, of their neglect and coldness. A spinster of this age, living alone, with an independent fortune, and with her own establishment, was not an unlikely person to be sought by, and to fall a prey to, some needy adventurer, who would form a matrimonial connexion for the sake of her property.

Mr. John Mynn, who afterwards became her [182] husband, and is the present party, does not stand quite clear of the imputation of having acted with such views. He was the younger son of a gentleman farmer in Kent who had a large family; and being intended for the medical profession, served some short time with two different apothecaries; but he disliked and gave up that line of life, and we find him for about three years lodging at the house of Whitney Milborne West, at that time an apothecary at Hammersmith, but who afterwards got a diploma from Scotland, and is now a doctor of medicine, and a subscribed witness to this will. With a son of this Dr. West, Mynn formed a partnership as a coal-merchant, but they carried on business in a very inferior mode. They seem to have had no wharfs nor waggons, nor even a regular office with clerks; but they received little orders at a house in the borough, where an elder brother of Mynn was established as a hop and seed merchant.

In 1823 Mynn and his partner, West, took a house at Westbourn Green, next door to the deceased; whether with a view to this lady and her fortune, or whether accidentally, is not ascertained by the evidence: but at this place Mynn had an establishment, a horse and two-wheeled carriage, a man-servant and two maids; and visitors occasionally staying with him. Here he became acquainted with the deceased, by meeting her at an evening party, and at the very first meeting he paid her particular attention: their acquaintance was improved upon, and in July, 1823, it ended in marriage. What was the relative situation of these parties? He was sixteen years younger than she—he was [183] without a farthing—deeply in debt—at least 1500l., and probably much more. That he practised a gross deception on the deceased, as to his situation and property, cannot be doubted: he pretended to be in partnership with his brother as a hop and seed factor; no articles of partnership were ever entered into, and no real partnership is shewn ever to have existed: he asserted that he was not in debt; the fact was clearly otherwise; for he was in a very short time harassed by his creditors, notwithstanding the assistance of his friend and connexion, Martin, who, within two or three months after his marriage, advanced him 1500l.; executions were taken out and sent into his house, much to the distress and annoyance of the deceased, till at length, in November, 1825, he rendered himself (as the phrase is) into the rules of the King's Bench: attempts were made to obtain a composition with his creditors, but that negociation failing, he became in November, 1826, a bankrupt, and his debts amounted to about 7000l. How debts to that amount were incurred does not appear, for since the period of his marriage he had been partaking of his wife's establishment at Westbourn Green. He obtained his certificate, but no dividend whatever has been paid; and finally, on the 27th of April, 1827, after living within "the rules" for sixteen months, he obtained his release, and returned to Westbourn Lodge; there his wife was dying of a cancer, her recovery was quite hopeless, and her death took place in six weeks afterwards.

A character more exposed to suspicion in every circumstance relating to the will he has produced cannot well be described or conceived. [184] That Miss Robinson's family should be averse to the marriage was very natural. One of her brothers was referred to the house in the borough, respecting the partnership in the hop business, but William Mynn was not at home, and Mr. Robinson was taken up into the drawing room: no books were produced, and no partnership, I repeat, up to this time has been shewn to have existed. Miss Robinson's brothers, finding her nevertheless determined to marry John Mynn, did not interfere in the settlement: that was undertaken by a very respectable and friendly individual, Mr. Peter Free, her cousin, but who had no interest in her property. Attempts were made by Mynn at the time to procure more favourable terms, but his propositions were resolutely rejected by the deceased herself, and he at length agreed to the terms of the settlement required; and various efforts were subsequently made to get at her property, in order to relieve his distresses; but the settlement was strict, and the trustees were firm. It is asserted that the deceased gave verbal promises to some of the creditors; but, except such promises and any assistance which she may have given out of her income, she did not involve herself and her property for the payment of his debts.

It has been relied upon in argument that she was strongly attached to her husband, shewed him great affection, constantly visited him, even during his residence within the rules of the King's Bench, and that he at all times and after his release treated her with great kindness and attention. This is proved by the evidence on both sides, and is almost the only circumstance of recommendation to his case: but it [185] was naturally to be expected: she had married him from affection and fondness; it was his interest to be kind to her; he was dependent on her, and was endeavouring to obtain present assistance as well as looking to receive her fortune for his future provision. But what was the effect of all this attention on the one side, and of all this affection on the other, on her testamentary intentions? for that is the object of the Court's inquiry: nor is the Court left to inferences from their mutual kindness to each other; because it has before it a will solemnly made by the deceased two or three years after the marriage, and eight months before her death. In November, 1826, after his deceitful and imprudent conduct had been fully developed to her, after he had been in confinement for twelve months—after his bankruptcy she made her will—made it in the most careful and deliberate manner: she went herself to her confidential solicitors, Dunn and Wordsworth, who had prepared her settlement: her brother Charles accompanied her, but he left her alone with Mr. Wordsworth; and she having delivered her instructions in writing, they together canvassed every item, particularly the annuity to her husband, whether it should not be void if he attempted to sell it, but she at length determined not to fetter it with any conditions; "expressing a hope that the lesson he had received would produce an amendment in his habits;" the draft was sent to her, some trifling alterations, principally in the wording of it, were suggested; the will was then engrossed, and on the 23d of November the deceased again went to the office; the will was all read to her; [186] "she expressed her entire satisfaction and approval thereof:" and it was then executed and attested by the two Dunns and Wordsworth.

After this deliberate testamentary act it is useless to be drawing inferences from affectionate conduct or from declarations that it was a mere temporary disposition: and what removes all suspicion that this will was made under the influence of the brother is, that on going to Dunn and Wordsworth, either for the instructions or the execution, she was actually accompanied by her husband in the carriage, who lifted her out of and into the carriage, but did not go into the office. Indeed, the provision made for the husband is a liberal one, and, being by annuity, was in some degree guarded against his future imprudence. Why should he not have been satisfied? On his marriage he was without a farthing in the world: since, he had been much embarrassed: in short, he ought to have been very thankful for such a bountiful bequest. A suggestion that this act was not the deliberate wish and permanent intention of the testatrix was founded upon the declarations of the deceased, which, if really made, were probably uttered in order to get rid of importunity, or to impose.

On the 27th of April Mynn quitted the rules of the King's Bench. The deceased was at that time in a very precarious state; her cancerous disorder was advancing; she was confined to her house, and was only carried down stairs to a sofa in the drawing room. An attempt was made to induce her to advance 2000l., in order to set Mynn up in business; but it was found that the trustees had not even the power to make such an advance. Whether the deceased [187] really wished for this measure and was disappointed and angry, is not very material, for she does no act in consequence of it till the testamentary act—the subject of the present suit.

Whatever declarations were made at this time under the feelings of irritation were accompanied by no immediate act, and therefore amounted to nothing. The Court always looks to declarations of this kind with great caution, and more especially so under the circumstances of this case. Their weight in all cases depends much upon the whole of the circumstances that accompany, and are connected with, such declarations. They are liable to be insincere on the part of the deceased, or if sincere, the effect of a mere transient feeling; they are liable to be misapprehended and their extent exaggerated; they are liable to be misrepresented by others, or they may even be an after-thought invented to prop up a weak and defective case; and in the present instance many of the declarations are considerably exposed to this latter suspicion, namely, that they were either invented by the witnesses, or by those who have imposed them on the witnesses and made them fancy that such declarations were made. In short, the Court can venture to place little reliance on them when connected with the account given of the factum; which in all cases is the main consideration, but which in this, in a more especial manner, demands the attention of the Court: and to the account of it I now proceed.

In the latter end of May, the particular day is not fixed, Mynn, the husband, went to one Whitehead in Boyle-street, and desired him to [188] draw a will for the deceased immediately, giving every thing to him, the husband; Whitehead, with the assistance of his brother, drew up the instrument, leaving a blank for the date; and in three or four hours afterwards Mynn returned, and the instrument was delivered to him to get it executed. With this sudden haste was the instrument prepared! Mynn himself, if Whitehead speaks truly, was surprised that such should be the intention of the deceased: or he might say so in order to diminish Whitehead's surprize: a priori, therefore, the thing was improbable which renders some of the declarations now brought forward not very credible, and throws an increased doubt over them. This is the account of the drawing up of the will: the instructions given, not by the deceased but by the husband, the executor and universal legatee. The execution was on the second of June: the three attesting witnesses, Dr. West, Thain Wright, and Mr. Robert Hone, were on that morning fetched by the husband from Hammersmith, about three miles distant.

West states he took the will up stairs to the deceased and said to her: "As she was better she could sign her will. She replied, 'Yes, I will:' he then said, 'Now, ma'am, you know the contents of this will, as it is a gift of all your property to your husband.' The deceased replied, 'Yes, I do:' she then signed it." This is the whole account in substance of what passes at the subscription. "He brought it down again with her signature to it. The three attesting witnesses then went up stairs: the deceased, repeating after West, acknowledged the signature and published it as her [189] will, but said nothing else; and the witnesses attested it."

Now, this is the summary and substance of the act of execution, even giving credit to West's, the most favourable, account of it. The husband procured a merely formal execution, not indeed a formal one, for the will was not read over nor signed in the presence of the witnesses: the husband himself was present: the deceased was confined to her bed within nine days of her death; her approaching dissolution fully known to the husband: and by this will, so drawn up and so executed through the agency of the husband, the former will—so deliberately made only seven months before—is to be swept away, and every thing given to this husband!

The act itself and the mode of effecting it are each so indicative of fraud and undue influence on the part of the husband that it could hardly be sustained by the testimony of the most respectable witnesses: the facts would be insufficient.

The deceased's capacity was not gone—her mind was not affected by delirium, but she was extremely weak, labouring under a painful disorder, taking laudanum to lull her sufferings—and in the hands of this husband—the active agent in the whole business; so that it could hardly fail to be considered as an act done under undue influence and undue marital authority. If the deceased's mind and wish had really gone with this new disposition, it is hardly credible but that either her own solicitors, Dunn and Wordsworth, or at least some respectable solicitor, would have been called in to receive the instructions from herself: and that he, her medical [190] attendant, Mr. White, and some of her own acquaintance in the neighbourhood, would have been summoned to attest the regular execution. The mode adopted could hardly have been resorted to in a fair case.

But who are the witnesses that the Court is to rely upon, even for this account of the factum? and how has the cause been conducted? Of John Mynn himself the history has been already given. The drawer, Whitehead, describes himself to be "a certified conveyancer and in the habit of transacting annuities:" he has been frequently concerned in negotiating loans of money for various persons, and in April, 1825, procured 840l. by way of annuity for John Mynn: he has also lent money to him "to the amount of upwards of 3000l." Such is Mr. Whitehead's line in the profession, and such his connexion with Mynn: he supplied him with money on annuity, and became his creditor for upwards of 3000l.: he continued his confidential adviser during his imprisonment; and attempted to prove under the bankruptcy; but Springett, the assignee (Mynn's own witness), states that "Whitehead appeared in person, produced an account; all the creditors exclaimed against it; the commissioners rejected it; he did not prove any debt; he was not allowed to prove; he was proposed as assignee, but the commissioners said, 'That could not be, as he was not allowed to prove.'" (a) Such was Mynn's selected drawer and associate. In all Mynn's transactions before, at, and after [191] the death of the deceased, Whitehead has been his agent and adviser, and has been twice examined in this cause: he admits that "he cannot swear he is wholly disinterested in the event of this suit, as the producent is indebted to him in a sum of money, which he expects in any case to recover, but he should get immediate payment if the producent should succeed." This witness entertains some distinctions about propriety, which are rather difficult to be understood. On the 22d interrogatory he says, "It was in consequence of the producent being then indebted to him in a large sum that he did not attend the execution of the will, and he did not for the same reason send one of his clerks: he was of opinion it would not be either decent or prudent for him, being a creditor of the producent, to do so:" and yet "being a creditor of the producent," and "not wholly disinterested in the event of the suit," he thinks it not indecorous to be the agent and adviser in the conduct of the suit; to consult repeatedly with Mynn and his proctor, though he must have been informed that, as the drawer of the will, it was necessary he should be examined: and he has been twice examined on very material points. The evidence of a person so mixed up with the transaction is entitled to no great credit; nor does the conduct of the business exonerate it from the suspicions which otherwise attach.

The first subscribed witness is Whitney Milborne West: he was, as I have said, an apothecary practising at Hammersmith for many years, but has recently obtained a Scotch diploma, and practises as a physician; still, however, he carries [192] on the business of an apothecary, which is conducted for a salary by an assistant, Thain Wright, another subscribed witness. Dr. West, on the interrogatories, makes an apology for his deposition in chief, in respect to the presence of the husband at publication, and attributes the error to the defect of his memory, occasioned by an accident; and Mynn's counsel also make that the ground of apology for the inconsistencies of his evidence; and it would be advantageous and fortunate for this witness if all the contradictions in, and to, his evidence could be attributed to the same cause: he has long been intimately acquainted with Mynn and in some degree connected with him—his son was Mynn's partner, and married Mynn's sister a few days after Mynn married the deceased: that son also became a bankrupt: indeed Dr. West himself was likewise a bankrupt—twelve or fourteen years ago: bankruptcy seems almost infectious among these parties: he was not only specially fetched to attest this will, and took with him his assistant Wright and his friend Hone; but the will was placed in his custody; he attended on the death; he sealed up the effects; he has been throughout the suit an active agent: it is true that on both his examinations he says "he had no meetings with any person on the subject of this cause save to be produced as a witness—simply that:" and yet he has been constantly at the proctor's office; he has been down to Oxford in search of Hone, and went with William Mynn to Winchester for the same purpose; nay, the proctor in the cause, who has been himself examined, says on an interrogatory: "Respondent was in frequent communication with [193] George Whitehead, Whitney Milborne West, and William Mynn, who called almost daily at his office in respect to this cause;" and yet Dr. West says, "He has had no meetings with any person respecting it." To point out all the circumstances that induce me not to place entire reliance on Dr. West is unnecessary: but I shall advert to one or two presently.

(a) On interrogatory, Mr. Whitehead answered, "that under the commission of bankruptcy issued against Mynn he took no part whatever: he did not prove, nor offer to prove, a debt."

The other two attesting witnesses are Thain Wright and Robert Hone: and they are in direct contradiction to each other on several points; to which the Court is to give most credit, or whether much to either, may be a matter not essential to be decided. Mynn himself has attempted to discredit Hone; but he is his own witness, and before he was produced, and when it was held out that he could not be produced, he was described as a highly respectable person; and anxiety was shewn to plead his good character and handwriting. Whitehead, on the sixth interrogatory, says, "West acquainted him that Hone was a very respectable gentleman living upon his fortune." West deposes that "he carried Hone with him on account of his respectability to witness the will." Yet he was not produced, and affidavits were exhibited to account for his non-production. And, on the 14th of November, 1827, Dr. West and Thain Wright made oath "that in consequence of certain pecuniary transactions, Robert Hone left this country on or about the 22d of June last, and, as they verily believe, has never since returned, nor do they know where or in what country he is at present residing." Stating, therefore, without reserve, that he had left the kingdom.

[194] Considerable evidence has been gone into in order to shew that Mynn could not have produced Hone; and it is clear that he was embarrassed and in concealment: he had engaged in a joint stock company, and was liable to be made in some manner responsible for the engagements of that company; and he certainly wished to keep out of the way. Dr. West's expression is "that he had absconded:" but that term is not very applicable, when it appears that Hone regularly gave up his house (at lease his aunt's house), had his goods packed up by an upholsterer, Eaton, and laden in open day on a van; and that the same person, Eaton, was left as his agent to let the house. Hone himself was several times in town in July and August, he and his friend and solicitor, Norcutt, dined at West's on the 3d of August. Without entering into a detail of the circumstances (for after all it is but a subordinate matter), the result on my mind is, that not only was there a want of due diligence used to find him, or to convey to him a letter, but that contrivances were used by Mynn's agents to induce him to keep out of the way, by holding out the terror of injunctions and legal proceedings against him.

The proctor, it seems, trusting entirely to Whitehead, West, and Mynn, took no steps to find this attesting witness; he did not go to Hammersmith, nor send a clerk; nor cause advertisements to be inserted. It does not appear that he even gave any directions as to the best mode of inquiry and the means to be used: he merely advised, and the advice was proper enough, "that every exertion should be made [195] to find the attesting witness, as it would certainly be expected by the Court."

If this be the general mode of practice, I strongly recommend the introduction of a different system, and for these reasons. The proctor is the dominus litis; he is responsible to the Court for the purity of the proceedings; the interests of the suitor are intrusted to him; statutes have been passed to protect him in the exclusive practice of his profession; no person can use his name nor participate in his profits. If the scene lies in the country at a distance, it may be necessary to employ other agents—a country solicitor or some other substitute; but here in London, or at a short distance, the necessary inquiries should not be devolved or intrusted to a Mr. Whitehead, or to a Dr. West, or a Mr. Mynn, who are to come daily to the proctor's office in order to consult on the conduct of the cause; and who are afterwards to be material witnesses in the cause. If inquiries had been made of these persons, particularly of Hone's friend, Dr. West, when he last saw Hone? Who was his agent and packed up his goods? Who was his solicitor? Dr. West must have answered, "I saw my neighbour Mr. Eaton packing up Hone's goods in July; he himself was present; he and Mr. Norcutt, his solicitor, were at my house and dined there on the 3d of August." Would it not have been nearly evident that if a confidential letter had been sent either to Eaton or to Norcutt to be conveyed to Hone, stating the importance of his being examined, and that every precaution should be taken that his place of residence should [196] not be disclosed that a communication might have been had with Hone.

I do not blame a young practitioner for not taking these steps; but if proper means had been resorted to they could not have failed to trace Hone; Eaton and Thorpe both saw him several times between July and the beginning of August; they spent the evening with him at Mrs. Jefferson's on the 8th of August: Norcutt went with him to Winchester on the 9th of August: Hone was then uneasy about this will, and desired Eaton to call upon Mynn's proctor; and the fact is now admitted that Eaton did call and left his card of address on the 24th of that month. It is said that it is not every card that would cause inquiry, but Whitehead had been there that very day; and this, when coupled with the entry in the office diary, "Mr. Eaton—Mynn v. Robinson," would almost necessarily lead to some investigation whether Hone could not be found. From that entry it is clear Eaton did call, and about this very cause; though both the proctor and his clerks depose that they have no recollection of any communication about Hone.

The accuracy of this evidence, "that they do not recollect it," cannot be doubted; but this only confirms the Court in the expediency of the improved practice just recommended: viz. that the proctors should themselves inquire about the witnesses; for if the proctor and his clerks had felt the duty cast upon them of finding out Hone, they would upon Eaton's coming from Hammersmith, where they must have learnt that Hone lately resided, and on finding that Eaton came about this cause and had left his card of ad-[197]-dress, have made inquiries at that time; indeed they would have made inquiries long before whether he, Eaton, had seen Hone, and could give them any information about or convey any letter to him.

The expression of Hone's uneasiness to Eaton on the 8th of August is in some measure confirmed by one of Mynn's own witnesses, Matanle, a solicitor, who in October mentions that Hone had declared "he did not see the deceased sign the will, and that he and Wright signed below stairs." It is pretty clear then that these parties had fears about Hone's evidence, and had reasons for wishing to keep him out of the way: they considered him so far a person of respectability, that he would disclose the truth however he might have been induced to set his name as a witness to this will.

There is another circumstance respecting the mode of conducting the cause to which I reluctantly advert; but it is impossible, consistently with my duty, to pass it over without observation. I mean the delay in the examination of the witnesses on the condidit: that plea is dated the 11th of July, and was admitted on the caveat-day in August, yet the first witness was not examined till the 5th of November. The inability to find the third witness was no reason for postponing the examination of the other two; for Hone might possibly have appeared at any time, and the previous examination of two would at least have expedited the matter if attended with no other advantage: but the loss of time is in this case the least important part [198] of the consideration. Here was a case, from the very import of the papers, of suspicious character; here were the party's brother and the two principal witnesses—the drawer, Whitehead, and the attesting witness, West—almost daily at the proctor's office. What could be more dangerous to the truth of the case and the purity of the evidence than that these persons should be in this constant communication without being first examined, should be endeavouring to see Hone, either to concert with him or to send him out of the way, should be the agents, advisers, and conductors of the cause before their examination? No satisfactory reason has been, nor I think can be, assigned why these witnesses were not examined as soon as the condidit was admitted: their testimony would then have been much less suspicious; this delay throws a cloud over it.

Here are, for example, declarations not passing either at the instructions, or execution, introduced into the evidence of both these witnesses; and it may be much doubted whether they would have found their way into their depositions if none of these previous meetings had taken place. Whitehead introduces not only a declaration asserted to have been made in May, 1827, but also one in November, 1825, that the deceased "had made a will previous thereto and had left her husband every thing, but had burnt the same in order that her property should not go to those wretches, meaning some bill creditors."

Now is this declaration true, or is it not true? Did the deceased ever make such a will? If she did, why is it not pleaded and proved? It [199] was a will under a power; who made, who attested, it? If she did make such a will, surely the husband must have known, and if he had known it, it would have been pleaded and proved, because it would have laid a strong foundation for the present will, as reverting back to that disposition: if no such will was made, either the declaration is the invention of the witness, or it shews the insincerity of the deceased in her declarations, and that she made them merely to please the friends and creditors of Mynn. There is no trace of any such former will, and this declaration must have been thrown in from considerations of what would be useful to the cause; and its introduction reflects great suspicion on the management of the business by the husband and his associates.

The same sort of circumstance occurs in West's deposition, which is to this effect: he sets out with stating "that he became acquainted with the deceased about a twelve-month prior to her death," though he afterwards says "that he was acquainted with her four or five years." This shews that he deposes at random, and if his head and memory are so bad, how can the Court rely upon him for a single fact? He says "he was consulted by the deceased, and prescribed for her during the illness whereof she died, and until a short time immediately before her death." Again, this is not true; he had ceased to attend her for many months, and Mr. White was her sole medical attendant. West says "he had seen and prescribed for her on the first of June; that she then related to him her anxiety and wish to make her will, and was determined to leave her [200] husband all her property, as her brothers had refused her money of her own to give him; that a will had been prepared by her directions through her husband, which she was anxious immediately to execute, and that deponent should witness; but as she was then ill and much agitated, the deponent said, 'Do not agitate yourself, leave that to a future day:' upon which she said nothing further on the subject."

Now I should have doubted this evidence much, even if the witness had been examined immediately, and had not been employed as an active agent in the manner he has been; but I suspect it much more when I look to this delay and to the other circumstances of the case, to some of which I must presently advert; nor indeed am I convinced that if he had been examined soon after the admission of the condidit, this would have formed part of his evidence.

For the sake, then, of general practice, and to protect the purity of proceedings—which is of importance more extensive than this individual case—I recommend that attesting witnesses should be forthwith examined while the facts are fresh in their minds, and before false impressions can be made upon them: and, further, that persons who are necessary witnesses, as attesting witnesses are, or any others who are intended to be examined, should not be employed as the advisers, agents, and conductors of the cause.

I come then to the account of the execution, and it is to be observed that, on the responsive allegation, Mynn has introduced fresh witnesses [201] to the execution; to previous declarations and to subsequent recognitions; particularly three servants—a footman and coachman who are still in his service, and a house-maid who lived with him some time after the deceased's death. It sometimes happens that fresh evidence introduced to prop up a failing cause only the more completely overturns it.

The coachman says: "The footman brought a message at six in the morning to get ready one of the carriage horses as soon as possible: Mynn came soon afterwards; he had never rode a carriage horse before: he said he was going to Hammersmith; he should not hurt it; deponent let him out of the gates; it might be near seven o'clock." Here, then, was a sudden and hasty plan—nothing was arranged the day before with Dr. West; if he was there at all on the first of June.

Elizabeth Price, the housemaid, gives a very different account: "There was no haste, nor was it at that early hour—the deceased herself gave the directions;" she deposes to various previous declarations—that the deceased was quite alert, and that the matter was previously arranged: "Two or three days before the deceased told her that West and two gentlemen were coming, and she was to shew them into the parlour." Here is not one word of West being there the day before: "Deceased told her this as she was in the bedroom dressing her." Not speaking of her as excessively weak and confined to her bed; indeed, on the following article, she speaks to a recognition two days afterwards. "She was happy she had done what she said she would do . . . deponent was dressing her, was [202] lacing her stays; the deceased did not, however, go down stairs for some time afterwards on that day." So that here is this poor woman, within a week of her death, dying of a cancer in the breast, up dressing, having her stays laced, going down stairs, though she had taken to her bed some days before, and was in her bed when the will is alleged to have been executed.

This is the sort of adminicular evidence produced. I cannot give much credit to this recognition; and I may as well now notice another, to which the footman is brought to depose on the day after the alleged execution; this witness says "he met Mynn on the top of the stairs, who asked him to go into the deceased's room; deponent asked her how she was; she answered, better; and added, 'I have made a fresh will and left every thing to your master for his kindness to me.'" Now this story is not very probable, and I must consider it, in conjunction with other circumstances, before I can give it much credence.

To return, then, to the evidence of the execution: West, Wright, and Hone had arrived; Price told the deceased that West and another gentleman were come; she seemed quite pleased; asked "What sort of a gentleman?" It was a short, stout gentleman: the deceased said "she dared say it was Mr. Hone." This was a lucky guess; for it does not appear that she had ever seen Hone, and his being brought is (according to West) West's own act; and he admits "that Hone had never seen the deceased before the 2nd of June," and so says Wright. Price states, "She was then sent down to call up [203] West: she went, delivered the message, and West went up alone, with papers in his hand. The deceased desired her to fetch a candle; she fetched it, placed it on the table; West was standing by the bed reading some writings out loud to the deceased, which he continued during all the time she was in the room; she seemed very attentive, laughed, talked to him, and seemed quite pleased while West read to her." Now West says he did not read the paper to her; but how incautious it was, on the part of Mynn and of his advisers, not to have had the other witnesses up to hear this reading and laughing and talking, and to observe these pleasant feelings.

This witness, Price, states further: "West continued with the deceased no great while; he soon went down stairs; in not quite an hour afterwards West, Wright, and Hone returned into the bedroom; deponent came out of the dressing-room and opened the door for them—they remained therein about half an hour—deponent went down stairs and saw them very soon after all come down stairs." She adds, "When West was reading the will to the deceased, Mynn was down stairs with Wright and Hone, she heard him talking to them."

It is difficult not to suspect that the whole of this is after-thought, fabrication, and falsehood; it is difficult to make a fabricated after-thought fit well in with a former fabrication; truth alone is consistent. Price's account is materially different from West's, and tends to throw an additional suspicion on the case. According to his story there is not one word of Price's coming down with a message from the deceased; Mynn [204] is not left talking to Wright and Hone, but is up stairs in the adjoining room; West states that twice; there is no reading over. West not only does not mention it in his deposition, but on the thirty-first interrogatory he admits the negative. At first, on interrogatory, he had answered, "he had never seen the will before;" but afterwards he appears to have recollected what he had deposed as to his interview on the 1st of June, and corrects it by erasure and interlineation.

Now as to the date and sealing. West says, "He inserted the date;" Whitehead says, "It is in the handwriting of Mynn." West says, "The seal was affixed in the adjoining room before the execution:" though he had said before in chief "that he had no recollection of the matter."

Price says, "She carried the candle into the deceased's bedroom." Wright says, "He did not take notice of any seal when he attested;" Hone, that "the seal was affixed below stairs."

All these contradictions and variations raise a suspicion that truth is not at the bottom of this account; and though I do not place any sort of reliance on any thing that Hone says as forming the ground of my judgment, it is some confirmation of his testimony that West himself admits there was some sealing in the dining parlour, namely, the sealing up of the will in an envelope.

There is a still more striking contradiction to West, and in a circumstance that involves the whole transaction in still further suspicion. West states, both in chief and upon interroga-[205]-tories, "that the deceased having signed the will, he carried it, so signed, down stairs, and that he and the other two witnesses returned immediately up stairs (not 'in somewhat less than an hour,' as Price says, but immediately): that the deceased then, repeating after him, acknowledged the signature and published it as her will, and that he and the other two witnesses attested it in her presence and in the presence of each other:" he expressly says, "he attested it in the presence of the other two witnesses;" but Wright and Hone contradict this and assert that, when West brought down the instrument, both the deceased's name and West's were subscribed and the ink was wet.

West then—the principal witness—the sole witness to the deceased's subscription—is directly falsified on a fact which could scarcely have escaped his attention, and respecting which he could hardly be mistaken through lapse of memory: he surely must be laid out of the case; not from this alone, but, from this and a variety of other circumstances, he cannot be relied upon as to any one fact. Whether he did really go up stairs, and the deceased, in the dying state in which she then was, did repeat these words of acknowledgment, or whether the witnesses signed below stairs, makes no great alteration, in my judgment, as to the insufficiency of the evidence. If Hone also is falsified, the case would rest upon Wright alone, and it would be impossible, under all the suspicions of this case, to hold his evidence sufficient. If the case was fair, why adopt this extraordinary mode of execution? It is not diffi-[206]-cult to conjecture why West should write his name fresh before producing the will: it might induce the other witnesses the more readily to add their names to the attestation: but if they were really intended to be carried up to the deceased, why should either she or West subscribe the will in their absence? why should not they have heard the will read to her, when there could be no evidence of instructions proceeding from her? I cannot help thinking that the very proctor in the cause falsifies, in some degree, the story of West and Wright, or at least proves that they have given different accounts. They assert that the deceased put her forefinger, or her hand, on the signature and acknowledged it to be her handwriting: that is the whole ceremony according to both their depositions; but the story which had been told to the proctor was much more formal, stating, among other particulars, that the deceased went over the signature with a dry pen. The two witnesses, however, mention nothing of the ceremony of a dry pen; they merely say she touched it with her hand or finger; and yet pretending that a dry pen had been used might be material, and be a wilful though a false suggestion; for it would have shewn greater alertness and activity on the part of the deceased, both in mind and intention, and would also have shewn her ability to write, and be a corroboration of West—the only witness to the signing. On the other hand, if she was not able to write, it accounts for Mynn and West going up stairs together, and then bringing down the paper, as if just signed by the deceased and West. The case is not wholly without evidence creat-[207]-ing a suspicion of that kind; and some doubts may be entertained whether Mynn and West went into the deceased's room at this time; whether they did not merely go into the adjoining room and then bring the will down, with the two signatures with the ink wet, in order to induce Wright and Hone to add their signatures.

Mr. White, who attended the deceased at this time, and who appears to have given a very fair evidence, describes her state, and is entitled to much more credit than Dr. West, and the associates and servants of Mynn. He thus relates the condition of the deceased, and I see nothing to impeach his credit.

"From October, 1826, till her death, he was the constant medical attendant of the deceased: he frequently observed her very unhappy; and with spirits depressed; they influenced her general health:" he then speaks to her lamenting her husband's debts, and the harassing applications to her to liquidate them, and on the fifth article says: "She informed him she had, by will, secured to her husband an income which would render him independent; and that it was a very hard thing she should be so teazed, considering the liberal provision she had so made for him." Here, then, is a complete recognition, in her last illness, of the will of 1826, and it corresponds with Lady Hunter's evidence "that on the 4th of May, 1827, the deceased told her she had settled all her affairs."

The state, however, of the deceased's health is more completely spoken to by Mr. White, in his evidence on the thirteenth article. "During the last ten days of her life, in conse-[208]-quence of her bodily powers having become very much worn down and enfeebled, she continued in bed." Yet, two days after, Price says the deceased was up and being dressed. "Her right arm was almost completely paralysed; and her hand and fingers so swollen that for several weeks before, and to her death, she carried the same in a sling: deponent saw her write a cheque with the greatest difficulty: after that the powers of her arm became much more diminished; but her mental powers continued unimpaired to the last day he saw her, and this was the day before her death. When Mynn returned home from the King's Bench prison her recovery was hopeless: her death might have happened at any time."

This state then of her mental powers renders it not impossible that Mynn and his agents, in respect to this paper, did not venture to have any communication with the deceased, lest she should refuse, if not overcome with pain, and laudanum, and extreme weakness, to express an acquiescence and repeat the words dictated: but, considering her extreme debility—the pain she was enduring, that she was taking laudanum to lull it; in the hands of this husband if she did acquiesce so far as to repeat, after West, the acknowledgment of the signature and the words of publication, it would not prove satisfactorily that she had even subscribed the paper—much less approved it: and looking to her bodily infirmities, that for the last ten days she had been confined to her bed; that her right arm was almost in a state of complete [209] paralysis; that the hand and fingers were swollen, so that, several weeks before, she had great difficulty in signing a cheque, and that afterwards the powers of the arm became much diminished; yet seeing with what alertness West describes that she took the pen and made the signature; seeing how well the signature is written (for the names, particularly Mynn, are written freely and well), and, finally, that the attesting witnesses—two of them at least—do not see her sign, there is but too much reason to doubt whether this is a case of a mere failure of proof.

At all events the evidence is not sufficient, in my judgment, to enable the Court to pronounce for the validity of this will; and, as the husband was the conductor of the transaction, and has resorted to such a mode of getting this paper drawn and executed, it is my duty to accompany the sentence, pronouncing against the will, with a decree condemning Mr. John Mynn in the costs.

MILLER AND ROSS v. BROWN. Prerogative Court, 20th Dec., 1828.—A widow having, after the death of her husband, delivered a will made during coverture to her executor for safe custody, such delivery, coupled with other recognitions, amounts, in a Court of Probate, to a republication, rendering it a new will of which the executors are entitled to a general probate.

This was a business of granting probate of the will of Harriett Miller, widow, and was promoted by two of the executors against a brother [210] of the deceased (also an executor) and a party entitled in distribution in case of an intestacy. The will purported to dispose of real and personal property; it was made during coverture, but by permission of the husband, who was acquainted with, and approved of, its contents: he died on the 16th of December, 1825, and his widow on the 11th of September, 1827. The evidence fully established that, after the death of her husband, the testatrix frequently recognized this instrument as her will; expressed her satisfaction that it was made; and that, in June, 1827, she delivered to one of the executors a tin box, which she informed him contained her will (and in which it was found after her death), and on the evening of the day on which she so left the tin box she declared to Dr. Chichester, a physician, whose daughter was married to the executor referred to, "that she had that day deposited her will with him."

Lushington and Pickard contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The deceased was a widow at the time of her death: and whether this will refers principally to real property is not for me to inquire. It has been said that it is necessary to shew a republication after the husband's death, animo republicandi: it would be a strange doctrine for this Court to hold that a formal republication is necessary for a will of personalty where no [211] publication is necessary: custody is a sufficient publication of personalty. What has been done here is quite sufficient. Dr. Chichester speaks to a very strong act of recognition, which, as far as concerns this Court and a disposition of personal property, is a sufficient publication. The deceased (within three months of her death) brought the will sealed up and deposited in a tin box, which she delivered to one of her executors for safe custody, and so it remained till her death, and was then found. The answers, too, admit the depositing and finding.

This is a republication to all intents and purposes, and the instrument so delivered becomes a new will: there cannot be the slightest doubt as to what her mind and intention were; she did not consider a formal republication necessary, but she adhered to the disposition.

What effect this paper may have upon the real estate it is not for this Court to determine, but it is clear that the executors are entitled to a general probate.

The costs may be paid out of the estate.

MACKENZIE v. HANDASYDE. Prerogative Court, 12th Jan., 1829.—Where the execution of a codicil was clandestinely, and without previous instructions, obtained—from a testator of eighty—only one month before death, by the son—the person solely benefited—and his associates, the disposition being contrary to the repeated former acts of the deceased, the clearest proof of capacity and free agency is necessary. Codicil pronounced against, and the son condemned in costs.—A testamentary instrument may be established against the evidence of all the subscribed witnesses, but such a case would require to be supported by the whole res gestæ, by strong probability arising from the conduct of all parties, and by the improbability of the practice of fraud, circumvention, or undue influence.

Peter Handasyde died on the 20th of November, 1824. In the following month Thomas Handasyde, the son and sole executor of his [212] will, took probate thereof and of a codicil. In Easter Term, 1827, a decree "to bring in the probate" was served upon the executor at the instance of Allan Mackenzie, whose legacy, under the will, was revoked by the instrument proved as a codicil. The will was dated on the 7th of September, the codicil on the 21st of October, 1824. The codicil alone was opposed.

Lushington and Dodson contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The deceased was originally a common soldier, but by merit raised himself in life, and became sergeant of the 45th Regiment. In 1795 he was appointed barrack-sergeant at Porchester, at which time Mr. Mackenzie, the party in the suit, was barrack-master. In 1810, on a memorial of his services being presented to the commander-in-chief, he was rewarded by an ensign's commission in the Veteran Battalion, went on service to Gibraltar, and returned in 1814. He was then appointed to the First Royal Veteran Battalion, which he joined at Plymouth, and there he remained till the regiment was disbanded in 1816. In that year he married Miss Murray, his second wife, who died in May, 1823. In August the deceased removed to Hilsea, where he resided for some time with Mackenzie; and he afterwards removed to a small house next door, in which he died on the 20th of November, 1824.

[213] While the deceased was barrack-sergeant at Porchester a great friendship was formed between him and the barrack-master, Mackenzie, notwithstanding their disparity in rank; and this mutual attachment continued till the death of the deceased. How far Mackenzie was instrumental in procuring his commission does not appear, but it is pretty evident that he assisted the deceased with money to fit him out for Gibraltar in 1810, and, on the death of his second wife, it was to Mackenzie's house that he retired; he was an inmate there for some time, then took a house next door, and, in two wills now exhibited, his friendship and obligations to Mackenzie are expressly recognized; and there is no suggestion that any quarrel or misunderstanding had arisen between them.

The deceased by his first wife had an only child—a son—but for many years was alienated from, and kept up no intercourse with, him; but the grounds of that alienation need not be inquired into: on the death of his second wife, in 1823, the deceased did not even know where to find his son; he did, however, at length discover him, and a reconciliation took place: whether this was chiefly brought about through the intervention of Mackenzie is not very important; but it is certain that Mackenzie went to London with the deceased, and that the son and his wife came down to reside with the deceased at Hilsea. On one side it is alleged that there were subsequent disagreements; on the other, that the son and his wife were most attentive, and that the deceased was very fond of them. It comes out, however, from the son's own witness, Mary Thompson, "that the [214] son and his wife had frequent quarrels, which often proceeded to high words, and once even to blows. On one occasion the deceased took part with the wife, and his son left the house, but a reconciliation was brought about and in a few days he returned." Here then, on one side, are long and uninterrupted friendship and gratitude to Mackenzie, down to the very time of the deceased's death: on the other side, towards the son, long alienation of affection, reconciliation in 1823, and a residence together—but not quite in unbroken and increasing amity and regard.

I shall next look to his testamentary acts. In February, 1824, after the son and his wife had resided with the deceased for some months, when the reconciliation and attention had had time to operate, still he made a disposition, in substance, as follows:—He gave Mackenzie 1000l. sterling—his own son, the dividends of the residue for the use of himself and of his wife, with an absolute power of disposal to the survivor: he also gave his son the household goods, and appointed him and Mackenzie joint executors. The son, then, had only the interest for life in about 3000l., the amount of the residue, unless he survived his wife, who was placed on an equal footing. The bequest to Mackenzie commences in these terms: "To my benefactor and highly esteemed friend." It is useless to inquire the extent of Mackenzie's assistance in obtaining the commission and fitting him out for Gibraltar in 1810: here was a solemn recognition by the deceased of the obligation in this very instrument, fourteen years afterwards: and, what renders it more strong, this will was [215] made not only several months after the son and his wife had resided with the deceased, but they knew of the instructions; were actually privy to, and present at, the execution of the instrument; and were acquainted with its contents. This will also marked the continuance of his want of confidence in his son, and a wish to protect his wife; for Mr. Mackenzie was joined in the executorship, and she was nearly as much benefited as this son, and had the absolute disposal of the residue, if she survived her husband.

The son was dissatisfied with this will, and used his best endeavours to get it altered (and this may account for his apparent attention to the deceased at the time): he did at last succeed to a certain extent, and a new will was made, but in a very suspicious manner. The deceased, now in his 80th year, was rapidly declining of mere old age; and about seven months after the former will, and two months before his death, this new will was obtained: not by employing the same solicitor, not with the privity of Mackenzie; but the son, Thomas Handasyde, provided an attorney from Portsmouth, and a friend from Portsmouth, to manage this second will. It is not, however, necessary to enter into a detail of the circumstances attending the factum of this will, as its validity is not in question. But to what extent does it vary from the former will? Its substance is shortly this: it bequeaths 1000l. 3 per cent. stock, instead of sterling money, to Mackenzie; but there is still the expression, "in testimony of my gratitude for past services and benefits he has done and bestowed to and upon me:" here therefore is still the strongest recognition [216] of his obligations to Mackenzie. This will, however, has other alterations. The son's wife is excluded from any interest in the residue; the son takes it absolutely, and is appointed sole executor. Yet his own evidence shews that the daughter-in-law was the deceased's favorite; he took her part in the conjugal quarrels; but now she is wholly passed over. This will, as I have said, is not opposed: but it has much the appearance of being the act of the son, and not of the father. Yet this was the highest point to which Thomas Handasyde could carry the alteration of the disposition by this instrument of September, after seven months' dissatisfaction at the former will: and so long as the deceased had strength and firmness to resist, the total exclusion of Mackenzie could not be effected. Still, in six weeks after this second will so strongly acknowledging his gratitude to Mackenzie, without the least appearance of quarrel or dissatisfaction, was the codicil in question in this cause made, revoking the bequests to Mackenzie altogether. It is in these terms:

"This is a codicil to the last will and testament of me, Peter Handasyde, which will bears date the seventh day of September last past, and in and by which I bequeathed to my friend, Allan Mackenzie, the sum of 1000l. stock, part of 2350l. stock which I now have and then had in the three per cent. Bank annuities. Now, upon consideration of the affluence of my said friend, and that I ought in justice to consider the interests of my son rather than a stranger in blood, I do hereby [217] absolutely revoke and make void the said bequest, and do declare that my said only son, Thomas Handasyde, shall have and receive in the nature of a bequest or legacy the said sum of 1000l. stock, and also all and every part of my estate and effects whatsoever, which I am now or may be possessed of or entitled unto at the time of my decease; and I hereby declare this to be a codicil to my said will, and recognize and again appoint my said son Thomas Handasyde as the only sole executor as well of the said will, as of this codicil thereto. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand, this twenty-first day of October, 1824. "The mark ⋈ of

"PETER HANDASYDE.

"Signed by the said Peter Handasyde affixing his mark hereto, after the same being fully read over and explained to him (he then being in sound mind and perfectly aware of the nature of the codicil, but by old age and affliction unable to write distinctly), in the presence of—

"S. Blyth, Geo. Vicat, John Williams."

This codicil is executed by the mark of the deceased, though he had signed his name to the will, and the attestation clause is totally different from the usual one. This, so far from assisting the paper as evidence of the fairness of the transaction, shews to my mind some doubt as to the deceased's capacity: and what are the alleged grounds of revocation? Mackenzie is still recognized as his friend, and the reasons assigned respecting his "affluence" and his be-[218]-ing "a stranger in blood" existed in February and September, when the testator was much more competent to decide on the weight of those considerations. The deceased had now taken to his bed, was within a month of his death by decay of nature, and was so weak in body as only to be able to make a scrawling mark; he was scarcely able to resist importunity, or to form any sound judgment for himself.

On the face then—on the very surface of the transaction—the affair is suspicious, and with the admitted dissatisfaction of the son at both the wills—the last only executed six weeks before, by which the change in Mackenzie's legacy from sterling to stock was made, the Court would require the clearest possible evidence of the factum of this codicil. It is attested by three witnesses, Blyth, Williams, and Vicat. Blyth, the attorney and drawer, is since dead, and his death, character, and handwriting have been pleaded. The evidence to his character is somewhat conflicting: there are several witnesses who give him a very good character; but the fact is clear that he was rather in low practice, was chiefly concerned for prisoners and smugglers, kept no office, nor clerk, became an habitual drunkard, and died in consequence of his intemperance, having first become insane: he was not of that high character in his profession as to give a strong assurance that he had not lent himself to, or at least been surprized into, the making of this codicil under the directions of Thomas Handasyde, without sufficiently ascertaining that it was the free and voluntary act of a capable testator.

[219] The other two witnesses have been examined, and if they are credited, it was merely the act of the son; they entertain at least strong doubts of the capacity of the deceased. These witnesses are deposing against their own act, and are to be heard with considerable caution; if fully believed, there would at once be an end to the case; it would be a great and manifest fraud. It is possible that a testamentary instrument may be established against the evidence of all the subscribed witnesses; but such a case would require strong supplementary circumstances, would require to be supported by the whole res gestæ, by strong probability arising from the conduct of all parties, and by the improbability of the practice of any fraud or circumvention, or the exercise of undue influence.

Both these witnesses have been making applications to Thomas Handasyde, as they suggest, for promised rewards. From that circumstance two inferences may be drawn: they probably have not disclosed a fraudulent transaction from honest compunction of conscience; but, on the other hand, if the transaction had been fair, would they have made these applications? At all events, if they are discredited they make no proof of the factum; that must be established by other evidence: but the res gestæ, always a strong species of evidence, are all against the probability of the act.

These witnesses are the friends of Thomas Handasyde, brought by him from Portsmouth wholly without the knowledge of Mackenzie: in the next place, it is a night transaction: Blyth had gone to the Winchester sessions; he [220] was way-laid, waited for on the road at his return, and carried to the deceased's house, where the codicil was prepared and executed between 8 and 11 o'clock at night. Blyth had dined with a friend on the road; he might have been rather elevated, for he had no objection to indulge a little freely in liquor; but it does not appear that he was intoxicated: and there were refreshments at the deceased's after the business was over. If the deceased was so willing and so capable, where was the necessity for such haste? It is not stated that he had any sudden attack. Why not wait till the next day, and let this codicil be made in broad day-light? Abundance of persons, competent to attest, were close at hand. Why not call in the medical attendant or respectable neighbours? Why has it been necessary to resort to declarations either before or after, and to opinions upon capacity? Witnesses so easily mistake times and dates that some of the declarations may possibly apply to the will of September. The transaction being so manifestly conducted by Thomas Handasyde and his associates, the disposition so contrary to the former wills, and to the very recent will of September, it requires the clearest proof both of capacity and free agency.

There is a piece of evidence, introduced on the part of the son, to which it is necessary to advert, though I notice it with extreme reluctance. The curate of the parish attended as a clergyman on the deceased, who was a devout, conscientious man, and was desirous of receiving the sacrament; but he being in this weak state, the curate thought it proper, before ad-[221]-ministering the sacrament, to undertake, upon the representation of Mr. Handasyde, to interfere about this will in the following manner:—"The deponent was informed by Mrs. Handasyde that the deceased was distressed in his mind on account of his will made, in some measure, in favour of Mr. Mackenzie." He does not, however, on this ask the deceased whether he had any distress of mind on such point: but "he told the deceased it was essential his mind should be quite free before he could receive the sacrament; and asked him what had occurred on his son's part to prevent his leaving his property to him? The deceased spoke of his son having been somewhat wild formerly. But on deponent's talking further with him, and pointing out to him that it was his duty to take care of his only child, the deceased made up his mind to do so: at least the deponent, after having administered the sacrament to the deceased, which he did when he had ascertained his mind was in a fit state to receive it, and free from distress, left him with a firm impression that he intended to leave the property which he had given to Mackenzie to his son; and that his mind was relieved by that resolution: this must have been before the 25th of October." Here, then, was this pious man, so ill that the sacrament was about to be administered to him; but, under a supposition that he had left his property from his only son to a stranger, the witness undertook to determine that his mind was not in a fit state to receive the sacrament till he acquiesced in the propriety of altering his will. It also appears from the an-[222]-swer of this witness, upon interrogatory, that "in the summer of 1824 Thomas Handasyde and his wife called upon and asked him to interfere with the deceased on account of the will in favour of Mackenzie: they complained of the deceased's partiality for him: the respondent declined interfering." Here, then, both the son and his wife apply. "Respondent did express his surprize, as interrogate, that Mackenzie should want any money from the deceased's estate, when there was barely enough for him to leave his son." But how did he know all this; and why did he afterwards interfere on grounds of this kind? I am of opinion that this was a degree of influence and importunity that the deceased was not, at that time, capable of resisting. He might have a testable capacity, but that will not meet all the demands of the law, and supply the want of evidence of instructions, and overcome all the difficulties and suspicions under which this codicil labours. As to the refusal of the sacrament, what importunity, what influence, could be more undue? even assuming that all which occurred is correctly related, and with the true colour, though that may be doubted; for the fact is not expressly pleaded so as to cross-examine to it. Suppose this gentleman had been told, as the real fact was, that this bequest to Mackenzie was a mere debt of gratitude—that he had so recorded it in both his wills (the deceased might perhaps think that had he not experienced the kindness of Mackenzie, he might have had nothing to have given this son), could his interference have been justified? Or if this fact was concealed from the [223] curate, such concealment was an imposition practised upon him. But, on the other hand, suppose the deceased had left every thing to the son, and Mackenzie had induced this clergyman to interfere and get him 1000l. legacy by a codicil, telling him that till he had discharged the debt of gratitude he owed Mackenzie "his mind was not free"—"was not in a fit state for the holy sacrament;" what would have been said of a codicil so obtained by Mackenzie?

The state of firmness of the deceased's mind at this period could not have been great; for the curate states that, after the conversation to which he has deposed, he never went to the deceased again. His evidence, then, does not give a more favourable impression of the case: at all events it will not supply the proof of the factum, the continuance of intention, and capacity: it goes no further than to shew that at one time (whenever it was) the deceased, under the pressure of this improper interference, seemed to acquiesce.

There is a recognition relied upon, and spoken to by Mrs. Robertson, an old markswoman of seventy-five; and there is also something of a recognition deposed to by Mary Thompson, the nurse: but the Court cannot rely much on their recollection of declarations made three or four years before, nor of the time at which they were made, nor of the transaction or instrument to which they might apply. They are not sufficient to counterbalance the other defects.

A codicil, then, obtained under circumstances already adverted to, and so completely opposed [224] to the repeated acts of the deceased, when of sound and perfect mind, requires evidence going much more directly to instructions, to volition, and to capacity. The son, after seven months' dissatisfaction at the will of February, though he was privy to its factum, could only, in September, get the deceased to reduce the mark of gratitude to his friend from sterling money to stock; and that will has every appearance of being the deceased's ultimatum.

When, however, the Court sees, after this old man, in his 80th year, had taken to his bed, the son, by himself and his friends, by a minister of the church, holding out, in effect, excommunication to this pious old man, if he left this token of gratitude to his benefactor, instead of leaving everything to his son; when it sees also the son getting these associates of his own from Portsmouth in the night, in such haste as to watch Blyth's return; and procuring the execution of this codicil by a mere mark without any respectable and disinterested person being present; it cannot but hold that this conduct and the whole transaction bear such strong marks of unfairness, and are exposed to such suspicions of fraud, that it must pronounce against the codicil: and I hardly think the Court would be doing justice, and using sufficient endeavour to prevent similar applications when parties are in this condition, if it did not accompany that sentence with a condemnation of the son in costs.

[225] BARWICK v. MULLINGS AND OTHERS. Prerogative Court, 14th Jan., 1829. —1st. A paper, commencing "Memorandum of my intended will," but dispositive in terms, signed, and intended to operate if no more formal will was made, is, unless revoked, entitled to probate. 2d. Neither instructions nor a will drawn up therefrom (which, though in the deceased's possession for several months, was not executed nor shewn to be finally determined on) will, either as entitled to probate or as letting in an intestacy, revoke such a paper.

[Applied, Whyte v. Pollok, 1882, 7 A. C. 412.]

Lushington and Pickard for paper No. 1.

Dodson and Nicholl in support of paper A.

The King's advocate and Phillimore on behalf of the widow, and for an intestacy.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. In this case there are three parties before the Court: first, William Barwick, a nephew and one of the residuary legatees in the paper which he propounds, marked No. 1; secondly, Phœbe Barwick, a niece and executrix in a paper of a former date, marked A, which she propounds; and, thirdly, Hannah Mullings, the widow, who opposes both, and contends for an intestacy.

The deceased, Joseph Mullings, died on the 16th of November, 1827, and left a widow, a sister, and four nephews and nieces entitled in distribution. His property, which is all personal, was nearly of the value of 11,000l.

Of the papers propounded, paper A, the earliest, begins: "This is a memorandum of my intended will;" but it goes on throughout in dispositive terms; it appoints executors, is dated and signed by the deceased himself, and the character of the signature is different from that of the body of the instrument.

[226] In legal consideration, this paper, upon the face of it, being subscribed by the testator, would be a finished and perfect paper. The subscribing it would be primâ facie evidence that the deceased intended by that act to give it effect; and that, though he began it as a memorandum, yet as he went on to use dispositive terms and finally signed it, he altered his mind and converted it into an operative instrument; more especially as the body of it is not in the handwriting of the deceased; so that the signature could not have been carelessly and thoughtlessly added, but intentionally and upon consideration; nor is there any thing to shew that he intended to do any further act to this particular instrument. Still, the term "memorandum of my intended will" would raise a sufficient doubt to let in evidence of circumstances whether it was finished in order to have effect, or only as a deliberative memorandum.(a) Parol evidence then being let in, the history of the deceased and of this paper may give to his intentions a more decided character.

The deceased had been a butcher, but was retired from business: he was married to his second wife, and had been in that state for about sixteen years; but it is impossible to describe his life as the happiest state of connubial bliss, for he and his wife did not live on the most harmonious or comfortable terms together. It is clear that he had no thought of dying intestate; the instruments propounded as well as the parol evidence establish that fact beyond all doubt: he was aware that under an intestacy the law would [227] give his widow half his property absolutely, and he was determined to guard against that course of distribution: he had a sister living who had children; he had also other nephews and nieces; and he meant therefore to provide for his wife by what he considered a handsome income for her life, but on her death to divide the bulk of his fortune among his own relations: he seems also to have been aware that his wife had the same knowledge of the distribution which the law would make, viz. that she, as widow, would take half absolutely; while she appears to have differed entirely from her husband in opinion that a mere life interest in the produce of that moiety would be a handsome provision for her: she preferred the moiety absolutely, and entertained no great hopes that a testamentary distribution by the husband would be more favourable, or even as favourable, to her as that disposition which the law would make.

In this state of opinions the deceased apparently thought that it would tend much to domestic peace if, in whatever testamentary arrangement he might wish to make, the act were done without the privity of his wife. Mr. Richard Barwick, who had married the deceased's sister, was much in his confidence, was consulted by him frequently upon the subject, but always when Mrs. Mullings was not present, and if she approached the conversation was dropped. The deceased and Barwick used often to go out together in the deceased's gig on a Sunday—the only day when Barwick was not engaged—and it appears that, according to an arrangement between them, on on the first Sunday in April, 1820, they met at the house of Barwick, [228] where, by the deceased's instructions, and in his presence, he wrote paper A: and the deceased read it over, approved of it, and signed it; it was then sealed up in the deceased's presence, who desired Barwick to keep and take care of it.

Now if the parol evidence stopped here, and if the deceased had died the next hour or the next day, there can be no doubt that this instrument would have been valid: but further, a presumption of abandonment would not attach to it; the instrument was not unfinished, the deceased intended to do no more in order to give it effect: it was signed, sealed up, and deposited for safe custody in the hands of one of the executors. Even if the deceased had at this time expressly declared that he intended to have a will formally prepared, still this paper would be deemed his will till he had executed a more formal instrument, however long delayed; in addition, however, to the evidence that he did not like the trouble or expense of making a formal will, the deceased, shortly after its execution, strongly recognized this instrument as his will. Unless therefore there be some act of revocation, paper A will have operation.

Thus matters remained till 1826: when Barwick, by the deceased's desire, brought A in his pocket, and in the course of one of their drives the deceased said he wished to read it and make some alterations therein: the seal was broken and the will read both to, and by, the deceased. He said, "It was not to his mind, and that he thought of making an alteration;" but he did not say what alteration, nor can Barwick recollect whether this was before or after some offence which Joseph Fanthorn, his [229] nephew, had given the deceased while living in his service; he rather thinks before; nor did the deceased appear to have made up his mind respecting the alteration, nor specify whether it was trifling or considerable, only that it was some alteration. The will was returned to Barwick, and they agreed to confer again upon a future Sunday. They did accordingly consult, and after that second conference the deceased took the will with him, kept it two or three days, then left it with Mrs. Barwick, and subsequently told Barwick "he was afraid Mrs. Mullings should get hold of it:" and it remained in Barwick's hands till after the deceased's death.

Here, then, after six years, was not only adherence to, but a complete demonstration of, confidence in Barwick and confirmation of this instrument: he treated it in every respect as his will; he talked indeed of making some alteration—what he did not state; but after repeated perusals and considerations he again deposited it with one of the executors. In point of legal validity this instrument, though described at the outset as a "memorandum," but being testamentary in terms, then signed, thus deposited originally, thus revised and reconsidered after six years, thus again deposited, is as much to be considered the will of the deceased as to his personal property (and he had no other) as if it had been executed and attested in the most formal manner: it was his will till he had altered or revoked it by some other valid instrument.

The question then comes to the validity of the [230] other papers propounded: for intestacy seems quite out of the consideration; it would be as much against the manifest wishes and intentions of the deceased as against legal construction.

The matter rested till the spring of 1827, when the deceased and Barwick had further conferences, and Barwick sketched him out a sort of skeleton will, leaving blanks to be filled up with the description of persons and premises. This paper he left with the deceased; at the same time advising him to apply to a professional person and recommending Mr. Collingwood. From this paper, or in some way or other the deceased himself wrote No. 1, the paper propounded by William Barwick, but the skeleton will drawn up by Richard Barwick has not been produced, and was probably destroyed by the deceased when he had written No. 1.

This paper is hardly intelligible; it has no date; it has executors, and the disposition made by it varies a good deal from the former, and is more favourable to the Barwicks, more unfavourable to the Fanthorns, Joseph Fanthorn having only a legacy of 50l. instead of 50l. a year: but still it adheres to the intention of providing for the widow by an annuity of 250l., though a house and a legacy of 100l. are given her in addition. This paper, thus drawn out in a most insufficient way, the deceased in May, 1827, carried to Mr. Collingwood as instructions. Like A, it contained no disposition of the residue—that was only added by Collingwood after conversation with the deceased; and no executors were named—at least none are written down. Collingwood details what passed upon the occasion of the deceased's [231] coming to him, "That the deceased came alone, in the morning; professed to be in a hurry; delivered to him No. 1, as instructions for his will; they were read over to him, the necessary alterations and additions made, and the interview lasted about half an hour, but there was no lengthened conversation, the deceased being impatient to go."

It was in this hurry that he gave these imperfect instructions; and this was the only communication that he had with Collingwood as to the contents of No. 1, and it is from this interview that the Court is to decide that No. 1 is the last will. What might be the effect of Collingwood's evidence if no former will existed and the deceased had died immediately, with strong circumstances to support the intention of the disposition thus made, is not the question for my decision, for there is a former will long adhered to and confirmed. He had some misunderstandings with parts of his family—with his nephews William Barwick and Joseph Fanthorn—before these instructions were given: that with William Barwick, the father admits to have been temporary; and between these instructions and his death he may have thought less unfavourably of Joseph Fanthorn.

Mr. Collingwood, as I have said, had no second interview with the deceased respecting these instructions, but from them, given in a hurry (and it might be under a temporary impression), the draft of a will was prepared, and an engrossed copy sent to the deceased ready for execution. The fair copy varies in several respects from the instructions, and is of considerable length, being no less than thirteen sheets of paper. It was given to the deceased on [232] the 29th of May, and remained in his possession till the time of his death, on the 16th of November; but no execution took place, nor anything tantamount to it. Collingwood frequently saw the deceased—asked him when it should be finished—pressed him to bring it to a close—but he could not prevail; he never obtained even a declaration that he had read and approved it: all he got were complaints of its length, or, as the deceased expressed it, in language not very inappropriate to his condition of life, it was "gallows long."

To his friend Barwick he disliked the phraseology "there were so many 'aforesaids:' he could not understand it, it puzzled him." Barwick offered his assistance to explain it; he read part, but there was no direct approval: the fact is, there are marks, some of which shew that he thought it incorrect in parts, and wished it altered in other parts—and he declined to execute, for so the non-execution must be considered; since if it was only reluctance arising from a difficulty of understanding it, he would have gone (for he was well enough) to Collingwood and obtained an explanation: the expense had been now incurred, that could not be the objection.

Against this conduct it would not be possible for me to decide that he quite approved of the disposition: might he not begin to doubt and hesitate as to the propriety of executing it? He was taken ill—the instrument was in the room—he saw Barwick—he frequently was alone with his apothecary—still he took no steps to execute. The evidence is pretty strong to shew that the wife gave no great facilities for making or completing any testamentary disposition; [233] but there is no evidence, on the other hand, in any degree satisfying me that the deceased now wished to execute this will making the exact disposition of property it contained: he desired to see Barwick—he wished to see Collingwood—he was in possession of his understanding, but non constat that he did not intend to make alterations in this instrument, which for six months he had declined to execute, though reminded and requested by Collingwood and urged by the approach and continuance of illness. It is true that Mr. Collingwood says "he has no doubt that No. 1, as altered by the deceased on his interview with him on the 21st of May, contained the testamentary intentions of, and was fully approved by, the deceased:" but this conversation six months before his death was hurried; he might have changed his mind: and this does not quite rest on inference and conjecture, for there is direct evidence that he did wish alterations in that paper, in order to assimilate it in some degree to the disposition under A, particularly in favour of Fanthorn, towards whom—after time, the great softener of resentments, had elapsed, and when from the reflections of a sick bed and the approach of death his heart would naturally relent—he might feel forgiveness, and wish to bestow upon him a larger share of his property than he proposed in No. 1. That within three days of his death he contemplated some alteration favorable to Joseph Fanthorn, and that he wished to see Barwick about settling his affairs, is deposed to by Parrett, who was attendant on the deceased as his nurse; and her evidence is confirmed by a note she wrote, upon the occa-[234]-sion of his conversation with her; which note she delivered to Barwick on the evening of the same day: so that her account is no afterthought; she acted upon it at the time; and there is no reason to doubt its truth, for it accords with probability, with the evidence of the boy M'Duff, and with the conduct of the deceased in not executing this will.

Under these circumstances it would be contrary to all the principles of this Court to pronounce for No. 1, there being no reason to suppose that imperfect paper contained his final intentions. The case therefore reverts back to paper A. That instrument, having been signed, approved, revised, confirmed, restored to its former custody, and adhered to for so many years, and containing a disposition conformable at the last to the deceased's intentions—he being determined to die testate; to provide for his wife by this annuity of 250l.; to leave the bulk of his fortune among his own relations; and reverting to his purpose of including Fanthorn in his bounty (whether or not with any slight alterations cannot be ascertained)—I am of opinion that, till any meditated alterations had been legally and effectually made, paper A was to be esteemed the will of the deceased, and must be pronounced for.

Lushington moved the Court to decree William Barwick's costs to be paid out of the estate.

Per Curiam. Though there was a "justa causa litigandi" in William Barwick, it does not follow that he [235] is entitled to his costs out of the estate: however, upon the whole, thinking that it was necessary for him to bring the matter before the Court, I will allow his costs out of the estate: but the widow certainly is not entitled to any indulgence. The party, who has established paper A, will of course take her expences out of the estate.

MASTERMAN v. MABERLY. Prerogative Court, 13th Jan., 1829.—Where a testator executed a will and two codicils, and afterwards had a new will and certain bonds prepared, which were, in conjunction, to dispose of his property, on the same principle as his former will, and died when preparing to sign the new will; first, the execution being thus finally determined on and prevented, the new will is entitled to probate; and, secondly, the new will never being intended to operate independent of the bonds, the Court is bound, in order to carry his intentions most nearly into effect, to grant probate of the new will and of the unexecuted bonds, as together containing his will; and to revoke a probate of the former papers.—Where there is final intention proved and execution prevented by the act of God, the mere want of execution does not invalidate an instrument disposing of personalty. The disposition has the same legal effect as if the instrument had been actually signed and attested.—When a paper is not intended as a will, but as an instrument of a different nature, if it cannot operate in the latter it may in the former character, for the form does not affect its title to probate, provided it is to carry into effect the intention of the deceased after death.

[Referred to, King's Proctor v. Daines, 1830, 3 Hagg. Ecc. 221; Henfrey v. Henfrey, 1842, 4 Moore, P. C. 35. Applied, In the Goods of Morgan, 1866, L. R. 1 P. & D. 214. Referred to, O'Leary v. Douglass, 1878, 3 L. R. Ir. 329.]

The deceased, William Leader, died on the 13th of January, 1828. Of his will and two codicils, respectively bearing date the 2nd of August, 1826, probate had been taken by the four executors therein named: this probate was called in for the purpose of trying the validity (as testamentary instruments and, as such, whether entitled to probate in conjunction with the will and codicils already in operation) of a will, regularly and formally prepared, and of three draft bonds. These four instruments were severally engrossed in 1828; but were all unexecuted. In the unexecuted will William Leader Maberly was substituted in the place of his father, John Maberly, an executor and trustee under the testamentary papers of 1826: the other three executors were retained.

Lushington and Pickard in support of the unexecuted will and bonds.

[236] Testamentary papers, of which the execution is only prevented by death, are as much entitled to probate as instruments duly executed. Here final intention is proved, and the deceased died in the very act of execution. An union of executed and unexecuted papers is not unusual.

Per Curiam. Is there any instance where two papers—both complete as to the disposition of personalty, and where the only defect of the second paper is a want of due execution—have been admitted to probate as together containing the last will? Such a case is not within my recollection, and seems contrary to the principle upon which two papers are incorporated for the purpose of probate. The practice of taking two papers as together containing the will is, in strict principle, for the purpose of supplying imperfections in the disposition of personalty by the later paper: though, perhaps, for the convenience of parties it may be extended to cases where a latter paper, the execution thereof being prevented by the arrest of death, operates as to all the personalty; but not as to the realty, which would pass under the former executed paper. Where a subsequent paper is merely codicillary then no difficulty arises.

Argument resumed.

The object of this Court is to effectuate intentions. In the present case probate of the unexecuted instruments would certainly most fully attain that object; but the question is, whether the Court can grant probate of instru-[237]-ments—such as the three bonds now propounded—clearly intended not to operate till after death?

The cases upon this point establish that an instrument, whatever be its form—whether deed-poll, indenture, deed of gift, or even an indorsement upon a banker's note—may be testamentary: the form of the bonds, therefore, is no objection to their being admitted to probate. Corp v. Corp, and the other cases quoted in Thorold v. Thorold (1 Phill. 1). Ousley v. Carroll (in the Prerogative Court), cited by Lord Hardwicke in Ward v. Turner (2 Ves. 440), Habergham v. Vincent (2 Ves. jun. 205, S. C. 4 Brown, C. C. 377), Peacock v. Monk (1 Ves. 127), Tomkyns v. Ladbroke (2 Ves. 591), Smith v. Ashton (Vin. Ab. tit. Devise (A. 2), 4).

The King's advocate and Phillimore contrà. The execution of these papers was not prevented by the "act of God:" it was postponed till the deceased's property was in a fit state for the complete arrangement which he contemplated. The only son is, in this case, a minor; and his interests are peculiarly under the protection of the Court. No decision has been, nor, we apprehend, can be, adduced where probate of two papers, each containing a final and complete disposition of personal property, was pronounced for and decreed.

If probate were to be granted of the papers propounded, the intention of the deceased would [238] not be carried into effect: he contemplated the operation of all the unexecuted instruments together—the deed of settlement as well as the unexecuted will and bonds: (a) they, when executed, were to be substituted for his existing testamentary papers, viz. the will and codicils of 1826: these have already been acted upon; and we submit that the probate, originally granted, should be again delivered out. The executors have no interest in the suit, but thought it their duty to apply to the Court for directions.

Lushington in reply. Suppose the draft settlement deed were admitted to probate, there would be great doubt whether a Court of Equity could act upon it. If, however, it be desirable to propound this deed, it may be done apud acta.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. Upon the facts of this case there is no controversy, nor does there arise any considerable question upon the law applying to these facts. The case derives its importance only from the magnitude of the property, and from the minority of the residuary legatee: but, be its amount great or small, the testamentary disposition must be governed by the same principles. The only question is on the validity of the unexecuted will and the unexecuted bonds.

[239] The deceased, William Leader, described as of Putney Hill, and of Queen's Square, Westminster, died on the 13th of January, 1828, leaving a widow, a son who is still a minor, and four daughters: he executed a will and two codicils in August, 1826: these papers were of considerable length, distributing his large property among his family; and appointing four executors who took probate of them soon after his death. The personalty, affected by the probate, is stated to be nearly 300,000l.

It appears that in the autumn of 1827 the deceased wished to make some alteration in this will. Instructions for a new will were given: certain drafts and instruments were prepared, but the actual execution had not taken place when he died; and, as I have already said, the present question arises upon the validity of those unexecuted papers.
